On the other hand, the Senator from Nevada, as he pursued his thesis, seemed to forget the proposition with which he started out; and the burden of his argument consisted entirely in this—not that the Senator from Massachusetts had misconstrued the President's reply but that the Senator from Massachusetts differed with the President of the United States upon this proposition. Of course, it is not necessary for the Senator from Nevada to introduce proof in support of the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts does not agree with the President on this note, for the Senator from Massachusetts admits it, and has taken great pains to make clear in the most forcible, and, I think, the most eloquent and impressive style, his difference of views with the President upon this particular phase of this great question. That is, in fact, the issue; that is why this matter is being discussed, and is worthy of being discussed—because of the fact, that is so elaborated by the Senator from Nevada, that some of us do not agree, and have taken pains to show wherein we do not agree, with the President's note.

The conclusion of the Senator from Nevada, as to the different views taken by the Senator from Massachusetts and the President—that the President being a greater man than the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Massachusetts—as the Senator from Nevada says—not comparing with the President, we must follow the President in this matter. The argument of the Senator from Nevada is not upon the merit of the propositions advanced but merely a fulsome eulogy of the President, who, he says, is smarter than the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Nevada apparently does not undertake to arrive at a conclusion for himself on the question itself, but is content to follow the President without question or investigation.

Comparisons of that kind are not instructive. The fact of the case is that, on the other hand, I think they are rather offensive and scarcely worthy of this arena. It may be perfectly natural in view of the political fate that has overtaken some of those in the Democratic Party who dared to differ from the President that Senators, if there are any of that party represented by the Senator from Nevada, who are content to shine in a reflected light and prosper by the favor of the great, should take the position that he has taken, that no one should differ, even in the slightest particular, with the views of the President. If the Senate, as the Senator from Nevada proposes, is to be the mere echo of the President—although I have for him, and I am sure we all have, the greatest respect—we may as well vacate our functions and let the Senate be abolished.

Now, I want to refer a little more directly than the Senator from Massachusetts did, to the consequences of the course which the President is taking in his conduct of these negotiations.

I think the President has accepted a parley with the German Government, and the President's acceptance of a parley with the enemy by his answer to Germany's offer gives Germany the opportunity which she has long been seeking. The two questions and one statement by the President, which latter also implies an interrogatory and calls for an answer, presuppose a negotiation as to the conditions on which the war shall end, based upon the answers which may be received, with this criminal lunatic among the nations. I am referring to Germany. That is rather strong language, but I formed an opinion some time ago that German is so afflicted.

It is the preliminary clearing of the way, as it were, for entering into a discussion with Germany as to the terms and conditions upon which the various nationalities and peoples shall be reestablished at the conclusion of the war. Although couched in an interrogatory form, it is in itself a preliminary answer to the German chancellor's audacious proposal. As such, as an answer, and by reason of the fact that it is an answer, it is most unfortunte.

In view of Germany's multiplied crimes, both in deliberately planning and commencing this war, and in the manner in which she has conducted it; in the repeated express statements of her officials and spokesmen that every consideration and sanction, including her plighted word, should be subordinated to the military interests of the state; and in view of her constant disregard and express repudiation of her treaties and solemn agreements, as well as of every restraint of morals and of international law; her deliberate starvation of the inhabitants of occupied countries, who would have utterly perished but for the voluntary contributions of the people of the allied countries; and the unnameable and degenerate tortures which she has inflicted upon prisoners and noncombants; her attacks upon hospitals and hospital ships; her burning of the houses of civilians and murder of civilian inhabitants, have so destroyed Germany's moral standing in the world that it is surprising that the President apparently expects by the interrogatories to the German chancellor to base his further discussion of an armistice, which is the same thing as peace, upon the answers which that official will make to these questions.

The answers of the German chancellor will be such as in his opinion suit the material interests of Germany in her present desperate situation. Although the President by asking the questions apparently intends to base his further negotiations upon these answers, they can no more be depended upon than any other of the statements, treaties, moral or legal obligations which Germany has repudiated in her 40 years' course of systematic subordination of right to expediency. It ought by this time to be known to the leaders of all the allies that Germany is destitute of political morality, that she is cunning, astute, crafty, and treacherous. In her entire course with Denmark, Austria, and Russia she has been habitually guilty of duplicity and bad faith. By the express utterances of her most authoritative military and civil leaders she has declared the doctrine that all means may be justifiably employed, however unlawful and treacherous, which tend toward German success and the supremacy of the German people. Our own State Department only a few days ago called attention to the cynical repudiation by Germany of the Brest-Litovsk treaty within a few weeks after its ratification. The vast system of international propaganda in neutral, as well as allied countries, which Germany has maintained through her secret service and her diplomatic establishments has shown her to be, whatever else she may be, an unscrupulous master of political cunning and artifice. In the light of this disclosure of German character, which has been burned into the hearts and consciences of the world through the colossal sacrifices and sufferings of this war, it is humiliating that anyone of the allied Governments should accept, even for a moment, as a basis of discussion, of armistice, or peace the promises of this traitor to civilization.

Germany should be regarded as an outlaw among the nations. She has proved herself to be not amenable to any of the moral sanctions which are the basis of negotiations and of settlement between Christian and civilized peoples. The answer, which should be made forthwith, to the ambiguous and worthless promises of the German chancellor should be a demand for unconditional surrender.

The German chancellor can well answer each one of the inquiries of the President in such way as will be most calculated to accomplish his object. He can say that he represents both the Government and the people of Germany, and who can dispute his statement? In this he undoubtedly would be correct, as, for the purposes of this war, there is no difference between the German people and the German Government. He could say that he does accept the terms laid down by the President in his address to the Congress of the United States on the 8th of January last and in subsequent addresses.

I pause here to say that there is as much latitude and room for disagreement and for the arrival at different conclusions in the greater part of the 14 principles enunciated as there would be in any mere declaration that we are in favor of the right settlement of the war or a righteous peace; in fact, language similar to that is used in some of these propositions. So that an acceptance of them arrives nowhere, so far as any tangible and definite establishment of boundaries is concerned, and the fixing of the conditions of the peoples of the world at the conclusion of the war. If the German chancellor should take that course, as he very likely will, and should state that he accepts all of the propositions of the President, what is his statement worth? The President calls for his statement. What will his statement be worth when he shall have made it?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator permit me to suggest that the query of the President as to whose this voice was fully answers the question as to whether the voice has any capacity to speak.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But the answer to the Senator from Oklahoma is perfectly obvious, that the same person is going to answer all the queries.

Mr. OWEN. The query which was offered through the Secretary of State was, Are the persons speaking merely the same people representing the military power, without any authority to rule the German people without their consent?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no; the Senator has not quoted it correctly.

Mr. OWEN. The substance of the query of the President is, Are these the same constituted authorities who have heretofore ruled the German people——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no!

Mr. OWEN. And whose right to rule the German people has been denied by the President?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is nothing of that kind in the note.

Mr. OWEN. I will demonstrate that it is in the President's note when the Senator concludes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The substance of the note was the inquiry whether or not the chancellor represented the authorities who have heretofore conducted the war.

Mr. OWEN. Merely those authorities.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think that the word "merely" is in it, but we will assume that it is——

Mr. OWEN. The word "merely" is the most important word in it, and when the Senator interprets the word "merely," he will see there is no difference of view between him and the President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no statement whatever in the note that these authorities did not represent the German people, that they had no right to rule; nothing of that kind whatever is contained in the note.

Mr. OWEN. It is already included in what the President said in New York.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am talking about the note to the German chancellor, and there is nothing of that kind in the note. I should like to suggest further to the Senator from Oklahoma, that that inquiry, as to whom the chancellor represents, will be answered by the chancellor himself, and he will adjust his answer to that question the same as he will to the other questions—to suit his interests. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma what credence or dependence or faith would he attach to the answer of the German chancellor upon that question?

Mr. OWEN. The same that the President has heretofore expressed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then, what is the use of asking the question?

Mr. OWEN. None whatever.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then we are in accord; we are agreed. That was the conclusion I was leading up to.

Mr. OWEN. It is where the Senator will find himself when he gets through with the debate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree entirely with the Senator; and I am very glad, indeed, that he has so declared himself, that there was no occasion to ask such a question.

Mr. OWEN. I made no such suggestion; I entirely approve the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, let the RECORD stand for what the Senator said.

Mr. OWEN. I entirely approve the question, but the Senator omits the word "merely"; he has not seen the word "merely"; he does not think it is in the note, in the query that was made, and yet it is the most important word in that query.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think it is very important.

Mr. OWEN. Then the Senator will need to reread it; and, when he does, he will see that it is the most important part of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the use of asking the German chancellor whom he represents, and what faith could be attached to the answer of the German chancellor when he makes it?

Mr. OWEN. None whatever; we are agreed as to that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, upon that point, repeating, I will ask what difference does it make what the German chancellor or any other German statesman states as to what he will accept in the way of terms of peace. Here is the question: The President has asked the German chancellor these questions. Will the President accept the answer of the German chancellor when it is made, if he accepts the President's terms, and says he represents the German people, will the President negotiate an armistice on the strength of such answers; and if not, what is the purpose of the President in asking the German chancellor the question?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator ought to be able to see that without requiring an answer upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator from Oklahoma. If he should answer the President that he accepts the 14 general propositions laid down by the President and all others that he has made, and if he should answer the President that they would agree to evacuate the conquered territory, what would the Senator from Oklahoma consider would be the result of these answers in arriving at an armistice?

Mr. OWEN. The answer involves unconditional surrender.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the exact issue between the Senator from Oklahoma and myself; and that is the point that I want to make in a few remarks.

Mr. OWEN. There is no issue between the Senator and myself, because he believes in the same thing substantially that I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no; I believe just the opposite on this point. The Senator believes that the outcome which I have just stated amounts to unconditional surrender. I think I can demonstrate that it amounts to a German victory.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator overlooks this issue which the President pointed out on September 27:

> Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the entire debate here on this proposition is based upon the disappointment that has been expressed that the President did not adhere to the position that he has heretofore taken.

Mr. OWEN. The President has not departed a hairbreadth from his position heretofore taken.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, the President asks three questions of the German chancellor, or, at least, two questions, and a statement which may produce an answer, all three of which may be answered in accordance with the President's terms; and if so answered, and if the President should concur with the Senator from Oklahoma, that those answers and the acceptance of them would amount to unconditional surrender, then the allies would have sacrificed the fruits of victory, for the reason, Mr. President, as I will point out more in detail, that they would leave Germany unconquered, in a stronger military, political, and moral position than she has ever been in since the war began, fighting upon her own soil, upon shortened lines, with a superb railroad system, and interior communications——

Mr. OWEN. She has an opportunity——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment—for supplies; and as against that nothing but the promise of the German chancellor to accept certain general conditions, which promise would amount to nothing, as the Senator from Oklahoma has just said.

Mr. OWEN. The German chancellor can not answer these questions either "yes" or "no" without destruction.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, I should like to have the faith the Senator from Oklahoma has.

Mr. OWEN. I will undertake to demonstrate that when the Senator concludes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the President, in the face of Germany's crimes and falsehoods, will undertake to bring about an armistice because the German chancellor offers to accept certain conditions, whatever they may be, then indeed would the world see the apotheosis of faith and innocence being led to the slaughter. The German chancellor may well say that Germany will evacuate every foot of allied territory. The President says: "He would not feel at liberty to propose a cessation of arms to the governments with which the Government of the United States is associated against the central powers so long as the armies of those powers are upon their soil." By this does the President mean that if the central powers evacuate the allied soil he will accede to the request of the German chancellor and "invite the belligerent States to send plenipotentiaries for the purpose of opening negotiations of peace"? If not, what is the purpose of the President in making this suggestion to Prince Maximilian; and if not, what will the attitude of the President be if the German Government immediately agrees to evacuate all of the territory which it has ravaged and pillaged and retire to its own frontiers?

The conception which the German Government has of the meeting of the plenipotentiaries of the belligerent States, which it asks the President to bring about and which the President, strange to say, is discussing with the German Government, is shown by the following curious passage from the speech of the German chancellor delivered to the Reichstag at the same time that he dispatched his message to the President of the United States:

The striking force—

He says—

which the Government has in its striving for peace depends on whether it has behind it the united, firm, and unshakable will of the people. Only when our enemies feel that the German people stand united back of their chosen leaders, then only can words become deeds.

I would like the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to pay particular attention to these quotations from the speech of the German chancellor:

At the peace negotiations the German Government will use its efforts to the end that treaties shall contain provisions concerning the protection of labor and insurance of laborers, which provision shall oblige the treaty-making States to institute in their respective lands within a prescribed time a minimum of similar, or at least equally efficient, institutions for the security of life and health as for the care of laborers in the case of illness, accident, or invalidism.

These are not the words of a conquered government. It throws an interesting light on the workings of the German mind. Evidently it is a sop to the German socialists. Thwarted for the present in the dream of a Pan Germany of arms, but never ceasing for a moment in its ultimate purpose, we here see the German effort to extend its propaganda and establish its policies, for such perversion to its own purposes hereafter as may seem expedient, when it would renew, if we fall into the trap that is set for us, its war of intrigue, to be followed by its war of arms against the peace and liberty of the world. We here see the curious conception in the mind of the German chancellor as he apparently already visualizes the great sitting down of the nations, Germany in equal status among them, to a conference table to which for the time being the contest, during the armistice of arms, will be transferred.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and my purpose in interrupting the Senator is to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that at our last meeting the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] gave notice that he would address the Senate to-day regarding the constitutionality of certain important features of the revenue bill. Assuming that he would have the opportunity to do so, he has given the press the contents of his speech. It is evident that if this discussion is to continue, the Senator, notwithstanding the notice, will be deprived of the opportunity of speaking upon a very important measure, so important, indeed, that I think the present discussion, which is largely political, might well be postponed until the Senator from Minnesota can comply with the notice he has given and give the Finance Committee the benefit of his views on that important question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I shall conclude my remarks in a few moments and give way to the Senator from Minnesota. In the meantime I appreciate the motive and the spirit of the interruption which was granted by my courtesy to the Senator from Colorado, who undertakes to use the privilege I granted him to interfere with me while I am making an address to the Senate. As to the importance of my remarks I reserve the right to decide that for myself and I do not necessarily accept the views of the Senator from Colorado, interjected in that way.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator entirely misinterprets me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think I did.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator did. I had no intention to offend the Senator. The Senator from Minnesota spoke to me a few moments ago regarding the fact that he had given this notice, and I told him I would——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I doubt very much whether the Senator from Minnesota requested or expected the Senator from Colorado to interrupt me in the manner in which he has done and imply that I should give way to another Senator. I resent it as utterly uncalled for and improper and not a part in any way of any responsibility which rests upon the Senator from Colorado in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield just now.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall have something to say then later.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was interrupted in the middle of a sentence. I was referring to the proposed conference of plenipotentiaries of the belligerent nations asked for by the chancellor of the German Empire and undertaking to show the idea that the German chancellor has in his mind as to the position he will be in and the purpose which the German Government has in view in that conference, with the tremendous prestige and power which Germany will possess in it, relating to the domestic affairs of her enemies, if her armies are left intact and entrenched upon her international boundary lines. Not content with preserving his empire intact, as will be the case if the evident purpose of these negotiations should be consummated, even in this hour he plans to compel, by the leverage of peace negotiations, agreements of the allied powers affecting their purely individual and domestic social and economic laws. The use which the German Empire would make of such an agreement, in an uninterrupted continuance of that international intrigue which sleeps neither day nor night, and is not resting even now while the President is carrying on his discussion with this arch-traitor of the ages, both in palliating her own domestic disturbances and in forwarding her propaganda among the varying political elements of her enemies, is quite plain. It has no essential bearing in the exchange of views now taking place except as defining and illuminating the mental attitude with which Germany makes this proposal.

If the incredible thing should happen, and the allies should agree to an armistice at the request of the President on the statement by the German chancellor that he speaks for the German people, as he undoubtedly does, and upon the retirement of the German Armies to the German frontier, and the promise of the German Government that it will accept the 14 propositions of the President and his later terms, as referred to in his message, Germany will be then far stronger from a military point of view than she is to-day or than she has been at any period of the war. She would be standing upon shortened lines, with her great and well-equipped army concentrated on her western frontier.

The allies, meanwhile, under the armistice, would have surrendered the military advantage which they now have in the constant pressure of successful attacks. Germany will have time to recover from her confusion, to reorganize those forces which have been at the front, to repair her supply and equipment, and to strengthen her fortifications and entrenchments.

If these negotiations are entered into and an armistice granted on the terms suggested by the President's inquiries of the German chancellor, Germany will be morally and politically immeasurably stronger than she was at the beginning of the war, or has been at any time since. Then, in deed and in truth, she would be fighting, after an interval of peace, a purely defensive battle, upon her own soil and for her own institutions, whatever those institutions may be. An armistice, whatever definition may be given to the word itself, in this case means an end of the war, and never again will the allies be able to renew, in cold blood, against Germany on her own soil, with her reorganized and rehabilitated army, with her incomparable interior lines of communication, with the renewed morale and devotion of her people, and the concentration of her troops upon a shortened battle front, this war of righteousness and liberty. The German morale will have been strengthened, the sympathy of her own people for their Government, and, in fact, of many other people now joining in the war against her, will be intensified in her behalf. The allied morale will have cooled; the great war machinery of the allied belligerent nations will have slowed down. Never again in this generation will that supreme momentum of devotion to cause, of sacrifice to the death, of settling once and forever the civilization of the world be recovered. It will be impossible to gear up again to a high pitch the financial, industrial, and commercial war organization of the allies. The weapons with which the conditions which are to follow after the war are to be shaped and determined will have been forged. They can not be changed. Germany will be unwhipped. From that day forth, with her reorganized forces she will pursue that plan, which she has never ceased to follow, to renew at the most vulnerable point of the world her war of conquest, rapine, and enslavement. For the allies, instead of entering into a millennium of security and peace for the culture of the better natures of mankind and the dwelling in happiness of the children of men—there will be, if they are to survive at all, an era of preparation for another war. Children will be reared, not in that easy security necessary for the soul's beauty and development, but in the constant and insidious menace of a struggle to protect life and liberty against a degenerate and evil power, still at large in the world. From the time of their birth until their eyes close in the death of old age men of the coming generations will see in front of them the specter of secret intrigue and the menace of an open war of conquest.

There is only one way in which this specter can be dispelled, and that is by the absolute and unqualified destruction of the power of this renegade nation. That, and that only, should be the answer of the President and of the allies to the insidious suggestion of the German Government. Then, when that has been accomplished, in the wisdom and mercy of the great powers of light and righteousness, Germany's place in the world will be fixed. Her power for evil will be destroyed; her criminals in high places will be restrained of their license.

The indemnification of Belgium, the righting of the wrongs of France, and the banishment of the German menace to the world will never be provided for by any guaranty in this program—which seems to attract so much support from those who act upon first impression without careful consideration of the ultimate results—that we should cease fighting and slow down our war machinery upon the condition that the German chancellor promises that he will on certain conditions withdraw troops from the conquered territory and place them on the German frontier. What provision is there in these suggestions for the indemnification of Belgium, the righting of the wrongs of France? When we meet in this conference of the plenipotentiaries and insist upon such reparation and Germany begins with the artifice which I have undertaken to describe, to dicker and inquire, and refuse, and decline to indemnify or to repair her wrongs, which undoubtedly will be Germany's attitude, what will the allies do? How are they going to compel Germany to carry out the 14 principles laid down by the President? They would have no power to do it. Germany could postpone and defy them, and there would not be left in the world enough spirit after an armistice to renew this bloody war. Once the armistice is granted the things we are fighting for will be settled and determined by the conditions that exist on that day.

The indemnification of Belgium, the righting of the wrongs of France, and the banishment of the German menace of the world will never be accomplished if our sole dependence is merely the word of the German people or of the German Government through whom they speak. There must be other guaranties, and there can be no other guaranty but the armies of the allies standing in triumph in Berlin either by conquest or by the unconditional surrender of the German people. If it is to be conceived that upon any possible answer of the German chancellor to the questions asked by the President our Chief Executive will request our allies to agree to any armistice with Germany short of her absolute surrender, it is to be hoped that under the divine guidance of an Almighty Providence the mighty powers of France and England, who have sustained this conflict for civilization through more than four years—in the midst of their ruins and their dead—will refuse to surrender the victory which is in sight.

Mr. President, I ask leave to incorporate as bearing upon this subject as a part of my remarks a brief article from the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, and an article by myself in the New York Times of June 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Manufacturers Record, Oct. 3, 1918.]

HELL WILL BE BUSY TRYING TO SAVE ITS ALLIES, GERMANY AND HER ALLIES, FROM PUNISHMENT.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INDIAN DEPREDATIONS,
Washington, September 28.

EDITOR MANUFACTURERS RECORD:

DEAR SIR: I read this morning in the Post your letter urging that the influence of this country be thrown against any premature or compromise peace with Bulgaria. I have not the article before me at this moment, but recollect clearly the substance of it, and hasten to congratulate you upon your promptness and soundness in giving every possible publicity to this view. The greatest menace confronting the United States and the allies now is not from any military source, but is the danger of a weak and compromise peace. The acceptance of anything short of absolute surrender of Germany and all of her allies would be one of those blunders which are worse than crimes, and would be a fearful waste of the lives and treasure which the allies have expended in this war.

With kind regards,
Very truly, yours, MILES POINDEXTER.

P. S.—The situation brings to mind the unwise policy of this Government in not having declared war against all of the allies of Germany. The notion that we should wage war against Germany and not against her allies, whose soldiers are fighting against us on both the eastern and western fronts, is so illogical that it is bound to lead to embarrassing situations and cripple our activities in the final adjustments at the conclusion of the war.

M. P.

The letter to which Mr. POINDEXTER thus so strongly refers was a cablegram which the editor of the Manufacturers Record felt justified in sending to the London Times on September 27. It was as follows:

"While the United States is not technically at war with Bulgaria, its people are at heart at war with Bulgaria and every other enemy of our European allies. From all parts of this country we are hearing of an overwhelming sentiment that there should be no peace parley of any kind with Germany or any of its allies until there has been an unconditional surrender of the armies and navies of Germany and all of its allies. Civilization can not permit an armistice or peace parley with assassins. The universal thought in America of every honest-hearted man and woman is for unconditional surrender by the criminals and adequate punishment afterwards. America is whole-souledly in this war to a finish."

This cable and some further comments upon the situation were sent out from Baltimore and rather widely published in the daily papers.

Our position has been that we should be at war technically as well as in reality with Bulgaria and Turkey. It seems to us to be a very grave mistake for this country to have permitted the minister from Bulgaria to remain in Washington while the troops of Bulgaria were fighting our allies and while Bulgarian troops were in the very armies that are fighting our own people, or else Bulgarian armies, by fighting our allies, were releasing for fighting against us the soldiers of Germany and Austria.

We can not conceive any diplomatic reason, or any reason in ordinary common sense, which has permitted the Bulgarian minister to remain in Washington and which has kept this country from declaring war against Turkey and Bulgaria. They have been two of the most unscrupulous powers engaged in this war. Bulgaria has been almost as vile as Turkey. Bulgaria has been without regard to any honor or integrity. It has cared not for the right, and it would just as lief fight on the side of the allies as on the side of Germany if it were sure the allies were going to win. Turkey, the murderer of a million or more Armenian Christians, the most atrocious nation except Germany which the world has known, is fighting to the limit of its strength against our allies, and yet we are at peace technically with both Turkey and Bulgaria.

We have no right to stand in such a position. It necessarily, as Senator POINDEXTER says, raises questions which must be embarrassing and must cripple our activities in the final adjustments at the conclusion of the war.

By what right at that time will we be able to say that Turkish power should be banished from Europe, or that Bulgaria and Turkey should share in the burden of paying the fearful cost of the war?

We are not at war with them. What right, therefore, will we have to sit at the peace table and help to dictate terms by which they shall bear their full share of punishment? Were we at war with them, as we should be, this Nation could have said to the allies we believe that there should be no acceptation of any terms of peace from Bulgaria or from Turkey except unconditional surrender, with the certainty of punishment for their crimes. But what right has America to say that when it is not at war with Bulgaria and Turkey?

It was for this reason that the Manufacturers Record, knowing the sentiment of the people of this country, cabled to the London Times its expression of opinion in regard to this situation.

We are glad to have Senator POINDEXTER'S wholly voluntary commendation of the position taken. From many others commendation equally as strong has come, and it is gratifying that throughout the country there is growing up a determination that Germany and all of its allies shall be made to unconditionally surrender, and that the flags of America and our allies shall float in triumph over the capitals of these criminal countries before there can be any terms of peace discussed.

We fully agree with Senator POINDEXTER that the greatest menace of the world is the tremendous effort that will be made to bring about "a weak peace, a peace of compromise."

Every power of hell and earth which can be controlled by Germany will be used to produce such a peace, and we may rest assured that hell will be very active in the campaign, for hell can ask no greater achievement than an inconclusive peace, or one which leaves Germany and its criminals unpunished.

Hell knows that this would mean the continuation of hell on earth and another war in the not distant future which would surpass this war.

Unconditional surrender is the only term which should ever be used in connection with peace, and with the definite determination that every criminal leader in this great conflict shall on the gallows pay with his life the penalty of his crimes, and that the nations guilty of bringing this war upon the world shall be made to pay the full cost to the allies. Nothing else would satisfy justice. Anything else would be a blot upon civilization for centuries to come.

[From the New York Times, Sunday, June 9, 1918.]

SENATOR POINDEXTER URGES ACTION IN RUSSIA—WANTS MILITARY EXPEDITION CHIEFLY OF JAPANESE TROOPS—UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT, HE SAYS, HAS MISCONCEIVED THE BOLSHEVIKI.

[By MILES POINDEXTER, United States Senator from Washington.]

The collapse of Russia and its assimilation by Germany, acting through the latter's Bolshevist agents, opens a new act with completely changed scenes and conditions in the world war. Its effect is the dominating factor in the great struggle now hanging in the balance on the so-called western front, in France. With the great armies intrenched from the mountains to the sea and to all appearances limited in their action to the physical application of the accumulated driving force of either side, the master strategy of the war lies elsewhere.

We may put aside for the moment consideration of the turmoil between the conflicting and heterogeneous nationalities in the Austrian Empire, and the opportunity for wise statesmanship by the Government of the United States in taking up openly and forcefully the struggle for liberty of the enslaved Serbians, Czechs, Slovaks, and others, thus adding to the material as well as the moral force of the allies the tremendous organized influence of these people and their friends in and out of Austria.

Greater by far than this in its significance and consequences is the question as to what disposition is to be made of Russia, its 170,000,000 of people, and its boundless resources of food, fuel, and metals. In modern war the labor and sacrifices, endurance, and heroism of millions undergoing the hardships and sufferings of campaigns for weeks and months and years are required for the decision of battles, while the decision of such a question as the saving and rehabilitation of Russia, by means of a great armed and civil force, accompanied by military and diplomatic officials, may be made in a brief conference of the Cabinet and pass almost unnoticed in the news dispatches of the day. And yet upon that decision and upon the turning of the path here or there the outcome of the war and the future of civilization may depend. All of the sacrifices of the brave men and women of the allied nations may be rendered vain by a few easy blunders of their rulers in the higher questions of strategy and statesmanship.

The eyes of the whole world are looking at the swaying combatants in France, and desperation almost characterizes the struggle of the allies there. What would be the effect upon that scene if the news agencies of the world carried to the German command the information that an army of 2,000,000 ably led, thoroughly armed and equipped Japanese were advancing westward in Siberia, accompanied by French, British, and American troops and officials, under international guaranties of good faith toward Russia and the allied cause? It is certain that it would have an instant and powerful effect, not only upon the morale, but upon the physical military forces of the German Army. Such a word, spreading like the impalpable ether from man to man and regiment to regiment of the Germans, overwhelming them with the consciousness that, however the struggle might go against a powerful foe in their front, there was slowly, but surely, advancing upon them a powerful and thoroughly organized foe upon their undefended rear, would unquestionably discourage many of that army and greatly weaken its spirit. Very soon, too, as such an allied army advanced in Siberia, it would be necessary for Germany to begin to retransport across Europe and Asia troops, cannon, supplies which she so recently laboriously moved from the east to the western front. As the allied forces advanced in Russia the drain upon German resources to meet them would each day become greater, and so each day would weaken the power which she would be able to hurl against her enemies in France. Even though this weakening might be comparatively small and of limited extent, yet when brought to bear upon a struggle so evenly balanced as is that in France, it might be absolutely decisive of the result, and consequently of all the issues of the war, boundless and inexpressible and unlimited as they are in their effect upon the human race.

ELEMENTS OF SUPPORT.

Such an influence, however, of the rehabilitation of Russia, through an allied military force as the nucleus of a rehabilitated Russian Army, would not be small or limited in its extent. The intelligent elements of the Russian Empire, now helpless and bound hand and foot under the tyranny of German influence and Bolshevist tyranny, would rally to this movement and make of it the nucleus of a new Russian Army and the means of the redemption of Russian civilization and freedom.

As early as February, 1918, the Japanese Government, whose officials are by reason of their proximity and more direct interest better informed of movements and conditions in Asiatic Russia than are those of the western nations, made inquiries of their allies in the war as to the attitude the latter would take toward the sending of a Japanese force to stem the growing tide of German influence and to check the atrocities of Bolshevism in Siberia. Great Britain and France, through their premiers and foreign ministers, gave their approval to the suggested enterprise. The United States, however, by reason of its interests in the Pacific and also by reason of the dependence of the allies upon this Government for food, munitions, and finance, as well as troops, was in a position to control the policy to be pursued. Unfortunately for America and the world our Government, instead of welcoming with grateful appreciation the magnificent opportunity and the generous offer of Japan, interposed an objection to the suggestion.

One can readily appreciate the private feelings of a sensitive people which, in such a situation, could not be publicly expressed, at this attitude on the part of the American Government. Japan, as demonstrated by her every act in this war, has been faithful to her obligations as an ally of Great Britain and coworker with France and America in opposing the effort of Germany to enslave the world. Considering Japan's interest in the Pacific as well as her opportunities, a selfish course on her part might well have dictated the conservation of her armies and resources, so that she would come out of the war fresh, vigorous, and unexhausted. When, no doubt, with peculiar interests of her own in view, as well as those of her allies, she offered to equip, transport, and maintain an expedition in Siberia, realizing as she does the vital benefit this would be to the allied cause, it is not difficult to imagine her disappointment, if not humiliation, not only at the failure to accept the proffered assistance of the Government of the United States, but at our positive objection interposed thereto.

On May 17, 1918, the Associated Press sent out the following dispatch from Tokyo: "The military agreement between Japan and China has caused increased attention to be given to the question of intervention in Siberia. It is understood that both Great Britain and France are actively favoring intervention, the former because of the danger of the spread of German influence, and both Great Britain and France because they are convinced that it would hasten the winning of the war. The General Staff is ready for any action that may be ordered, but the Government has not announced any decision in the matter. The best information here is that intervention is not likely until it is favored by the United States."

Speaking in the lower house of the Japanese Parliament in the latter part of March, 1918, Mr. Mochidzuki made the following statement: "As regards America, she is believed to have signified her disapproval to the Japanese Government for two reasons, namely, that though she does not take exception in principle to Japan undertaking to maintain peace and order in Siberia single-handed, she does not think Siberia is in such danger, and that Japanese premature intervention in Siberia will have the effect of driving a majority of the Russians into the arms of the Germans."

As to these objections Mr. Mochidzuki says: "It is superfluous to say that intimate relations exist between Japan and America, and I am not behind the foreign minister in any desire for their relations growing in intimacy. I must, however, point out that the German menace through Siberia is by no means felt in the same measure in this country and in America, which is situated on the other side of the Pacific some 5,000 miles away. Let us suppose that Canada, which is contiguous to America on a frontier extending for 3,000 miles in length, had concluded a separate peace with Germany and enemy prisoners of from 100,000 to 150,000 threatened to invade America. In such a case would America decide to dispatch troops to cope with this serious situation only after Japan's acquiescence in her project was obtained? * * * As regards the second point of anxiety raised by America, that Japan's premature intervention in Siberia will drive the Russians into the arms of the Germans, I can only say that if no helping hand be extended to the Russians at the present time they will soon be crouching on their knees before the Germans by reason of their unpreparedness and impotence."

DELAY AND DIPLOMACY.

These interpellations of the foreign minister by Mr. Mochidzuki were greeted with cheers in the Japanese House of Representatives. It may be pertinent to add the following words used on that occasion by Mr. Mochidzuki: "The foreign minister is apt to make use of the words 'the most deliberate consideration,' but it must be remembered that 'deliberate consideration' has always been the last place of refuge for incompetent diplomatists."

On the same occasion this clear-headed and well-informed statesman said that Russia was "a mere baby in the hands of the German giant," and that the German menace was spreading practically unopposed to the East. He also quoted the minister of war to the effect that "100,000 German war prisoners are being armed in Siberia east of the Urai. That German influence is growing in those districts is evident from the fact that Irkutsk, where the Bolsheviki and the anti-Bolsheviki were practically matched in influence about December and January, has at last passed under the sway of the Bolsheviki, and, as you are well aware, an army corps of German and Austrian war prisoners is in process of formation there under the training of German officers."

It must be borne in mind that these official statements quoted from Japan's war minister obtained from Gen. Semenoff and other loyal Russians standing with a small force against the traitorous Bolsheviki were made in March, and that this German so-called "peaceful conquest" of Russia, even to the Pacific, has been steadily proceeding ever since. The military success of the Bolsheviki and the firmness with which they have carried out their bloody policy can not be explained in any quality of the undisciplined and ignorant and vicious anarchists and tyrannical socialists who compose their forces and their so-called leaders; it is to be found in the trained and educated German officers among the million or more prisoners east and west of the Ural, who have been armed by these Russian enemies of the allies with weapons taken from the disbanded Russian Army.

About the same time as the statement just quoted Viscount Motono, Japanese minister of foreign affairs, answering interpellations of Mr. Sugita on the last day of the session of the Diet, said:

"As I stated a few minutes ago, the chaotic state into which the Russian situation was thrown caused the question to be discussed very earnestly at home and abroad. In order to give categorical answers to some of the questions put by Mr. Sugita, however, I would have to disclose details of the exchange of views that has taken place between the Japanese Government and the other allied Governments on the subject, which I must refrain from doing, as I regard the time as still premature for such an announcement. Mr. Sugita asked whether it was too late for Japan to take action in Siberia. The Government is, of course, called upon to make a good choice of the time for dispatching troops to Siberia when such a course is deemed imperative. I can not, however, make any definite statement as to when such an expedition will be sent. Some anxiety has been expressed by the member as to whether the supplies in Siberia and war materials in the Far East would not fall into enemy hands. This is, needless to say, a very serious question, over which much apprehension is entertained by the Japanese and other allied Governments. On this point the Government is on the alert and intends to take opportune steps for preventing the supplies falling into hostile hands. Mr. Sugita asked what feelings, favorable or unfavorable, prevail among the Russians regarding Japan. Judging from the reports I have thus far received, it appears that the Russians as a whole do not regard Japan with hostile eyes."

Under the influence of the United States Government the French and British Governments did not urge or insist upon the acceptance of the Japanese suggestion for armed intervention against the Germans and the Bolsheviki. Those Governments stated their desire (and it may be said it was in fact their necessity) to act in harmony with the United States on the question. Before surrendering their strong views, however, they attempted to influence the United States in favor of this most vital and important move. As late as May 25, 1918, the newspapers in Washington City published semiofficial statements as follows: "During the last week the British and French have both urged a change in this country's attitude toward possible military cooperation with Russians and Japanese in the effort to rehabilitate Russia to a spirited defense against the German invaders." This Government, however, insisted upon its objection to any kind of intervention.

AID TO BOLSHEVIKI.

It seems, however, notwithstanding the deadly warfare which the Bolsheviki have carried on against the allies, that this Government is even now conferring with various misguided organizations on the proposition of sending further financial and material support, munitions, food, and other supplies without military protection to Russia, and this in the face of the fact that fighting has already taken place between the Bolsheviki and the allied legation guards at Blagovestchensk; that supplies already sent to Russia at great sacrifice by the allies have been turned over directly to Germany or wasted and destroyed, and that it was necessary for the British and Japanese to land troops at Vladivostok to protect the property of the allied governments and people in that port.

The chief objection made by the administration to Japanese and allied military intervention in force in Russia is stated to be a fear of antagonizing the Rusisan people and driving them to an alliance with Germany. As stated by Mr. Mochidzuki, "If no helping hand be extended to the Russians at the present time they will soon be crouching on their knees before the Germans." As a matter of fact, those who have not been actually enslaved, murdered, mutilated, or starved into weakness by the Huns or their Bolshevist agents are already in the situation described by Mr. Mochidzuki. But, aside from that, it does not seem to be generally known that actual war is already being carried on between some of the allies and the Bolsheviki in Russia. In the issue of the Japan Weekly Chronicle of March 21, 1918, it is stated:

"According to telegrams received in many quarters the fighting between the Bolsheviki on one side and the Cossacks and legation guards of the allies on the other at Blagovestchensk became very serious on the 12th instant, when the Bolsheviki were reinforced by about 1,000 troops who arrived from the direction of Khabarovsk. The chief body of the Cossacks was ultimately obliged to retreat and many inhabitants sought refuge elsewhere. The casualties among the Japanese, so far ascertained, were 1 killed and 3 injured, but it is suspected that out of 150 Japanese residents many were either butchered or their property was looted. * * * In this battle the Cossacks fought with desperate vigor and held their own against the Bolsheviki even after the latter were reinforced. Their ultimate defeat is believed to be due to further reinforcements the Bolsheviki obtained in the shape of over 2,000 German prisoners of war. * * * The news is published as official."

The same condition exists at Vladivostok, where merchandise, largely shipped from America for Russian use against the Germans, of the value of $70,000,000, has been captured by the Bolsheviki, after resistance by the loyal Russian authorities, and undoubtedly will sooner or later fall into the hands of the Germans, or be used by the Bolsheviki under their direction, unless they are stopped by allied forces. There was also at this port a considerable quantity of property belonging to allied nationals which the Bolsheviki sought to seize. This was only prevented by the landing of allied troops, and the property is now protected against the Bolsheviki by a Japanese military guard.

LINES TO AMERICA.

The attitude of the Bolsheviki toward the United States is indicated by the fact that John Reed, a socialist and representative of the Russian Bolsheviki, was arrested in Philadelphia on the night of May 31 while trying to make a soap-box speech on a street corner and was held on a charge of inciting to riot and a breach of the peace. The connection of the Russian Bolsheviki and the American Industrial Workers of the World, composed of revolutionists, yeggmen, dynamiters, and direct-action socialists, is well known. These people are carrying on war against the allies not only in Russia but in the United States. The overthrow of Russia and its surrender to Germany was largely brought about by American social revolutionists, many of whom, strange to say, by concealing for the time being their real purposes, managed to go to Russia from this country under the auspices of the Federal administration. In the words of an official investigator of high intelligence and standing, "more than half of these men whom this Government was thus sending over were anarchists whose luggage was loaded down with anarchistic literature of all kinds, with editorials from the pro-German press and with speeches of a pacifist Senator."

As indicating how much friendship exists between these people and the Government of the United States, or at least the institutions of the United States, it is but necessary to read the testimony introduced in the trial now proceeding of the 112 Industrial Workers of the World in Chicago. On May 24 Joseph Burdall testified that G. J. Bourg, a defendant, and other Germans who gathered at the Milwaukee hall, declared "if they were drafted into the Army they would shoot, but they would choose their marks carefully. Our bullets will not strike down the Germans, but will pierce the necks of the American officers. We can put the American Army on the bum as quickly and effectively as we can wreck a construction company plant."

These are the elements nominally in control of the Russian Government. Wonder has been expressed that men of this kind could maintain themselves so long in power. The answer is that they are mere marionettes, and that the strings are pulled by the German Government; that their so-called military forces are directed by trained German officers, and their ruthless policy of blood and iron, by which they have wiped out whole populations and cast their mutilated corpses chained together into the Black Sea, has its inspiration and its direction from the same source which committed identical atrocities in France and Belgium.

The error of the American Government apparently is due, in part at least, to a misconception of the character of the Bolsheviki. In view of the destruction which has been wrought to food, crops, munitions, and ships by them in the United States, and the disclosed conspiracy between them and the German Government to slow up war production in this country, and the actual war and bloody atrocities which they are carrying on against those Russians who remain friendly to the allies, and against allied legations and citizens, it seems strange that our Government should persist in calling these pronounced and vicious enemies our friends and in bestowing official compliments upon them from the very highest source in the country. As a matter of fact, the Russian people would welcome the advent of an allied force, making war against the Germans and the Bolsheviki, as a deliverer. The Russian people are now helpless. They are disorganized, without leadership, cowed, and terrified under the cruelties of the German-directed Bolshevist government—starved and in despair.

An allied force, consisting chiefly, of course, of Japanese troops, accompanied by sufficient forces of England, France, and America to give it an international allied standing, thoroughly equipped with commercial, diplomatic, industrial, and agricultural representatives and officials, able to stand alone in the midst of hostile Bolshevist and German influences, equipped and prepared with materials and knowledge to instruct the Russian people and rehabilitate the transportation, industry, and agriculture of Russia as fast as occupied, would constitute a refuge and a nucleus around which would gather the helpless and oppressed people of Russia, glad of an opportunity to escape the butchery of the combined Bolsheviki and the million and a half German and Austrian prisoners whom they have released and armed to prey upon their own country. This force of loyal Russians, organized as fast as possible under allied leadership, armed and equipped, would rapidly grow into a formidable army, adding its strength to that of the allies, and forming a basis for the reestablishment of law, liberty, and organized government in what once was Russia.

BASES OF SYMPATHY.

The pitiful and desperate effort which the loyal people of Russia are making under the leadership of such men as Gen. Semenoff, the Cossack chief, with the small forces which they are able to get together out of the abyss into which Russia has been plunged, should be a powerful appeal to the sympathy of the allies and particularly of America, and, it seems, should arouse us from our indifference to the situation and induce us, at least, to accept the splendid offer of our great ally, Japan, to go to their rescue with sufficient forces to free them from their oppressions and restore their country. If our sympathy for our former ally is not sufficient to induce us to act it would seem that self-interest and the opportunity to raise again a new foe against the German tyrant would do so. However, instead of going to the rescue of the oppressed Russian people to free them from the yoke of the Bolsheviki and Industrial Workers of the World, through whom flows the malice of the German tyrant, who is willing deliberately to wipe out of existence whole peoples in order to make room and loot for himself, our Government has been carrying on friendly exchanges with the Bolshevist criminals.

Lenine and Trotzky, who have such far-reaching influence with the American Government, notwithstanding their frightful cruelties to the Russian people and the abyss into which they have plunged that country in the interest of Germany, and notwithstanding the ruthless war of arson and murder which their associates in America have carried on against the United States, have been in the employment of the German Government since 1905. In that year Germany financed these scoundrels to create a revolution in Russia. After the failure of the attempt Trotzky ran a motion-picture theater on the Barbary Coast in San Francisco, and also founded a Bolshevist club on Jefferson Square in San Francisco, over which David Milder, a radical pro-German direct-action socialist, presided. They were friends and intimate associates of a pro-German Russian of the name of Selig Schulberg, living in San Francisco, and of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman. The further connection of these people, and the ramification of their plot against the United States, with von Bernstorff, von Papen, the People's Council of America, the Industrial Workers of the World, and the Russian Bolshevist government, are well known to investigators and ample evidence is at hand, but it is unnecessary to detail it here, as it is demonstrated by many obvious facts.

Not only do the little bands of Russians, who here and there are attempting to make a stand in Russia against this tyranny, appeal to us, but delegations representing them, at the risk of their lives, have escaped the Bolsheviki and visited this country, seeking that allied intervention and military assistance which we have so strangely denied even when offered to us. They have announced that this Government could organize large forces of loyal Russians in this country to join with Japan against the Bolsheviki and the Germans.

At a subcommittee meeting of the Japanese House of Representatives on March 15 Lieut. Gen. Oshima, minister of war, made the following statement in reply to a question:

"The number of enemy prisoners of war in the districts east of Lake Baikal is estimated at 104,000, while there are some 60,000 prisoners west of that place (it will be noted that this relates only to prisoners in Siberia and not in Russia proper). As regards the conditions west of Irkutsk nothing definite is as yet known. The above-mentioned prisoners have a large supply of arms, as reported in the papers. In the regions east of Baikal the moderates have greater influence than the Bolsheviki, and Gen. Semenoff is actively engaged in military operations at the head of 1,000 moderate troops. * * * The influence of the Bolsheviki is gradually growing in Siberia. * * * Should the Bolsheviki start a systematic activity, with the support of the Germans and Austrians, a serious situation would surely be created. * * * War stores supplied by Russia's allies now lying at Vladivostok amount to 70,000,000 yen in value and consist chiefly of explosives, gunpowder, guns, rifles, and ammunition."

In reply to a question put by a member concerning the report that two army corps of German prisoners of war were in process of organization in Siberia, the war minister is quoted by the Japan Weekly Chronicle as saying that "though no definite report had been received in official quarters, it was tolerably certain that some project was contemplated by the German prisoners of war."

In an editorial in the same paper of March 7, 1918, it is stated that "the Government is apparently paying due attention to the spread of German influence to the East and the outrageous acts of the Bolsheviki, and it is believed that the authorities are making efforts to promote both the interests of the nations and the peace of the Far East."

SUPPLIES AT MUKDEN.

China has collected 2,500,000 rifles, 80 guns, and 40 machine guns at Mukden. Japan has supplied arms as well as troops to assist Gen. Semenoff in the stand he is making. The Japanese Osaka Mainichi states that the "German current is fast finding its way to Siberia." It refers to various incidents of recent occurrence to show that "the Bolsheviki are determined to assist the Germans in the work of bringing the anti-German element among the Russians under German sway * * * and that if these Bolsheviki are determined to do the bidding of the Berlin Government acting under instructions from the Leninite Government, it will be an easy thing for Germany to bring the whole of Siberia under her sway."

Even as early as March 21, 1918, it was stated that official information had been received in Japan that Germany was organizing two army corps from the prisoners of war to meet the expected Japanese expedition; that the organization of one of these corps was actually in process at Irkutsk and that 130 officers had already arrived there from Krasnoyarsk. The Japan Weekly Chronicle of March 21, 1918, states that large numbers of German officer prisoners were arriving at Irkutsk in disguise; that field guns and armored motor cars were in transit from European Russia; that a Russian colonel, president of the detention camp at Irkutsk, received telegraphic instructions to organize armies of prisoners of which Austrians constituted one-third, and to provide accommodations for 30,000 cavalrymen in the prisoners' camp; that his son was offered the command of the automobile corps; and that German and Austrian prisoners were arriving in large numbers in the disguise of miners. On the authority of the Japanese War Department it was stated in the Japanese Mainichi that the French legation at Peking had lent four field guns, with some soldiers, to Gen. Semenoff to oppose the Bolsheviki and the German prisoners; that the British embassy had lent him two field guns and two machine guns, while Japan had supplied him with arms. "Thus efforts are being made," says the Mainichi, "to prevent the Bolsheviki from being made use of by the Germans. Germany's activity is appalling."

These are the desperate efforts being made by the available representatives of our allies to stem this rapidly moving German occupation, assimilation, and organization of Russia, with its 170,000,000 of people, its 34,600,000 men between the ages of 18 and 44, and its material resources whose possession by the Germans, Lord Robert Cecil says, will enable them to carry on war indefinitely against the rest of the world. In the meantime the United States not only fails to cooperate but discourages the action of our allies for fear of offending the Bolsheviki, and even talks of sending further supplies to those outlaws.

Japan has available 13,000,000 men between the ages of 18 and 44. They are men of discipline, courage, and endurance. Through her great subsidized steamship companies, supplemented by private shipowners, Japan is prepared to transport, without delay, an army to Siberia. The question has been raised as to the possibility of moving such an army to the west. A railroad already in existence stretches from Vladivostok to the western front in France. Russia transported over it a great army to Manchuria in the Japanese War. Japan in the same war transported an army into Manchuria. With American aid of railroad engineers and finance this railroad can quickly be equipped and operated for the transportation of allied troops. The movement of such an army might be slow, but it would be sure and steady, and its effect as soon as put in motion would be instantaneous upon the Germans on the western front.

This is the opportunity which knocks at our door and which, if not embraced, may pass forever. Germany is already enlisting troops, according to a dispatch in the Dorpater Zeitung, from Zurich, in Livonia, Courland, and the Baltic Provinces. With Machiavellian hypocrisy she says: "It is but natural that the children of the provinces freed from Maximalist tyranny should contribute to increase German effectiveness." Prof. Rohrbach, the German historian, lecturing a few days ago in Berlin, said that Russia was "a mere geographical conception and nothing more, and it will never be anything else. Its powers of cohesion, reorganization, and reconstruction are gone forever. * * * The nation no longer exists save as an inchoate mass." He denominates what is left of Russia as "Residue Russia," and proposes to organize the population of the border States as German subjects, asserting that the remainder, while huge in area, is "politically, economically, financially, and militarily weak—a stupid, apathetic State of peasants." The Germans are already in absolute control of these border States, of the Black Sea, and the area around the Caspian, and their influence is established as far as Central Asia.

As Mr. Mochidzuki says: "It may be some time before India's sleeves catch fire, but the flames burning in Siberia are spreading so fast that Japan's eyebrows are about to be scorched."

While this conflagration is spreading around the world, are we to refuse to intervene because of fear of offending the Bolsheviki, who have perpetrated against the allies and civilization the most colossal treason of all time?

It is one of those moments in the life of a nation when a wrong step by the leaders at the branching of the road takes us further and further away from the destiny which we all desire. It is the time of high decision which, if wrong, may render vain all the noble sacrifices and efforts of a people.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the leader of the Republicans in this body, has charged the President of the United States with contradicting himself in the queries to Chancellor Maximilian. He expresses his great regret that the President does not stand firmly upon the positions which he has heretofore stated in relation to the German and Austrian Governments, and he enlarges upon and justifies his charge of contradiction by showing what he describes as an inconsistency of position. There is no inconsistency whatever in the President's attitude. The President has not changed his position a particle. A proper and a careful reading of the note of the German chancellor and the authorized query through the Secretary of State will clearly demonstrate my statement and completely justify the President, even from the standpoint of the view of the Senator from Massachusetts, who wishes to see an unconditional surrender. Without reading, I insert the German note and in reply Mr. Lansing's note:

The Secretary of State makes public the following communications:

[From the chargé d'affaires ad interim of Switzerland in charge of German interests in the United States.]

DEPARTMENT OF GERMAN INTERESTS.

LEGATION OF SWITZERLAND,
Washington, D. C., October 6, 1918.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to transmit herewith, upon instructions from my Government, the original text of a communication from the German Government, received by this legation late this afternoon from the Swiss foreign office.

An English translation of this communication is also inclosed. The German original text, however, is alone to be considered as authoritative.

Please accept, Mr. President, the assurances of my highest consideration.

F. OEDERLIN,
Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of Switzerland, in charge of German interests in United States.

Mr. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States,
Washington.

THE GERMAN NOTE.

[Inclosure.]

Translation of communication from German Government to the President of the United States, as transmitted by the chargé d'affaires ad interim of Switzerland on October 6, 1918:

The German Government requests the President of the United States of America to take steps for the restoration of peace, to notify all belligerents of this request, and to invite them to delegate plenipotentiaries for the purpose of taking up negotiations. The German Government accepts, as a basis for the peace negotiations, the program laid down by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of January 8, 1918, and in his subsequent pronouncements, particularly in his address of September 27, 1918. In order to avoid further bloodshed the German Government requests to bring about the immediate conclusion of a general armistice on land, on water, and in the air.

MAX, PRINCE OF BADEN,
Imperial Chancellor.

MR. LANSING'S NOTE.

From the Secretary of State to the chargé d'affaires of Switzerland:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
October 8, 1918.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge, on behalf of the President, your note of October 6, inclosing a communication from the German Government to the President; and I am instructed by the President to request you to make the following communication to the imperial German chancellor:

"Before making reply to the request of the Imperial German Government, and in order that that reply shall be as candid and straightforward as the momentous interests involved require, the President of the United States deems it necessary to assure himself of the exact meaning of the note of the imperial chancellor. Does the imperial chancellor mean that the Imperial German Government accepts the terms laid down by the President in his address to the Congress of the United States on the 8th of January last and in subsequent addresses and that its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon the practical details of their application?

"The President feels bound to say with regard to the suggestion of an armistice that he would not feel at liberty to propose a cessation of arms to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated against the central powers so long as the armies of those powers are upon their soil. The good faith of any discussion would manifestly depend upon the consent of the central powers immediately to withdraw their forces everywhere from invaded territory.

"The President also feels that he is justified in asking whether the imperial chancellor is speaking merely for the constituted authorities of the Empire who have so far conducted the war. He deems the answers to these questions vital from every point of view."

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

ROBERT LANSING.

Mr. FREDERICK OEDERLIN,
Chargé d'Affaires of Switzerland, ad interim, in charge of German interests, in the United States.

I call the attention of the Senate to the vital points only. The chancellor says:

The German Government accepts, as a basis for the peace negotiations, the program laid down by the President of the United States—

And so forth.

The President, observing that that language is equivocal, allows a query to be put that will disclose its hypocrisy. It is equivocal in this, that the statement that the President's program is accepted as a basis of peace negotiation may mean either that the principles laid down are now fully accepted as a basis of peace or it may mean that the program will be accepted as a thesis for discussion and negotiation. The President does not permit the double tongue of Germany going before the world and deceiving either the people of the entente or the people of the Teutonic allies, and he permits a query to be extended the double-tongued chancellor that will utterly confound him.

Does the imperial chancellor mean that the Imperial German Government accepts the terms laid down by the President in his address to the Congress of the United States on the 8th of January last and in subsequent addresses, and that its object in entering into discussion would be only to agree upon the practical details of their application?

Does the German and Austrian Governments accept in honest truth the principle of abandoning the divine right to rule and accept the entire democratic program? If it does, this war may be soon ended. The Hohenzollern government can not do that and maintain its military power over the German people another day. The German chancellor dare not answer yes, and he can not answer no to any of a dozen questions vital to maintain dynastic power involved in the President's democratic program.

The President, in the next instance, refuses to consider the question of an armistice and will not permit the Germans, as far as he is concerned, the convenient and comfortable opportunity to retire from the battle line extended throughout Europe and where the German forces are under constant pressure and are crumbling. He will not even suggest to our allies that they consider any armistice while the German troops are on the soil of the allies in France, Belgium, Italy, Serbia, Montenegro, Roumania, Russia, Poland——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose the German chancellor should answer, "I represent the German people," and should also answer, "I agree to accept the 14 conditions laid down in your address of January 8, 1918. We will remove our army from foreign soil just as rapidly as we can do so." What position then will we be in, under the suggestions made in the note of the President, to say our armies will still press forward?

Mr. OWEN. I should be glad to be permitted to make my reply to Senator LODGE connectedly and not have it interjected with questions until I get through with it and then answer questions, but I will answer the Senator's question now.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should be pleased to have the Senator's view on that point. What would he then do?

Mr. OWEN. The answer is that this query of the President's is a refusal to consider an armistice under any conditions until the German troops are back within their own country, and no suggestion that he would even then permit it.

Mr. McCUMBER. But as long as the chancellor says "We will immediately remove from the foreign soil," would not the President be compelled to say, "We will allow you to withdraw in peace"?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely there is no foundation whatever for any such theory; on the contrary it is a flat denial. The President of the United States has said to these leaders moreover, that their word is absolutely worthless; that they are "incapable of covenanted peace." He says to them now by necessary implication that they do not represent the German people.

Mr. McCUMBER. If their word is absolutely worthless, then why does the President ask what their word is with reference to representing the German people?

Mr. OWEN. As I said to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], that question need not be answered on this floor. The necessary implication of this communication is that when the President permits the query to be made whether the imperial chancellor is speaking MERELY for the constituted authorities of the empire who have so far conducted the war, it must be taken in connection with what he said on the 27th of September.

I insert in the RECORD, without reading, that part of the President's address on September 27 which precedes and which follows immediately the quotation made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who did not put in all that the President said in that connection and omitted what I regard as of vital importance:

The air was clear about us. We saw things in their full, convincing proportions as they were; and we have seen them with steady eyes and unchanging comprehension ever since. We accepted the issues of the war as facts, not as any group of men either here or elsewhere had defined them, and we can accept no outcome which does not squarely meet and settle them. Those issues are these:

Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force?

Shall strong nations be free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and interest?

Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force or by their own will and choice?

Shall there be a common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations or shall the strong do as they will and the weak suffer without redress?

Shall the assertion of right be haphazard and by casual alliance or shall there be a common concert to oblige the observance of common rights?

No man, no group of men, chose these to be the issues of the struggle. They are the issues of it; and they must be settled—by no arrangement or compromise or adjustment of interests, but definitely and once for all and with a full and unequivocal acceptance of the principle that the interest of the weakest is as sacred as the interest of the strongest.

This is what we mean when we speak of a permanent peace, if we speak sincerely, intelligently, and with a real knowledge and comprehension of the matter we deal with.

We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the governments of the central empires, because we have dealt with them already and have seen them deal with other governments that were parties to this struggle, at Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest. They have convinced us that they are without honor and do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principle but force and their own interest. We can not "come to terms" with them. They have made it impossible. The German people must by this time be fully aware that we can not accept the word of those who forced this war upon us. We do not think the same thoughts or speak the same language of agreement.

It is of capital importance that we should also be explicitly agreed that no peace shall be obtained by any kind of compromise or abatement of the principles we have avowed as the principles for which we are fighting. There should exist no doubt about that.

Is the chancellor "MERELY" representing the same authorities above described as "without honor" and who have made it "impossible" for sensible men to deal with them? The same criminals described as "incapable of covenanted peace," and does the chancellor accept the President's principles as a sound basis which describes the chancellor's Government as "impossible" to deal with and "incapable of covenanted peace."

There are 60,000 German prisoners in Berlin under machine guns as prisoners now, unwilling to fight, dominated by the war lords who have control of the military establishment of the German Empire. The whole German and Austrian people are "subjects." The chancellor can not and dare not answer this question. If he does, he exposes his hypocrisy. The German chancellor said:

The German Government accepts, as a basis for the peace negotiations, the program laid down by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of January 8, 1918, and in his subsequent pronouncements, particularly in his address of September 27, 1918.

The chancellor did not intend really to accept the principles laid down, and now he is caught by his own craft and compelled to say to the German people as well as to the world that he did not intend to agree to those principles. He and his associates can not agree to them and survive as a governing power of the German or of the Austrian people. They intended when their tender of peace was offered and rejected to say, "We asked peace on Wilson's own terms" and were denied. If they now say, "We do not accept your terms finally," they are exposed in their hypocrisy, which was intended to mislead the nations to whom this was addressed as well as the German people inside their own lines. They can not answer "yes" and they dare not answer "no." An armistice is out of the question. They must reply that they do not represent the German people by the consent of the German people, but that they are governing the German people under the principle of divine right, maintained by heredity, exercised by force, and treating the German people as subjects and calling the German people subjects. Whatever their reply, we know the fact, and the President has made no answer.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I think the Senator and myself are in absolute accord as to what ought to be done, and I hope that we are both in absolute accord as to what the President intends to do, but I confess that I am afraid the chancellor will answer, "Yes; I represent the German people," and in addition to that he will answer, "Yes; we will agree to the terms laid down in your speech of January 8, 1918." What is troubling me is what position we will then be in——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator need not be afraid——

Mr. McCUMBER. Because, it seems to me, if he makes those two statements in the affirmative, in honor we would be compelled to allow them to retreat from the conquered territory.

Mr. OWEN. Not at all; an adequate guaranty would be required to carry out their agreement which they can not give without surrender. They dare not agree to the Wilson terms, and they will not make the guaranties required by civilization until they are well beaten on the battle field.

President Wilson's query does not in the slightest change his sound position, but it will suffice to show the hypocrisy of the central empires and prevent their stimulating the morale of Germany and Austria. I favor unconditional surrender and reparation for the damages inflicted on the allies and the end of the dynasties of the Hohenzollerns and Hapsburgs.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he will allow me to have printed in the RECORD without taking time to read it a few of the telegrams that I have received demanding unconditional surrender.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILFLEY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

DEVILS LAKE, N. DAK., October 9, 1918.

Senator PORTER J. McCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.:

Refuse peace proposal. Demand unconditional surrender.

W. E. HOCKING,
President Devils Lake Vigilance Corps.

FARGO, N. DAK., October 7, 1918.

Senator PORTER J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Congratulations on stand against armistice and for unconditional surrender of Germany. Every man I have talked with during busy day and telephone messages from State are for unceasing fight to complete victory. Even peace extras issued by camouflaged Socialists' morning daily fail to swerve loyal Americans from unconditional surrender demand.

HARRY CURRAN WILBUR.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., October 8, 1918.

Senator PORTER J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We extend to you not only our thanks but the thanks of all our friends for the resolution published in last night's papers. Our only objection is you don't go far enough. Remember that we want reparation, restitution, and guaranties, as it is against our scruples to butcher men and children and devastate German towns. We must have an indemnity from Germany large enough to pay the relatives of the innocents who have suffered, and in addition to this Germany, and Germany alone, should pay for the rehabilitation of the countries she has devastated.

GRIFFITH DURNEY CO.

CHICAGO, ILL., October 9, 1918.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Congratulate you on the resolutions you have presented regarding the Max proposition. There should be no thought of anything but evacuation of all allied territory and surrender of arms, ammunition, restoring all damaged property, indemnity for everything they have caused the allies to expend, and restoration of Alsace and Lorraine.

JOHN O. HARRING.

BATON ROUGE, LA., October 7, 1918.

Senator MCCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.:

Read your resolution in evening paper. Hold to that. That is the least demand we should make.

DAVID W. COMMERO.

ST. PAUL, MINN., October 7, 1918.

Senator PORTER J. MCCUMBER,
Member Foreign Relations Committee, Washington, D. C.:

Your resolution introduced to-day against any cessation of hostilities until the Hun shall fully surrender and indemnify must evoke the cordial response of every true American. Fight vigorously; the entire Northwest will support you.

JOHN R. MILLER.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a question, but not if the Senator desires to take up any time in discussion.

ALIENS IN MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I dislike to make any further draft on the courtesy of the Senator from Minnesota, but I think without any further debate the pending joint resolution (H. J. Res. 331) can be passed.

If the Senator will allow me to say one word, I inferred from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that he misapprehended the purpose of the pending joint resolution. I have since conferred with the Senator, and he assured me that he would interpose no further objection. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GORE. I will briefly state the object of the pending joint resolution: Conventions have been entered into between the United States on one hand and France and England on the other permitting the reciprocal drafting and enlistment of their respective nationals. An Englishman might volunteer in the military service of the United States or a Frenchman might be drafted under these conventions, and if he lost an eye or a limb in France fighting for the United States and our cobelligerents he might be precluded from returning to the United States. This ought not to be. The terms are limited to aliens who are lawful residents of the United States. In addition to that, an Englishman might return home and be drafted or a Frenchman might return to France and volunteer in the Army of France and might sustain injury and be forbidden the privilege of returning to this country. The pending resolution is designed to secure Englishmen and Frenchmen and others, who are lawfully in this country and who enter our military service or that of the cobelligerents, to return to the United States after such service, notwithstanding the immigration act of February 5, 1917.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is not here, and I hope the Senator will wait until he comes into the Chamber before taking up the joint resolution.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that I conferred with the Senator from Massachusetts since he interposed his objection.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to the passage of the joint resolution now if there is no objection to it.

Mr. GORE. With one further comment, I will say that England and France have entered into these conventions notwithstanding the absence of this legislation, but under protest and with the confidence that it would be passed. Italy has withheld her signature from the convention and enlistment is being delayed now. That is the reason for urgency in behalf of this legislation. I hope it will pass.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TAXATION OF STATE GOVERNMENTAL ACTIVITIES.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am aware that the great absorbing question before the American people is the present status of the war, and I have no desire to interrupt Senators in the full discussion which has arisen over the proposition of Germany looking toward an armistice and negotiations toward settling the war; but, Mr. President, there is pending before this body in the Finance Committee a revenue bill of surpassing importance raising questions of great interest to the people of this country, and I beg the attention of the Senate while I submit some observations upon the power of the Federal Government to tax the governmental activities of the States.

The revenue bill as it passed the House levies a tax on incomes derived from interest on State and municipal bonds hereafter to be issued, as well as upon salaries of State officers, and the question now involved is whether Congress has such power.

This leads us to inquire upon what grounds this extraordinary power is based. Some Senators, I understand, base it upon the sixteenth amendment, which was adopted solely for the purpose of removing the restrictions of the Constitution of the United States, requiring direct taxes to be apportioned according to the census and enumeration. On the other hand, the Senator from Pennsylvania does not claim that any such power was granted by this amendment, but he bases the right of taxation upon the war power of Congress; or, in other words, upon the theory that in time of war the restrictions and limitations of the Constitution of the United States as to taxation are suspended.

It is a question of surpassing importance, for if either of these theories is correct, and this tax is levied, it marks a departure from the fundamental principles of government recognized for more than 100 years and sustained by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is also a momentous step, because for the first time it invokes a power which might be used to destroy or render ineffectual the State governments. I do not believe that the necessities of the war justify the Government laying its hands upon the sovereignty of the States. The continuance of our dual form of government, the stability, independence, and effectiveness of our State and municipal governments are of the greatest importance to the peace and happiness of the Nation and the perpetuity of our institutions.

While I am a federalist, and believe in a strong, vigorous central government which no State can impair or impede in its effectiveness and have so expressed my views on many occasions, I am equally a believer in the local government of the States, a government which reaches more intimately the daily life of the citizen and in which he more directly participates. But I did not rise to discuss the science of a dual form of government, for these principles were enunciated by the framers of the Constitution and have withstood the trials and vicissitudes of succeeding generations. The extent of the power of the Federal Government to levy taxes was foremost in the minds of the framers of the Constitution and the publicists of that day. The Confederacy had suffered during the Revolution through the want of this authority. On the other hand, there was great jealousy in the States against an undue extension of Federal power. Had there been any idea that there was placed in the Federal Government the power to tax the very instrumentalities of State governments no one believes that the Constitution would have been ratified. That such was not the understanding is not only made clear by contemporary discussions but by the judicial and legislative history of this country for a century and a quarter. I shall not attempt to state this entire history, but shall confine myself principally to a discussion of those constitutional principles defining his rights and powers of the Federal and State Governments, and the decisions of the courts construing the Constitution and enunciating those principles.

Under these well-established principles the States have no power to levy taxes upon the instrumentalities of the Federal Government, including a tax upon Government bonds or the income therefrom, the salaries of Federal officers, or upon the exercise of any governmental authority. On the other hand, the Federal Government has no power to levy taxes upon the instrumentalities of the State, including State and municipal bonds or the income therefrom, or the salaries of the State officers, or upon the exercise of any governmental authority.

These rules or principles do not arise from any direct constitutional inhibition, for there never has been any provision of the Federal Constitution prohibiting the States from levying taxes upon these instrumentalities of the Federal Government or prohibiting the Federal Government from levying taxes upon the instrumentalities of the States. The want of power arises from the very nature of the sovereignty of the Federal Government and the limited sovereignty of the State government. I do not deny that if the exercise of the legitimate powers of the Federal Government conflicts with the attempted exercise of State powers, the latter must give way.

For instance, in the exercise of the power for the regulation of interstate commerce, in sustaining the supremacy of the treaties of the United States, in declaring war, raising and supporting an army, the Federal Government is in the exercise of its sovereign powers, which can not be obstructed or interfered with by the States. But in war times as well as in peace times taxes must be levied and revenues collected according to the rules of the Federal Constitution. For instance, while Congress in the exercise of war power may lay an embargo upon all exportation it can not levy a tax upon such exportation.

If, therefore, it is claimed that Congress may tax the instrumentalities of State governments, we must inquire by what authority under the Constitution this power comes.

The sixteenth amendment does not confer any power to tax any article which Congress could not before properly tax, but it simply removed the rule of apportionment among the States according to census or enumeration. This is evident not alone from the history of the amendment, but the Supreme Court has held, in construing this amendment since its adoption, that it did not confer any power to tax any income or property which was theretofore untaxable, but was enacted solely to remove the rule of apportionment.

The Congress has always had power to tax incomes and, in fact, to tax all property, as was shown conclusively by the speech of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and by the speech of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. The words "from whatever source derived" in the sixteenth amendment confer no power whatever. The limitations upon the power of the Federal Government to levy taxes are contained in sections 8 and 9 of Article I of the Constitution, as follows:

SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. * * *

No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

In other words, duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the States and direct taxes shall not be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration provided by the Constitution.

As I understand the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], he believes while in times of peace those restrictions upon the power of taxation exist, yet in times of war, under the all-encompassing power of self-preservation, they do not apply. If that is so, then in war times duties, imposts, and excises might be laid without being uniform throughout the United States, and direct taxes on real estate might be levied without apportionment. In other words, taxes might be levied on land in New York and in no other State, and duties and imposts might be laid on goods coming through the port of New York and not through other ports, although the Constitution provides that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

It must be remembered that when the Constitution was adopted we had just emerged from the struggle for independence, and the subject of the respective powers of the Federal Government and the States was fresh in the minds of the statesmen of that time. Mr. Madison presented this question with remarkable clearness in the Federalist during those memorable days in which the adoption of the Constitution hung in the balance. He said:

The Federal and State Governments are in fact but different agents and trustees of the people, constituted with different powers, and designated for different purposes. Now, to the existence of the States—themselves necessary to the existence of the United States—the power of taxation is indispensable. It is an essential function of government. It was exercised by the Colonies, and when the Colonies became States, both before and after the formation of the confederation, it was exercised by the new governments. Under the Articles of Confederation the Government of the United States was limited in the exercise of this power to requisitions upon the States, while the whole power of direct and indirect taxation of persons and property, whether by taxes on polls, or duties on imports, or duties on internal production, manufacture, or use, was acknowledged to belong exclusively to the States, without any other limitation than that of noninterference with certain treaties made by Congress. The Constitution, it is true, greatly changed this condition of things. It gave the power to tax, both directly and indirectly, to the National Government, and, subject to the one prohibition of any tax upon exports and to the conditions of uniformity in respect to indirect and of proportion in respect to direct taxes, the power was given without any express reservation. On the other hand, no power to tax exports or imports except for a single purpose and to an insignificant extent, or to lay any duty on tonnage, was permitted to the States. In respect, however, to property, business, and persons, within their respective limits, their power of taxation remained and remains entire. It is indeed a concurrent power, and in the case of a tax on the same subject by both Governments, the claim of the United States as the supreme authority must be preferred, but with this qualification it is absolute. The extent to which it shall be exercised, the subjects upon which it shall be exercised, and the mode in which it shall be exercised are all equally within the discretion of the legislatures to which the States commit the exercise of the power. That discretion is restrained only by the will of the people expressed in the State constitutions or through elections, and by the condition that it must not be so used as to burden or embarrass the operations of the National Government. There is nothing in the Constitution which contemplates or authorizes any direct abridgment of this power by national legislation. To the extent just indicated it is as complete in the States as the like power, within the limits of the Constitution, is complete in Congress. (Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U. S., 560, 1, 2.)

That the sixteenth amendment was not adopted to confer the power to levy income taxes is evident from the same judicial history and from the decisions of the courts from the earliest day to the present time. Summarizing those decisions it is sufficient to say that the taxing power was given to Congress in the most comprehensive terms subject to the limitations as to uniformity of excises and duties and apportionment of direct taxes, that no hint of any power to tax the State activities is contained in this long line of decisions.

I ask permission to insert as a part of my remarks some quotations from the Supreme Court of the United States and from statesmen of that time explaining these powers of taxation.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Pacific Co. v. Soule (7 Wall., 433), said:

The taxing power is given in the most comprehensive terms. The only limitations imposed are that direct taxes, including the capitation tax, shall be apportioned; that duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform, and no duty shall be imposed upon articles exported from any State. With these exceptions—the exercise of the power is in all respects unfettered.

That is, as to uniformity and apportionment and exports from States—

Again, the Supreme Court said in Veazie v. Fenno (8 Wall.):

Nothing is clearer from the discussions in the convention and the discussions which preceded final ratification by the necessary number of States than the purpose to give this power (to levy taxes) to Congress as to the taxation of everything except exports in its fullest extent. * * * More comprehensive words could not have been used. * * * The words used certainly describe the whole power, and it was the intention of the convention that the whole power should be conferred.

In the late case of Nichol v. Ames (173 U. S., 515) the Supreme Court said:

It (Congress) has power from that instrument (the Constitution) to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, and the only constitutional restraint upon the power is that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, and that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration directed to be taken, and no tax or duty can be laid on articles exported from any State. Thus guarded, the whole power of taxation rests with Congress.

Again, in Bank v. Billings (4 Pet., 514), Chief Justice Marshall said:

The power of legislation and, consequently, of taxation operates on all persons and property belonging to the body politic.

Mr. Hamilton, in his Report on Manufacturers, said:

The National Legislature has express authority to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, with no other qualifications than that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to numbers ascertained by a census or enumeration taken on the principle prescribed in the Constitution; and that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. These three qualifications excepted, the power to raise money is plenary and indefinite.

In the case of Brushaber v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (240 U. S., 17), of the opinion considering the sixteenth amendment, the Supreme Court said that this amendment does not confer power to levy income taxes, but that the authority was already possessed and never questioned.

Pollock v. Farmers' L. & T. Co. (157 U. S., 557):

And this view was expressed by Mr. Chief Justice Chase in the License Tax Cases (5 Wall., 462, 471), when he said: "It is true that the power of Congress to tax is a very extensive power. It is given in the Constitution, with only one exception and only two qualifications. Congress can not tax exports, and it must impose direct taxes by the rule of apportionment and indirect taxes by the rule of uniformity. Thus limited, and thus only, it reaches every subject, and may be exercised at discretion."

I come, now, to the consideration of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States directly passing upon the question involved in this discussion. I shall not burden the Senate by reading extended quotations from these opinions but shall content myself with inserting them in the RECORD for the convenience of Senators who desire to examine this question. I believe the following propositions are established as the law of this land:

The Congress has no power to levy taxes upon the instrumentalities of the States, nor the State to levy taxes upon the instrumentalities of the Federal Government, and by instrumentalities I mean to include Federal and State officials, bonds, or the incomes therefrom, or the exercise of any power of government as distinguished from the exercise of a pure business power.

This does not arise from any direct prohibition in either the Constitution of the United States or the States, but by reason of the dual form of Government and the necessity for the existence of each and the exercise of the necessary governmental power. The exercise of these governmental powers by each, within its proper sphere, unhampered by the other, is necessary to its existence. The Federal Government is based upon the indissoluble unity of the States, but the existence of the State government is as necessary to the Union as the existence of the Federal Government. The State government has more to do with the interior regulation than the Federal Government. The maintenance of its taxing power and its power to elect officers, pay their salaries, to exercise all other functions of government, is as necessary to the Union as the exercise of the powers of the Federal Government.

It must be evident to anyone that if the Federal Government may tax the bonds or the income from the bonds issued by States, it may, by the exercise of that power, prevent the States from realizing on such bonds. And taxing the income of bonds falls within the same inhibition as taxing the bonds themselves, for the Supreme Court of the United States has thoroughly settled the proposition that a tax upon the income of property is a direct tax upon the property itself, and in the question of power there is no distinction. If the Federal Government may tax the salaries of State officers, it may place that tax at a prohibitive rate. It is unfair to say that this is an extreme case and the power would not be exercised, for the power to tax is the power to destroy, and while a necessary power of government, it is as necessary to the maintenance of independent State governments as to the maintenance of the Federal Government within their respective spheres of action. So I say that there never has been any specific prohibition against taxation, but this prohibition is inherent in the very form of our Government and has been sustained from the earliest day of judicial pronouncement to the present time.

The question was first decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Weston against City Council of Charleston (2 Peters, 449), opinion written by Chief Justice Marshall, in which it was held that a tax on stock issued by the United States and held by individual citizens is a tax on the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States and can not be levied by or under the authority of the State.

The opinion of the great Chief Justice is an absolute demonstration of this proposition, and applies with equal force to the attempt of the Federal Government to tax the borrowing power of the States. The Chief Justice said:

> This brings us to the main question: Is the stock issued for loans made to the Government of the United States liable to be taxed by States and corporations?
> Congress has power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." The stock it issues is the evidence of a debt created by the exercise of this power. The tax in question is a tax upon contract subsisting between the Government and the individual. It bears directly upon that contract while subsisting and in full force. The power operates upon the contract the instant it is framed and must imply a right to affect that contract.
> If the States and corporations throughout the Union possess the power to tax a contract for the loan of money, what shall arrest this principle in its application to every other contract? What measure can government adopt which will not be exposed to its influence?
> But it is unnecessary to pursue this principle through its diversified application to all the contracts and to the various operations of government. No one can be selected which is of more vital interest to the community than this of borrowing money on the credit of the United States. No power has been conferred by the American people on their Government the free and unburdened exercise of which more deeply affects every member of our Republic. In war, when the honor, the safety, the independence of the Nation are to be defended, when all its resources are to be strained to the utmost, credit must be brought in aid of taxation, and the abundant revenue of peace and prosperity must be anticipated to supply the exigencies, the urgent demands, of the moment. The people, for objects the most important which can occur in the progress of nations, have empowered their Government to make these anticipations, "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." Can anything be more dangerous or more injurious than the admission of a principle which authorizes every State and every corporation in the Union which possesses the right of taxation to burden the exercise of this power at their discretion?

In the case of Dobbins v. The Commissioners of Erie County (16 Peters, 435) the Supreme Court held that the States can not tax the salary of an officer of the United States.

The same principle was applied to an attempt of the Federal Government to impose a tax upon the salary of a judicial officer of the State. This was decided in the case of Collector v. Day (11 Wallace, 113). The reasoning of the court seems so conclusive that I beg leave here to quote from the decision of Mr. Justice Nelson:

> We do not say the mere circumstances of the establishment of the judicial department, and the appointment of officers to administer the laws, being among the reserved powers of the State, disables the General Government from levying the tax, as that depends upon the express power "to lay and collect taxes," but it shows that it is an original inherent power never parted with, and in respect to which the supremacy of that government does not exist and is of no importance in determining the question; and further that being an original and reserved power, and the judicial officers appointed under it being a means or instrumentality employed to carry it into effect, the right and necessity of its unimpaired exercise and the exemption of the officer from taxation by the General Government stand upon as solid a ground and are maintained by principles and reasons as cogent as those which led to the exemption of the Federal officer in Dobbins v. The Commissioners of Erie from taxation by the State; for in this respect—that is, in respect to the reserved powers—the State is as sovereign and independent as the General Government. And if the means and instrumentalities employed by that government to carry into operation the powers granted to it are, necessarily, and for the sake of self-preservation, exempt from taxation by the States, why are not those of the States depending upon their reserved powers, for like reasons, equally exempt from Federal taxation? Their unimpaired existence in the one case is as essential as in the other. It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implications, and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation; as any government, whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government. Of what avail are these means if another power may tax them at discretion? (Collector v. Day, 11 Wall., 126, 127.)

Here I desire to remark that that opinion was rendered in 1870, and from that day to this there has never been a dissenting opinion by a single judge of the United States Supreme Court upon this question. There have been dissents upon the question involved in the Pollock case as to the power to levy an income tax without apportionment; but all the judges in all the decisions from that day to the present time have conceded that the Federal Government had no power to tax the salaries of State officers or the income from State bonds.

In the case of United States v. Railroad Co. (17 Wallace, 322), the Supreme Court held that the Federal Government could not levy a tax upon the income of railway bonds held by a municipality, being the city of Baltimore.

In the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S. 430), reargued and decided in One hundred and fifty-eighth United States Statutes, page 601, the Supreme Court had the identical question involved in the present law before it. The income-tax law of 1894 imposed a tax on all incomes which would include revenues received from State bonds. The case was elaborately argued. The court, after reviewing decisions from the earliest date, including Weston v. Charleston (2 Peters, 449); Dobbins v. Commissioner (16 Peters, 435); Collector v. Day (11 Wallace, 113); United States v. Railroad Co. (17 Wallace, 322); and other decisions, including the case of Mercantile Bank v. New York (121 U. S., 138), said:

> The Constitution contemplates the independent exercise by the Nation and the State, severally, of their constitutional powers.
> As the States can not tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, nor the means which they employ to carry their powers into execution, so it has been held that the United States have no power under the Constitution to tax either the instrumentalities or the property of a State.
> A municipal corporation is the representative of the State and one of the instrumentalities of the State government. It was long ago determined that the property and revenues of municipal corporations are not subjects of Federal taxation.
> It is contended that, although the property or revenues of the States or their instrumentalities can not be taxed, nevertheless the income derived from State, county, and municipal securities can be taxed. But we think the same want of power to tax the property or revenues of the States or their instrumentalities exists in relation to a tax on the income from their securities, and for the same reason, and that reason is given by Chief Justice Marshall in Weston v. Charleston (2 Peters, 449), where he said: "The right to tax the contract to any extent, when made, must operate upon the power to borrow before it is exercised and have a sensible influence on the contract. The extent of this influence depends on the will of a distinct government. To any extent, however inconsiderable, it is a burden on the operations of government. It may be carried to an extent which shall arrest them entirely. * * * The tax on government stock is thought by this court to be a tax on the contract, a tax on the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and, consequently, to be repugnant to the Constitution." Applying this language to these municipal securities, it is obvious that taxation on the interest therefrom would operate on the power to borrow before it is exercised, and would have a sensible influence on the contract, and that the tax in question is a tax on the power of the States and their instrumentalities to borrow money and, consequently, repugnant to the Constitution. (Pollock v. Farmers' L. & T. Co., 157 U. S., 583, 584, 585, 586.)

While the decision upon the main point in the case as to whether the income tax is a direct tax and must therefore be apportioned, the court was divided, the opinion being by five of the judges; yet upon the question of the taxation of the bonds of municipal corporation it is well to note that there was no dissent. Mr. Justice White, now the Chief Justice, in writing the dissenting opinion, stated:

> In regard to the right to include in an income tax the interest upon the bonds of municipal corporation, I think the decisions of this court, holding that the Federal Government is without power to tax the agencies of the State government, embrace such bonds, and that this settled line of authority is conclusive upon my judgment here. It determines the question that where there is no power to tax for any purpose whatever no direct or indirect tax can be imposed. The authorities cited in the opinion are decisive of this question. They are relevant to one case and not to the other, because in the one case there is full power in the Federal Government to tax, the only controversy being whether the tax imposed is direct or indirect; while in the other there is no power whatever in the Federal Government, and therefore the levy, whether direct or indirect, is beyond the taxing power.

The subject was again elaborately considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Farmers' Bank v. Minnesota (232 U. S., 516), which, I believe, is the last opinion upon this subject, decided February 24, 1914, after the sixteenth amendment had been adopted, but this decision did not involve a construction of that amendment for the reason that the tax was levied before it went into effect. The court said:

> But we deem it entirely clear that a tax upon the exercise of the function of issuing municipal bonds is a tax upon the operations of the Government, and not in any sense a tax upon the property of the municipality. And to tax the bonds as property in the hands of the holders is, in the last analysis, to impose a tax upon the right of the municipality to issue them.

It is on this ground that United States bonds have always been held exempt from taxation under authority of the States. By like reasoning it has come to be recognized that bonds issued by the States are not taxable by the Federal Government, and it was upon this ground that this court held, in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 439, 584), that the income-tax provisions of the act of August 15, 1894, were unconstitutional in that they imposed a tax upon the income derived from municipal bonds issued under the authority of the States. (Farmers' Bank v. Minnesota, 232 U. S., 526–527.)

Such has been the settled construction of the Constitution of the United States by the highest court of the land for a period of nearly 100 years. It has been accepted by the people and acted upon, and under this salutary rule the Federal Government has exercised all powers necessary to its existence, and the State governments within their proper sphere of action have exercised their functions. This has not only been the rule in time of peace, but in time of war. The Nation has passed through four wars since the Constitution was adopted and has not suffered for want of power.

No one will deny that the War of the Rebellion taxed the resources of the Nation to its limit and yet the Supreme Court of the United States held that a tax levied in 1864 upon the income of State officers and their salaries was an infraction of the power of the States; that decision has remained as an authoritative construction of the Constitution for nearly 50 years. True, the Attorney General who argued that case evidently did not press upon the court the position that the constitutional limitations were suspended during war, nor did the distinguished judges who sat in that tribunal express any opinion upon this question, although necessarily involved in the case. At that time, evidently the theory of the suspension of the Constitution during war had not been thought of by the jurists and statesmen who impressed their ability upon this remarkable period of American history. It remained for statesmen of a later day to discover this principle; but is it not remarkable, if this is a correct principle of our Government, that in the framing of the Constitution it was not given expression or in the long judicial history of the powers of government no one, until this day, has thought of it?

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert as an appendix (A) to my remarks excerpts from the brief of the Attorney General and Mr. Ropes, of Boston, who represented the Government in the case in Eleventh Wallace, which involved a tax levied in 1864.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not deny the right of the Federal Government to exercise to the limit all the power necessary to the preservation of the Nation, and I have, in this Senate, gone far beyond many of my associates in sustaining the war power of Congress and the President; but I am not one of those who believe that the Constitution is suspended in time of war. There is, I think, some misapprehension as to the nature of the war power. It is not a power dehors the Constitution, but one granted by the Constitution and to be exercised coordinately with other powers therein conferred upon the Federal Government. In so far as it is legislative, it is vested in Congress; in so far as it is executive, it is vested in the President. In a general way, war power includes the power of declaring war, raising and supporting an Army and Navy, directing military operations, providing regulations for the trial of offenses by a court-martial within the theater of military operations, and many other subsidiary powers which it is unnecessary for me to mention. But in the exercise of all the other functions of government, the legislative, including the power of taxation, the judicial, and executive, the Constitution is as binding in war times as in peace times. This is not only in harmony with the spirit of democratic institutions, but in harmony with the judicial pronouncements of our courts.

In a very noted case, the case of Johnson against Jones, 44 Illinois, 165, following the decision in the Milligan case in 4 Wallace, Mr. Justice Breese, in a separate opinion, said:

I cordially concur in the sentiment that the Constitution of the United States was designed by its framers, and has been hitherto so understood by the people, to be the same protecting instrument in war as in peace; that a state of war does not enlarge the powers of any one department of the Government established by it, nor has any one of these defendants any right to urge "necessity" or "extraordinary emergencies" as a plea for the usurpation of powers not granted. The first is the tyrant's plea, and the other places the dearest rights of the citizen at the mercy of a dominant party, who have only to declare "the emergency" which they can readily create pretexts for, which bad men are keen to find and eager to act upon. There can be, and there should be, no higher law for the conduct of the Government in its relation to the citizen than the Constitution of the United States.

I believe that in a democracy like ours the Nation is stronger when the people can throw into the mighty struggle for existence all their resources, their man power, their ability and individual energy with perfect confidence that the constitutional rights of the citizens will be preserved.

I commend to my fellow Senators the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Mr. Justice Davis, in Ex parte Milligan, Fourth Wallace, 125, in which that distinguished jurist expounded the rights under the Constitution in these memorable words:

This Nation, as experience has proved, can not always remain at peace, and has no right to expect that it will always have wise and humane rulers sincerely attached to the principles of the Constitution. Wicked men, ambitious of power, with hatred of liberty and contempt of law, may fill the place once occupied by Washington and Lincoln, and if this right is conceded and the calamities of war again befall us the dangers to human liberty are frightfull to contemplate. If our fathers had failed to provide for just such a contingency they would have been false to the trust reposed in them. They knew—the history of the world told them—the Nation they were founding, be its existence short or long, would be involved in war; how often or how long continued human foresight could not tell; and that unlimited power, wherever lodged at such a time, was especially hazardous to free men. For this, and other equally weighty reasons, they secured the inheritance they had fought to maintain by incorporating in a written constitution the safeguards which time had proved were essential to its preservation. Not one of these safeguards can the President, or Congress, or the judiciary disturb, except the one concerning the writ of habeas corpus. (Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall., 125.)

I have the most profound respect for the learning, ability, and patriotism of the Senator from Pennsylvania. But I am compelled to dissent from his opinion, which brushes aside those established principles upon which our Government was founded and which have withstood the storms of war and the trials of peace, and likens them "to many fictions of the law which were invoked to ward off the bugaboos whose unreality we now clearly comprehend."

The principles which I enunciate are broad, fundamental principles of the Government, without which the sovereign power of the Nation or the limited sovereignty of the State is a mockery.

It is idle to say that taxation is not a power to destroy and could not be so interpreted without its abuse. All human power is subject to abuse, but I will remind the distinguished Senator that under the legitimate power of taxation the Federal Government taxed out of existence, and rightly so, the power of the States to issue money through State banks. The trouble is, the power once conceded, what constitutional limitations set the bounds to its exercise and who is to determine what is abuse of the power? If we once concede, as the great Chief Justice Marshall said, that the States may tax one instrument employed by the Government in the execution of its powers, they may tax any and every other instrument. "They may tax the mail; they may tax the mint; they may tax patent rights; they may tax the papers of the customhouse; they may tax judicial process; they may tax all the means employed by the Government to an excess which would defeat all the ends of government. They did not design to make their Government dependent on the States."

Later the Supreme Court, quoting this language, applied it with equal force to the right of the Federal Government to tax the legitimate exercise of powers by the State government within its limited sphere of action. There being no constitutional inhibition, I know of no reason, so far as the taxing power of the State is concerned, why it should not reach the income from liberty bonds as well as the Federal Government to reach the income from State bonds.

The Federal Government is stronger when exercised within constitutional limits. The Government is more enduring because it is based upon indissoluble union of the States, and without the States there can be no union of States, and without the sovereign power of the States there can be no States. I do not deny the right of the Federal Government in war times to seize any property, to enter into any domain, to exercise any power necessary to the preservation of the Union. Such a power is well illustrated by the example instanced by the Senator from Pennsylvania, in which he stated that if a foreign foe should occupy the capitol at Harrisburg the United States might enter the capitol and destroy it as a war measure. No one denies this principle.

The armies of the United States may destroy any property, take possession of any place for the purpose of defense or aggression—this is the war power. But when Congress comes to levy a system of taxes, to exercise its legislative powers when the other departments of the Government are exercising their powers, both in war and in peace, it does so in the manner and under the limitations pointed out by the Constitution. The power of taxation and the manner of its exercise conferred by the Constitution were deemed sufficient to satisfy the needs of the United States in times of war. If they are not, the people have reserved the power to change the Constitution. Nor is the other illustration given by the distinguished Senator any more apt in its application. He cites as an illustration of the war power of the Nation the soldiers and sailors' civil-rights bill, which suspended the sovereign power of the State to collect taxes due from soldiers and sailors. The two acts are clearly distinguishable. In the latter case the soldier or the sailor has actually entered the service of the United States Army or Navy. It is a part of the power as well as of the duty of the Government to protect him during this term of service. It is a far cry from the exercise of this power to the exercise of the power of the Federal Government to tax the governmental functions of the States.

The Senator from Pennsylvania made a statement in his address as follows:

> Aside even from the extraordinary exactions of war, the national economy may hardly withstand the effect, if the theory of exemption be carried to its logical conclusion. The modern tendency may result in a State's increased socialization of various profitable enterprises. Apply the theory of State exemption and a State might conceivably take over so many interests as to remove as a source of Federal revenue the bulk of its taxable wealth.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S., 438) has answered completely the argument of the Senator. The court there distinguished between functions of a governmental character and of a purely business character, and held that the issue of bonds, the creation of offices, and the fixing of salaries are governmental functions. If the State goes outside of that and enters into competition with its citizens in doing ordinary business the property may be subject to taxation.

In that case, as Senators will remember, the Supreme Court sustained the revenue law levying a tax upon spirituous liquors that the State was handling through its local dispensaries. But the judges writing the majority as well as the dissenting opinion pointed out that by a long line of decisions it had been settled in this country that in exercising the power of borrowing money, creation of offices, and the payment of salaries the States are exercising strictly governmental functions as distinguished from business functions and that the income from such bonds and from salaries of State officers is not subject to taxation by the Federal Government.

So we need have no fear that if socialism, in its march, shall take over to the States all the business of the Nation, the Federal Government will be deprived of the power of laying its hands upon the property and the income to satisfy its needs.

The debates in Congress show that one of the objects of the sixteenth amendment was to meet any extraordinary emergency which might occur in times of war, and that while ordinary revenues might be sufficient for the Government in time of peace there might come a time when this power of taxation would become necessary to the life of the Nation. If it is true that there is no limit to the power of taxation in time of war, the sixteenth amendment was entirely unnecessary to meet this object which Senators and Representatives had in mind.

The Federal Government could levy direct taxes without apportionment, could tax exports, although it is a fundamental principle of the Constitution that such exports shall never be taxed. It could stop the exercise of State government, because these governments are a drain upon the resources of the Nation. It could amalgamate the States into one upon the theory of economy. It could tax the bonds of other States, in fact, any securities held by any State in its treasury. The State of Minnesota holds $28,000,000 of the bonds of other States and securities of its own municipalities. If the power of war taxation exists to the extent claimed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Federal Government can tax those bonds.

Mr. President, it has been said that we are in this war to make democracy safe; we are in the war not alone to make democracy safe, but to make our democracy safe, to maintain our right to existence as the leading representative democracy of the world. We are fighting to preserve our institutions. We can best do so by maintaining those institutions in all their force and strength, maintaining the constitutional rights of citizens and of the State governments. It is an old saying that encroachment upon constitutional rights do not come boldly by the assertion of the right of usurpation, but insidiously under the guise of necessity. It is easy in time of war for us to overstep the bounds of liberty as laid down in the Bill of Rights, but one step is apt to lead to another. It is a specious argument, I believe, to say that we are exempting a large amount of wealth from taxation. Experience has shown that the people of the States are subject to less burden if they sell their securities exempt from taxation, because they save in interest a greater sum than they would reap in benefit by taxation. This has been the policy of the States, as well as the policy of the Federal Government. Because we are now called upon to issue an unparalleled amount of Federal bonds and have deemed it unwise to exempt them from special surtaxes during the war, should we attempt to reverse the policies of the States and tax State bonds which have been issued under the solemn promise of the State governments and under the decisions of the Supreme Court exempting them from taxation? What would be thought of a law which would tax the income of the 3½ per cent liberty bonds after the solemn pledge of Congress? What would be thought of a law that would tax the income of the bonds we issued prior to that time tax free? The same thing will be thought of the Federal Government if it undertakes to tax the bonds which the States have issued under as high authority and exempted in the same way.

Furthermore we do not attempt to place a normal tax upon the income of Federal bonds, but this bill would place not only a normal tax but a surtax upon the income received from State bonds. We exempt a large amount of Federal bonds. We propose to exempt only $5,000 of State bonds. It is useless to disguise the real object of this bill. It is to deter the States and municipalities from exercising that sovereign power. The States and municipalities are responding splendidly to the request of the Federal Government not to issue bonds, but it is absolutely necessary to the welfare of local communities that some bonds be issued, and I believe we can rely upon the patriotism of the people to carry on this policy.

After a very careful consideration of this subject, I am convinced that if any power exists to tax the instrumentalities of the State it must be found in the sixteenth amendment. We either have the power or we do not have it. In order properly to construe this amendment we must know the state of the law prior to its adoption, the defect or wrong intended to be remedied, and the object to be attained by the amendment to the Constitution. This, I think, every Senator will admit. The Supreme Court of the United States has time and again held that while, of course, the individual opinions of Senators and Representatives will not be considered for the purpose of construing a particular law, that the history of the times, the judicial and legislative history of the particular law, including debates in Congress, will be resorted to for the purpose of such construction, no principle of construction which can be invoked is stronger than this, for it demonstrates the very reason for the enactment of the amendment. Let us then consider what was the state of the law and exactly what Congress, the States, and the people generally attempted to accomplish by the amendment to the Constitution.

First, bear in mind that at the time of its adoption it was thoroughly established by an unbroken line of decisions of the Supreme Court that there was an entire want of power in the Federal Government to tax these State instrumentalities or the State to tax those of the Federal Government, and that a tax upon the income of bonds or the salaries of State officials comes within this inhibition. That this was not by reason of any specific constitutional inhibition but by reason of the fact that such power of taxation was inconsistent with the exercise of that sovereign power necessary to the maintenance of Government.

In the very decision of the Pollock case, which gave rise to this constitutional amendment, the court was unanimous upon this proposition, although divided upon the main question. Let us now see what was this decision and what the Congress and the legislatures of the States and the people understood they were accomplishing. It will be remembered in the law of 1894 Congress provided for an income tax, which included the income from municipal bonds, from real estate, and other property. It was elaborately argued by most distinguished counsel, was reargued and reaffirmed. I do not propose to take the time of the Senate to discuss the merits of this case. In the two cases the opinion was five judges holding the law unconstitutional and four judges dissenting. The whole history of this constitutional inhibition was considered, including the various decisions in the earlier days of the Republic. It was finally decided that a tax on the income of property was a direct tax and therefore void because not apportioned among the States; that the court would consider the source from which the income was derived in determining this question, and it was this consideration which gave rise to the constitutional amendment, giving Congress power to levy from whatever source derived without apportionment.

These questions having been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, an agitation immediately commenced in the country looking toward an amendment of the Constitution to remove the inhibition providing that taxes must be apportioned according to the census or enumeration. It was discussed in the platform of political parties, by Senators, Representatives, and in the public press, particularly during the campaign in the fall of 1908, which resulted in the election of Mr. Taft. Lawyers and public men were divided as to the soundness of these decisions, although not divided as to what the decisions meant. Many expressed the view that if the subject was again submitted to the court, in view of the far-reaching effect of this opinion, there might be a different decision.

When the tariff bill came before Congress in the spring of 1909, so strong was the sentiment for an income tax that Senators Cummins and Bailey each introduced amendments to the tariff bill providing for a tax on incomes. Both Senators admitted that the passage of either of these amendments would again raise the question of the validity of such tax, decided in the Pollock case, by reason of the apportionment provision of the Constitution. But no claim was made that the Constitution should be changed to grant the right to Congress to tax the State instrumentalities. In fact, these amendments provided for the exemption of the incomes from State, municipal, and Federal bonds and the salaries of State officers. Elaborate discussion then took place in Congress, participated in by Senators CUMMINS, Bailey, BORAH, NELSON, and many others, as to the soundness of the opinion in the Pollock case and the necessity of having an amendment to the Constitution changing the rule of apportionment.

With the permission of the Senate, I will attach as Appendix B a reference to the discussions in Congress, which may enable Senators to find them without difficulty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KELLOGG. President Taft thereupon, on June 16, 1909, sent a special message to Congress calling attention to this decision holding that income taxes were direct taxes and therefore must be apportioned, stating that it might be indispensable to the Nation's life in a great crisis that the power should exist to levy such taxes. Among other things he said:

I therefore recommend to the Congress that both Houses, by a two-thirds vote, shall propose an amendment to the Constitution conferring the power to levy an income tax upon the National Government without apportionment among the States in proportion to population. This course is much preferred to the one proposed of reenacting a law once judicially declared to be unconstitutional. * * * I recommend then first the adoption of a joint resolution by two-thirds of both Houses proposing to the States an amendment to the Constitution granting the Federal Government the right to levy and collect an income tax without apportionment among the States according to the population.

And, second, he recommended the corporation tax.

The first amendment was introduced by Senator Brown, of Nebraska, on April 27, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 44, part 2, page 1548, which was as follows:

Resolved, etc., The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes and inheritances.

On June 17, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 44, part 4, page 3377, Senator Brown introduced another amendment, as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect direct taxes on incomes without apportionment among the several States according to population.

On the previous day, June 16, the date Mr. Taft's message was delivered, Senator NELSON introduced an amendment, as it was finally reported by the Committee on Finance, which is substantially the same as Senator Brown's last amendment, with the words "from whatever source derived" added. The amendment was reported by Senator Aldrich, chairman of the Finance Committee, as follows:

ART. XVI. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived without apportionment among the several States and without regard to the census or enumeration.

I have examined the debates in Congress upon the amendment to the tariff bill proposing an income tax and the debates upon the constitutional amendment, and nowhere is there a suggestion that the amendment was intended to authorize Congress to levy an income tax on any subjects not theretofore within its taxing power. In fact, after the most elaborate discussions of the reasons lying at the foundation of the opinion in the Pollock case, and after review of the entire history of the constitutional restrictions as to direct taxes without apportionment, the entire discussions in Congress show that the object of the amendment was not to grant any power to levy income taxes, as that power already existed, but simply and alone to remove the restrictions as to the manner of levying the tax, namely, the restriction of apportionment according to the census or enumeration.

In all these debates no mention was made that the amendment was being submitted to the legislatures of the States for the purpose of giving the power to the Federal Government to tax municipal securities or the salaries of State officers or any other instrumentality or activity of the State governments or that was one of the objects. Is it not strange that if such a far-reaching power was to be conferred on the Federal Government, mention of it was not made in the debates of either House of Congress in the public discussions or in the press? When the amendment came up for consideration by the Legislature of New York in 1910, Mr. Hughes, who was then governor, raised the question as to whether this amendment did grant to the Federal Government the power to tax municipal bonds and salaries of State officers. Senator BORAH, in a very able speech before the Congress, demonstrated, I believe, that such power was not granted by the sixteenth amendment; and the Hon. Elihu Root, who was a Member of the Senate at the time the amendment was submitted, replied in a letter to the same effect. Much public discussion took place at this time, and no one, so far as my knowledge goes, took the position that it did grant any such power. Subsequently the Legislature of New York ratified the amendment.

For the convenience of Senators I will state that Senator Root's letter appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 1, 1910, volume 45, part 3, page 2539.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that I inserted it in my remarks last week when I made some observations upon this question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I had forgotten. I think it is very pertinent to state here that Gov. Hughes, who raised that question in the State of New York, has, since the adoption of the sixteenth amendment, as judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, concurred in the opinion in the Brushaber case in Two hundred and fortieth United States, in which it was held that the amendment did not extend the taxing power of the Federal Government to any new subjects. I have every reason to believe that the distinguished jurist, who was then governor of New York, had not, prior to the time of his message, given this subject careful consideration.

Subsequently the Legislature of New York ratified the amendment, and the Legislature of New Jersey, upon the same representation, in a message delivered by Gov. Fort, ratified the amendment upon the ground that it did not grant to the Federal Government the power of taxation over instrumentalities of the State.

But I submit that a consideration of the language of the amendment, as well as its history, demonstrates that it was not intended to and does not confer any such extraordinary power. It does not authorize the levy of the income tax from whatever source derived as such, but from whatever source derived without apportioning the same among the several States. The power to levy income taxes theretofore existed. That this was the understanding of the Congress is borne out by the fact that when Senator Brown was discussing his first amendment, which authorized the Congress to lay and collect taxes on incomes and inheritances, Senator Rayner pointed out to him that the Congress already had that power. Undoubtedly this view prevailed, because Senator Brown shortly thereafter introduced another amendment, which, with the exception of the words "from whatever source derived," is the same as the one finally adopted. It will be said that the words "from whatever source derived" are all-embracing and sufficient to include the power to tax the instrumentalities of the States.

If the words were considered separate from the text of the amendment it might be so, but the amendment is practically one sentence. It is the levy of an income tax from whatever source derived without apportionment that the Congress authorized. The sources from which the revenue was derived were discussed elaborately in the Pollock case in order to determine whether they were in effect direct taxes or not.

If this is true they are sufficient to authorize the Federal Government to levy taxes upon State property, upon securities in the treasury of the States, upon the exercise of judicial and legislative power. I do not believe anyone will contend that such is its scope. Furthermore, the language is entirely consistent with the object the people had in adopting the amendment. It must be remembered that in the Pollock case it was necessary for the court to consider the source from which the income was derived in order to decide that a tax upon the income was equivalent to a tax upon the property.

But in this matter of interpretation we are fortified by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in three cases decided since the amendment was adopted in which it was held that it was not adopted for the purpose of granting any power of taxation over any subject, but solely to remove the inhibition against levying direct taxes without apportionment. (Bushaber v. U. P. R. Co., 240 U. S., 1; Santon v. Baltac Mining Co., 240 U. S., 103; Peck v Lowe, decided May 20, 1918, and not yet reported)

In the first case the Chief Justice, who wrote the principal dissenting opinion in the Pollock case, not only explained the language "from whatever source derived," but stated clearly the object of the amendment. He said:

While not questioning at all that in common understanding it was direct merely on income and only indirect on property in a constitutional sense, since to burden an income by a tax was from the point of substance to burden the property from which the income was derived, and thus accomplish the very thing which the provision as to apportionment of direct taxes was adopted to prevent.

* * * * * * * *

It is clear on the face of this text that it does not purport to confer power to levy income taxes in a generic sense—an authority already possessed and never questioned—or to limit and distinguish between one kind of income taxes and another, but that the whole purpose of the amendment was to relieve all income taxes when imposed from apportionment from a consideration of the source whence the income was derived. Indeed, in the light of the history which we have given and of the decision in the Pollock case and the ground upon which the ruling in that case was based, there is no escape from the conclusion that the amendment was drawn for the purpose of doing away for the future with the principle upon which the Pollock case was decided—that is, of determining whether a tax on income was direct not by a consideration of the burden placed on the taxed income upon which it directly operated, but by taking into view the burden which resulted on the property from which the income was derived—since in express terms the amendment provides that income taxes, from whatever source the income may be derived, shall not be subject to the regulation of apportionment. (Bushaber v. U. P. R. Co., 240 U. S., 16–18.)

Again considering the subject in the Stanton case (240 U. S., 112) the Supreme Court said:

The contention is that as the tax here imposed is not on the net product, but in a sense somewhat equivalent to a tax on the gross product, of the working of the mine by the corporation, therefore the tax is not within the purview of the sixteenth amendment, and consequently it must be treated as a direct tax on property because of its ownership, and as such void for want of apportionment. But aside from the obvious error of the proposition intrinsically considered, it manifestly disregards the fact that by the previous ruling it was settled that the provisions of the sixteenth amendment conferred no new power of taxation, but simply prohibited the previous complete and plenary power of income taxation possessed by Congress from the beginning from being taken out of the category of indirect taxation to which it inherently belonged and being placed in the category of direct taxation, subject to apportionment by a consideration of the sources from which the income was derived; that is, by testing the tax not by what it was, a tax on income, but by a mistaken theory deduced from the origin or source of the income taxed. Mark, of course, in saying this, we are not here considering a tax not within the provisions of the sixteenth amendment; that is, one in which the regulations of apportionment or the rule of uniformity is wholly negligible because the tax is one entirely beyond the scope of the taxing power of Congress and where consequently no authority to impose a burden either direct or indirect exists. (Stanton v. Baltac Mining Co., 240 U. S., 112.)

In the last case of Peck against Lowe the court again stated with clearness and precision that the sixteenth amendment did not extend the taxing power to any new subjects. The court said:

The sixteenth amendment, although referred to in argument, has no real bearing and may be put out of view. As pointed out in recent decisions, it does not extend the taxing power to new or excepted subjects, but merely removes all occasion, which otherwise might exist, for an apportionment among the States of taxes laid on income, whether it be derived from one source or another. (Brushaber v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 240 U. S., 1, 17–19; Stanton v. Baltac Mining Co., 240 U. S., 108, 112–113.)

These are clear statements of the meaning of the sixteenth amendment when the whole subject was fresh in the mind of the court. And while, of course, the question litigated in the case was not the power to tax State bonds or salaries of State officers, the scope and meaning of the amendment was necessarily involved and the court spoke three times with deliberation and emphasis. This judicial expression is in harmony with the entire history leading up to its adoption and in harmony with the settled principles of the Constitution.

I do not believe there is any such exigency in the Federal Government to require this doubtful and dangerous experiment. From the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury but small revenue will be received. The tax is not imposed on the incomes of bonds heretofore issued, but only upon the incomes of bonds hereafter to be issued. In time of war, when of necessity all powers of the Federal Government are marshaled, when there is a great concentration of power, let us not, under the guise of war, undertake to change the fundamental principles under which the States and Federal Governments maintain their separate existence.

APPENDIX A.

The plaintiff in error maintains the constitutionality of the tax on the general principle that, in the exercise of its granted powers, the Federal Government is supreme; that, under the general power of taxation, every man and every thing throughout the country (exports excepted) are subject to taxation in the discretion of Congress, provided that the power be exercised for the purpose declared in the Constitution and not for unauthorized purposes, and that the conditions of its exercise, prescribed in the Constitution, uniformity, etc., be complied with.

Suppose the defendant in error had been drafted into the Army under a general conscription law, would his office have saved him? If it would, how far is this exemption to extend? Are justices of the peace exempt? Are aldermen exempt? And is it to be supposed for a moment that the number of persons exempt in a particular State from military duty depends on the laws of that State? We are not speaking of a law drafting into the Army all probate judges; that would be a law which the court would probably consider as not aimed at legitimate purposes; but we are asking whether the fact of a man's holding a commission as a State judge exempts him from serving in the United States Army in time of war.

From the above considerations, among others, the principle may reasonably be deduced that the United States Government in the exercise of its granted powers can reach every man and every dollar in this country. The common defense and general welfare demand this: All the resources of each State were liable to the full for these purposes to each State before acceding to the Constitution; now they are all available, under the limitations of the Constitution, for the general Government.

We pass to a consideration of the objections to this view urged by the defendant in error.

1. It is urged that within the sphere of their jurisdiction the States are as independent of the Federal Government as that Government, within its sphere, is independent of the States; and that a government whose officers are taxed can not be considered independent. But this independence of the States is confined to a certain sphere by the terms of the objection. That is to say, it is an independence consistent with the supreme authority of another government over its citizens and its property for certain of the most important purposes of government. Can that State, it may be pertinently urged, be in any sense independent, all of whose citizens may, against their will, be drafted into the Army? Can that State be considered independent, all of whose citizens, except its officers (to adopt the defendant's theory for a moment), may be at any time deprived by another government of a percentage of their income to defray the expense of a war, for instance, to which they are all opposed? In fine, is it any more an abridgment of the independence and sovereignty of a State to tax the agents of the people than to tax the people themselves? (Collector, pp. 2, 5, 6, vol. 7, file copies of brief, clerk's office.)

DAYLIGHT-SAVING LAW.

Mr. ROBINSON. I renew the request I made during the morning hour for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4982) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to save daylight and provide standard time for the United States," approved March 19, 1918. It is a bill providing for the extension of daylight saving, and the Committee on Interstate Commerce have reported it unanimously.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in the Committe of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States," approved March 19, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That hereafter the standard time of each zone shall be the same as that in effect on October 1, 1918, or one hour in advance of the mean astronomical time of the degree of longitude governing each zone, respectively, and as thus established shall remain fixed and determined."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES TO PRIVATE PROPERTY.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4945) to amend an act entitled "An act to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad," approved April 18, 1918.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill be read first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and it is urged by Gen. Pershing.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes. There is a communication from Gen. Pershing to the War Department, and it is very important.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

There being no objection, the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad," approved April 18, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to the title thereof the words "and for other purposes," and by adding a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That claims of inhabitants of France or of any other foreign country not an enemy or ally of an enemy of the United States against any officer, enlisted man, or other person in the United States Army, who has died, or hereafter shall die, during service overseas, for unpaid indebtedness incurred for current personal expenses of board, lodging, fuel, light, laundry, personal wearing apparel, or other items of ordinary current living expenses may be presented, approved, and paid as provided by section 1 of this act in cases of claims for damages; and whenever any such claim shall have been paid as aforesaid the Government shall reimburse itself therefor by deducting the amount of such payment from any pay or allowance due the deceased at the time of his death: Provided, That the provisions of section 2 of this act shall not apply to the claims described in this section."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask that the report of the committee on this bill be printed in the RECORD, so as to show the reasons for the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The report referred to is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 589, 65th Cong., 2d sess.]

INDEMNITY FOR DAMAGES CAUSED BY AMERICAN FORCES ABROAD.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany S. 4945:

The committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4945) to amend an act entitled "An act to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad," approved April 18, 1918, having had the same under consideration, report thereon with the recommendation that it do pass, and in support thereof submit the following letter from Hon. Benedict Crowell, Acting Secretary of War, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 14, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: The following is a draft of a bill requested by Gen. Pershing to provide for the prompt settlement of debts of deceased members of our expeditionary forces abroad:

"An act to amend 'An act to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad,' approved April 18, 1918.

"Be it enacted, etc., That 'An act to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad,' approved April 18, 1918, be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding to the title thereof the words 'and for other purposes,' and by adding a new section as follows:

"'SEC. 5. That claims of inhabitants of France or of any other foreign country not an enemy or ally of an enemy of the United States against any officer, enlisted man, or other person in the United States Army, who has died, or hereafter shall die, during service overseas, for unpaid indebtedness incurred for current personal expenses of board, lodging, fuel, light, laundry, personal wearing apparel, or other items of ordinary current living expenses may be presented, approved, and paid as provided by section 1 of this act in cases of claims for damages; and whenever any such claim shall have been paid as aforesaid the Government shall reimburse itself therefor by deducting the amount of such payment from any pay or allowances due the deceased at the time of his death: Provided, That the provisions of section 2 of this act shall not apply to the claims described in this section.'"

Gen. Pershing states that it is highly desirable for the prestige of our forces abroad that provision should be made for the prompt settlement of debts of deceased members of our forces. The bill as drafted will cover cases that may arise in our expeditionary forces in any part of the world now or in future wars.

It is requested that you endeavor to secure the early enactment of the above.

Respectfully,

BENEDICT CROWELL,
Acting Secretary of War.

Gen. Persing has also cabled the War Department asking for information relative to the status of this bill and setting forth the necessity for immediate action thereon. It is hoped that this bill may be passed with the least possible delay.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] yielded to me; I took advantage of the opportunity to refer to the notice of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that he would to-day deliver the speech to which we have just listened, and which is one of the ablest legal arguments ever delivered upon this floor. I seem to have given offense to the Senator having the floor, who strongly asserted that I had taken advantage of his courtesy to belittle his subject—take him from the floor. I do not give his exact statement.

Mr. President, the good opinion of the Senator from Washington is something which I cherish too highly to permit the day to pass without giving the assurance to him and to the Senate that if I have said anything to justify his resentment, I am very sorry and desire to withdraw it.

I have been anxious for some time to hear the Senator from Minnesota upon a very important question, because, as a member of the Senate Finance Committee, I knew that it would be a valuable contribution to the discussion of a very important question which we must dispose of. It may be that my zeal to hear the Senator led me into expressions which were justly subject to the construction which the Senator from Washington placed upon them. But I discerned that several Senators had asked for recognition when he took his seat, and I hoped that by reminding the Senate at the close of the morning hour of the notice of the Senator from Minnesota they would yield to him when the Senator from Washington yielded the floor. The Senator from Washington is not in his seat; I hope, however, that he will accept this expression of regret in the spirit which prompts its utterance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. WILFLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to take some little time of the Senate, and therefore, if the Senator from Missouri has some matter that would take but a short time, I shall gladly yield.

Mr. WILFLEY. I wish to say to the Senator from North Dakota that what I have to say will also take some time.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I intended to make a motion to take up the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 121) creating a commission to report a plan for the adoption of a national budget system, for consideration by the Senate, but the Senator from North Dakota was first recognized. I wish to give notice that at the first opportunity I shall move to take up that joint resolution and ask for its consideration by the Senate. I do not know what the plan is as to the transaction of business, but I assume business will be transacted. I serve this notice in order that complaint may not be made at the time I make the motion that no notice of my intention to do so has been given.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] informs me that he desires the passage of a small local bill, and that likely there will be no discussion of it. I therefore yield to him.

EXCHANGE OF FEDERAL BUILDING SITE AT EATONTON, GA.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed House bill 10609, allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange a post-office site in Eatonton, Ga. That is the substance of the bill. We are quite anxious for the exchange to be made at once, and I therefore ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for a present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10609) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the present Federal building site at Eatonton, Ga., for another site on the public square in said city. It empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the present Federal building site at Eatonton, Ga., for another site on the public square in that city upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, but the cost of such new site, including the purchase price of the present site, shall not exceed the original limit of $5,000 fixed by the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913, authorizing the acquisition of a Federal building site at Eatonton, Ga.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REPUBLICAN ATTITUDE AND POLICIES.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, provisions are being made to the end that our soldiers in France and in different parts of the United States may exercise their sovereign power of voting upon any and all the issues before the American people in our elections this fall. If, within the sound of the battle, the soldier may pause for the purpose of casting his ballot and expressing his voice upon any great national question, I certainly think it most appropriate that Members of Congress, upon whom is imposed the duty of conducting the Government and guiding the Nation through this war, may well pause for a moment and consider some of the issues which will be involved in our next election.

Mr. President, we often hear and read the statement, "politics is adjourned during this war." That statement is not and can not be wholly true. Under our form of government legitimate politics can never be adjourned.

Whether we would desire it or not, our Federal Constitution compels us to elect every Member of the House of Representatives and one-third of the Members of the Senate on the 5th day of November, 1918; and our State laws make those elections partisan. We can not adjourn those elections or take from them their political character.

Those State laws provide for primary elections to present political candidates for the November general election. Under State statutes each candidate must elect before the primary, whether he seeks the office of United States Senator or Representative as a Republican or a Democrat or other party adherent; and the several States require their voters to register as Republicans, Democrats, or other party adherents; and, further, compels each voter in the primary election to vote only for a candidate of his own party. Not only this, but our Federal law and our State laws each and all recognize political organizations and provide laws to govern the conduct of those political organizations in elections.

What nonsense, then, Mr. President, is this talk of laying aside partisan politics in any campaign? You might with just as much reason talk about omitting the next November election. The Constitution compels you to hold that election. The State laws compel you to conduct and hold a partisan election.

In the matter of war, of course there can be no party question, because there can be no two policies. He who is not with his country in the prosecution of this war is the enemy of his country. It is the one thing on which the patriotic members of all parties must agree, and ought, therefore, never to be a party or partisan question.

But, Mr. President, there are a vast number of questions most vital in their nature which, while secondary in importance, are not less valuable and lose none of their virtues because of a state of war.

While Grant was battling his way through the Wilderness in 1864 and Sherman and Thomas were forcing the offensive all along the line, Lincoln became a candidate for reelection as a Republican, and Gen. George B. McClellan, a Union general, was the Democratic candidate for President. Questions other than that of the war were discussed and entered into the respective party platforms. So in this coming campaign there will be party issues on important questions outside of the prosecution of this war.

But, Mr. President, while we can not eliminate or adjourn legitimate politics we can and ought to eliminate illegitimate politics. I wish I could truthfully say that this kind of politics had really been adjourned. I mean by "illegitimate" politics, first, the enactment of laws demanded neither by justice nor the general welfare, intended to influence, or the natural consequence of which will be to influence, votes in any election; second, the use by any official of a power conferred by law to meet war exigencies, for the purpose of influencing or controlling votes; third, reckless extravagances in expending the huge sums of money raised for war purposes, with a view of securing the political support of the beneficiaries of these extravagances; and, I might add, so manipulating the vast powers necessarily created by our war legislation to crush or reward, and thereby stifle criticism or shield wrong. I wish I could satisfy my mind that the incomparable waste and extravagance under the "cost-plus" system, adopted in our contracts for war needs, the disclosures of the squandering of nearly a billion dollars for airplanes without any visible return, the awful imposition on the tax-burdened public, present and future, who, I believe, are paying for war preparations from two to three times what would be imposed upon them under efficient management—I wish I could satisfy my mind that this could all be attributed to chance or inefficiency, and that in no instance political or personal interest intervened.

But I shall not allow even a persistent suspicion to assume the form of a charge. I hope I am entirely mistaken. I hope the enormous increase in wages to all railway employees, ordered by the Director General of Railways, on taking over the great railway systems of the country; the great increases allowed in wages by the Post Office Department on taking possession of the telegraph lines of the country; the ordering of private concerns producing for the Government to add to their cost in wages, in many instances far beyond what was demanded by employees; the compelling in many instances of laborers to associate themselves with unions before they could receive Government employment—I hope all these acts were done with the single purpose of securing equal justice to all producers, laborers, including those engaged in employments not touched by this magic wand of governmental power. But my own investigation convinces me that the drastic disregard of the law of supply and demand and the substitution of class or industrial favoritism has so unsettled the reasonably fair balance heretofore obtaining that gross inequalities and hardships have been inflicted on very many patriotic people and our industrial efficiency enormously impaired, to the great detriment of the country.

But my purpose to-day is to consider some features of legitimate politics which can not and should not ever be adjourned and which especially demand attention to-day.

As I have stated, whether we will it or not, an election is to be held in November. The candidates are seeking election as Republicans and as Democrats. As a Republican I shall attempt to declare what should be the Republican policy on the all-absorbing question of the day and on only one other question demanding solution while this war is in progress and before its termination.

Mr. President, far above all other issues and questions, so far superior that all others must be circumscribed within it and conduce to its success, is the issue of this war. The Republican Party is intensely patriotic. It has always been with the country; never against it. It recognizes the everlasting justice of our cause, and its statesmen fully comprehend what a disaster to the world would be a defeat or any conclusion short of a most decisive victory.

As, from the very beginning of this war, the Republican Party has advocated placing on the battle front an army of not less than 5,000,000 fighting men, and placing them there in the quickest possible time, so to-day it is still urging the speeding up of this mighty army, speeding up in ship construction to transport and maintain that army, speeding up of munitions and ordnance to enable it, in conjunction with our bleeding allies, who have been fighting an unequal battle for more than four years, to finally crush this giant ogre of militarism, whose arrogance, greed, and lust for world domination have made every land a charnel house and filled the earth with misery and horrors beyond description.

And that party would be untrue to itself and unfaithful to the country if it failed to condemn and constructively criticize any inefficiency or irregularity which has hampered or delayed us in putting forth the full strength of our war power.

The Republican Party stands squarely on the declaration that there shall never be any patched-up peace, any temporary lull in this great world cause which will enable a defeated militarism to again prepare, probably with weapons more insidious and deadly than their liquid fires, their poisonous gases, or their U boats, to destroy the weaker nations and subjugate and dominate the world. That we should have peace is important. That we should have such a peace as will make it impossible to inflict upon the world another such war is a thousandfold more important.

I assert that it can be truthfully said that in all matters concerning the prosecution of this war both branches of Congress and both political parties in Congress have adjourned partisan politics and stand united in patriotic zeal and determination to carry this war to a full and complete victory.

Had those intrusted with the production of war equipment and material exercised a degree of economy or demonstrated an efficiency comparable with congressional zeal and alacrity in furnishing them with the billions of dollars to achieve such result, we would have been many months ahead of what we are to-day in our war program.

President Wilson, in his capacity of Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy, is neither Democrat nor Republican. And he should have back of him at all times not a partisan support but a united national support, unstinted and unlimited. That support he has received from the Republicans of both Houses every day since we entered this conflict. We have gone further, and often against our own judgment as to their necessity, have conferred autocratic powers in matters not directly connected with this war—powers so broad and comprehensive as to threaten and endanger our ancient safeguards of human rights and liberties. We have gone to the limit, if we have not overstepped the limit, of safety in our endeavor to withhold no power that might possibly assist in the prosecution of the war.

As there is no party division in matters pertaining to the prosecution of this war, I feel safe in declaring that there is and will be no party division on the principles for which we entered the conflict or the conditions of a just, honorable, and lasting peace—a peace that can mean nothing less than restitution, reparation, and future guaranty.

But if it be contended that full reparation for wanton destruction of property, for vessels sunk and property destroyed in a manner not recognized by the laws and rules of civilized warfare, for tribute exacted, for enslavement and murder does not clearly fall within those 14 conditions for peace, then the Republican Party records itself in favor of demanding this full reparation, in addition to the 14 articles promulgated as peace conditions, and to assure this reparation, the Republican Party stands and demands as a first condition the unconditional surrender of the armies and navies of our enemies.

While individuals may differ on details, the Republican Party can and will stand squarely with the President for the great doctrines enunciated by him on the 8th day of January, 1918, as the foundation upon which to build the structure of a lasting peace.

Mr. President, while we shall claim no higher conception of duty or patriotism than that which actuates every loyal member of every other party, we would be untrue to our convictions and false to our history if we did not believe we could assure an acceleration of speed, efficiency, effectiveness, and economy far beyond what has been achieved and thereby shorten this war many months, saving the lives of many thousands of our soldiers and many billions of dollars.

So much, Mr. President, for the war issue, which is a world issue and not a merely domestic one. I wish now to discuss a domestic question, one of the most important elements in our national life and concerning which there has always been a difference of policy between the two great political parties. I refer to our agricultural industry.

In two ways can the Republican Party give very substantial support to the agricultural interests of the country, and both should be put into force and effect before the close of this war if we are to save that industry from a most serious reverse. The first is the reinstatement of the old policy of protection; the second, a new and advanced step which changed industrial conditions and especially the increasing dependence on the home market makes necessary.

As all State and foreign commerce is under the control of Congress, so the financial and commercial welfare of the American people is peculiarly a matter of Federal concern. It is the clear and unquestioned duty of the Federal Government, which alone has the power, to so adjust our commercial relations with other countries as to assure the greatest prosperity to all our people. As individuals compete with each other in all their internal trade and business, and are ever alert to increase their volume of commerce and meet their competitors, so nations in their international relations are strong competitors for world markets, and so they direct their energies, usually first to the protection of their home markets, and second to securing the greatest possible foreign market for their surplus. Alert to meet these duties, the Republican Party has stood, first, for the protection of the home market, knowing that in the certainty and stability of that market is the greatest assurance of prosperity.

While this war is on there is little need for this protection. The countries of the old world can not seriously invade our markets. All their energies must be directed toward the production of war materials. But the moment this slaughter ceases and the tide turns back to the normal, then more than ever before shall we need the old Republican doctrine of protection. And why? Because these people, impoverished by war, can not wait to regain their lost manufacturing trade which would take years, so they will seize upon that which will bring the quickest returns. In from 6 to 16 weeks all agricultural products can be matured and ready for market.

Their first attention will, therefore, be given to agricultural production. Again, those people, who during these years of carnage have accustomed themselves to rigid economy in food consumption, will be slow to return to the old and greater extravagances. That means that the foreign demand for our cereals will be diminished enormously at the close of the war, and we will be more than ever dependent upon our home markets. With our foreign markets enormously decreased or destroyed we shall more than ever need the Republican policy of protection of our home markets against invasion. I am aware of the fact that it is often contended that if we are exporting cereals or flour therefrom, no protection can be given in the shape of duties on imports. No person, however, who understands the grain situation and the enormous size of this country would ever make such a statement. During a protective period of more than 20 years our spring wheat sections obtained a price averaging more than 10 cents per bushel above what such price would have been without the protection. Our barley showed an average of 25 cents per bushel over Canadian barley. During a great proportion of the year 1910 Minneapolis and Liverpool quoted about the same figures. Had we at that time had free trade with Canada we should have been swamped with Canadian grain and our prices driven down to the exporting price, which would have meant a loss of from 16 to 20 cents per bushel, a very important percentage when the price of wheat was only about $1 per bushel.

So the Republican Party assures the American farmer the reinstatement of its policy of protection at the close of this great world conflict.

In what other way can the Government assist in placing agriculture on a more prosperous basis?

Mr. President, the day of small independent businesses is rapidly passing. Economy to the highest possible degree is the watchword of success. While individual production may be continued in some lines and, in agriculture, must be so carried on, distribution of the product demands combined or cooperative effort. As the period when the farmer traded his firkin of butter for a bolt of calico, his bushel of onions for a gallon of molasses was succeeded by the present period of intermediate commission men, so to-day the irresistible pressure of rapidly advancing economic conditions demands a rearrangement, if not a total abolition, of the present extravagant system of distribution of farm products.

Just as the growth of commerce made necessary the great bank clearance system of the country, so the vastness and complexity of commerce in food products demands to-day a cooperative system of marketing, not only to stabilize the market for any product, but also to assure a fair return for the sale of every food product. The dumping of many carloads of peaches into the Chicago River a few years ago because there was no wholesale demand, while hundreds of thousands of mouths in that city were watering for this luscious fruit, the selling at auction of hundreds of carloads of farm products to pay the charges for their transportation, condemn the present system; and a charge to the Washington consumer of $1.50 for a melon for which the Georgia producer was paid 5 cents demands the abandonment of such an unjust and obsolete system and the construction of a new one that will bring together the producer who has a food article which he wishes to sell for a fair price and the consumer who needs that article and is willing to pay a just price for it.

The form and scope of this new system is already foreshadowed in the many cooperative organizations of grain elevators, creameries, fruit growers, and so forth, which, while now scattered and unrelated, point the possibilities of a great, harmonious system governed and supported by a general law, and answering the needs of each of the hundreds of divers agricultural industries.

How would I inaugurate this new system? First, I would enact a general Federal law which would authorize and provide for the organization of one great central Federal food-distributing corporation. I would provide in that law for State or district suborganizations, the latter to be made up of groups of producers associated together under a cooperative plan to market their products. I would bring them all under one uniform plan. I would not make this corporation a Government owned or Government operated institution. That would mean to bureaucratize it to death. That would mean to load it down with Government officials. That would mean to subject it to political influence. That would mean the usual Government extravagance and inefficiency. I would simply have this corporation organized under Federal laws, and as its operation would necessarily be interstate, for its protection against adverse State or municipal regulation, I would have it under general Federal supervision. Then I would have the Federal Government assist, as far as Government can assist by law, in promulgating the purpose of this association, which purpose would be to assure the producer a market for his farm products at a fair and just price and to protect the consumer from extortionate or robber charges. The California Fruit Growers' Association, whose usefulness has been marvelous, points the benefits of such cooperation and affords suggestions for a general law covering the marketing of all agricultural products.

Mr. President, about 35,000,000 people in this country are dependent upon the products of the soil for a living. Whether that living be meager or good depends upon three principal factors—climatic conditions, insects and other pests, and markets. The first two are beyond the control of humanity or the Government. For that reason agriculture must always be more or less uncertain. The agriculturist can never anticipate with any degree of accuracy the value of his year's labor. Unlike the laborer or the mechanic, who can compute with certainty just what his services will produce in a given time, the farmer must always be governed by chance. He must wage war against all the hundreds of destructive agencies and accept whatever the chances of victory or defeat may yield him. Hail and winds, heat and cold, drought and deluge, Hessian fly and chinch bug, potato bug and cattle tick, boll weevil and fruit scab, cholera and blackleg, wild mustard and wild oats, French weed and Canadian thistle, Russian cactus and quack grass, and a hundred other pestiferous weeds and evils make his vocation not only one of constant warfare, but one of uncertain return.

But, notwithstanding all these discouragements and uncertainties, humanity with natural affection still clings to the soil. And, Mr. President, it is well for the country that this is so, for were the vocation of every man governed solely by its profits farming in this country would long since have been abandoned. To whatever extent the production of other articles may vary, national safety demands that the food production as a whole must be stable and sure. The wearing apparel, however threadbare, can still be worn for another month, if necessary, but the stomach can not remain empty a day without dire results.

So if there be any one industry in the whole country that ought to be encouraged, that ought to have extended to it the sympathetic and assisting hand of Congress, it is that of agriculture. And the only way to encourage it is to assure to it a degree of prosperity commensurate with other lines of business. People abandon farms because there is more drudgery and less profit than in other vocations. Make farming just as profitable and the tide will immediately flow back to the land.

Mr. President, I speak of this proposed Government assistance in marketing the food products of the country within our own domains and in every city of the Union as an advanced Republican policy, because it is in conformity with the Republican idea of governmental assistance to every industry, and is contrary to the Democratic idea of permitting every business to take its chance in the competitive world.

As applied to farming, and especially to grain and stock raising, the Democratic idea is that if this farmer or stock raiser is able to eke out a mere existence on his farm, is able to earn enough to satisfy his hunger and cheaply clothe himself and family, he is receiving all he is entitled to; that, if through storm or flood or drought he loses a crop, the General Government might properly dole him out sufficient means to tide him over the disastrous year; or, failing to do that, open some pork barrel of public appropriations in his vicinity, into which he may thrust his hand for his proportionate share.

The Republican policy is that agriculture as a business should enjoy a prosperity sufficient to enable the farmer to live as well as those engaged in other vocations, to have equal comforts and opportunities to pay wages and salaries, whether to members of his family or others, equal to the wages and salaries paid for like services in other employments, and still be able to lay aside a reasonable surplus to meet the lean years and to care for himself and those dependent upon him when the feeble hands of age can no longer wield the working tools of life.

The one party satisfies itself with alms appropriations, the other seeks to insure a prosperity that will place the business above all alms taking. The one party by its policies and principles says, "Let us take from the rich and give to the poor among us." The other says, "Let us have no paupers among us."

Mr. President, we need in this country to-day a campaign of education. We not only want to bring the food producer and food consumer face to face in a commercial sense, in the sale and purchase of farm products, but we want to bring them face to face to the end that each can understand the just and equitable rights of the other.

We who speak for the farmer ask this of the consumer of his products: Are you willing to pay him such a price for his products as will enable him to earn as much in eight hours of labor as you earn in an equal number of hours of labor? Are you willing to sell your services to him, either directly or when coined into manufactured articles, on the same basis that you purchase his labor coined into food products?

We ask the business man, the merchant: Are you willing to allow the farmer such a price for his products as will enable him to pay his wife and his children, who perform work on the farm, just what he would be required to pay others to do the same work? In other words, do the same as you do when you employ members of your family in your store or in your bank?

This, then, is the Republican policy toward agriculture, namely, to assist in every way to place it on a paying basis, to make it a business for profit and not merely a means of existence.

We should educate the American people, the American consumer, to a clear and definite understanding of the equitable rights of the producer, the right to receive a price for his products that will enable him to have and enjoy the same comforts and luxuries that are enjoyed by those conducting the ordinary business avocations in our cities, the right to exchange his labor on a plane of equality with other like labor in our great cities, the right to a reasonable interest on his investment in land and equipment, in addition to salaries allowed to each and every member of his family performing services, and in addition to all other expenses and depreciation charges connected with the operation of his farming business the right to lay aside a reasonable surplus to meet the exigencies incident to all farming operations and the necessities of the advancing years.

Toward that end the Republican Party should stand ever pledged.

Compare this with the attitude of the Democratic Party, an attitude that most naturally follows its policy of neglect. I would scarcely be warranted in asserting a prejudice or a premeditated hostility on the part of that party toward the northern farmer. But I would be clearly within the facts in declaring that this party continually subjects the northern farmer to wrongs and injustices for the benefit of those following other vocations, and with a heartlessness that ought to challenge the resentment of every tiller of the soil.

I need go no further back than the treatment accorded by officials of the present administration to demonstrate this hostility. Our Democratic friends have always preached that the Government could do nothing to assist the wheat raiser, that he should be let alone to secure the best price a world market would give him; but the moment the world market gave him a good price, a price determined by the law of supply and demand, they did not let him alone. On the contrary, they immediately forced him to accept $2.20 a bushel at the terminal markets when the world demand and the American demand were giving him $3 to $3.07 at such terminal markets. In its price fixing the farmer's wheat was the only important product that was reduced in price, and that was reduced in the face of an increase in price of everything the farmer must purchase, an increase ranging from 100 to 400 per cent. The Government sent out its circulars and bid for country labor against the farmers until in my State farmers were compelled to either pay 80 cents an hour to labor to thrash their crops or allow them to rot in the field. The Government took possession of the railways and telegraph lines of the country, and, though employees of the former had already been granted a 25 per cent increase in 1916, their wages were again enormously increased in 1917 and 1918. This increase compelled the raising of freight rates, and these increased rates were charged back against the farmer whose earnings had just been reduced.

By reducing the price of wheat 80 cents per bushel, on the Agricultural Department basis of the 1918 crop, the wheat raisers lost about $800,000,000. It is safe to say that by reason of the increase in freight rates, necessitated by the increase of salaries and wages to railway employees, the wheat raisers lost another $200,000,000, or about $1,000,000,000 altogether.

And, Mr. President, while the Government forced the price of wheat down 80 cents per bushel, how did it treat other industries? How did it treat the millers who grind and sell the farmers' wheat, and the packers who buy and distribute the farmers' cattle?

Mr. President, it allowed them to increase their earnings above prewar earnings from 200 to 500 per cent. I take the figures here quoted from the report of the Federal Trade Commission. For four years ending June 30, 1916, the average annual profit of the American millers per barrel of flour was 13½ cents. The average price received by such millers on the allowances made by the Food and Fuel Commissions was 52 cents per barrel, an increase of 400 per cent. Some mills made a profit as high as $2 per barrel. Swift, Morris, and Cudahy made a combined average profit for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 of about $19,000,000 per year. Then this Food Commission, which cut down the farmer's grain 80 cents per bushel, or 26⅔ per cent, and which also fixed the selling price of the meat packers, allowed them to make a profit in one year of about $87,000,000, an increase of 350 per cent.

While this commission cut down the farmer's wheat price 26⅔ per cent it allowed the leather manufacturers, who purchase the hides of the farmer's cattle, to increase their earnings about 500 per cent.

The Government also fixed the price of steel products. This same Federal Trade Commission finds that this administration, which forced the wheat raisers to accept a loss of $800,000,000, allowed certain important steel companies, whose net earnings were $46,500,000 in 1914, to increase those earnings in a single year to $294,000,000, an increase of more than 500 per cent.

I might carry this on to cover hundreds of other industries. Surely I am justified in asserting that if the Democratic Party has earned the gratitude of all those to whom its administration has allowed increased salaries to such an enormous extent, it has certainly earned the condemnation of every American farmer whose interests have been sacrificed for the benefit of these other classes.

Mr. President, I can not close this argument in defense of our farming population without replying to and refuting the charge often made against the farmers of the Northwest, and especially those of my own State, who have sought to redress their grievances by becoming members of the Nonpartisan League, the charge of disloyalty to the country. Such a charge is worse than a slander, whether uttered in political campaigns or through the medium of the press. There are no more patriotic people in the United States than the farmers of the Northwest.

I shall not discuss the political theories of those who are at the head of this organization. Their beliefs may be wholly socialistic or paternalistic. But the membership of the organization is made up of farmers of every shade of political belief and theory. You will find among them the most radical Republicans and the most obstinate Democrats. You will find the Socialist, pure and simple, and those who never departed from the idea of individual ownership. You can no more charge that the members of this organization as a whole are socialists than you can declare that all those who believe in Government ownership and operation of railways and other public utilities are socialists.

What we ought to do is to try to ascertain what is at the bottom of this movement and what caused the movement. The rapid development of this organization ought to convince any thoughtful man that there must have been a condition of discontent and dissatisfaction with the present order of things and we should direct our attention to its cause. I have fully realized the situation and during every year of my official life I have put forth my utmost endeavors to make the Congress and the country realize it. I have again and again presented the conditions which discriminated against the farmer, and I have again and again prophesied just what has happened, that these people would some day organize and make their power felt in an effort to remedy injustice and inequalities. All complaints of the farmers can find their basis in this neglectful attitude, which is the political theory of the Democratic Party, and these complaints, in my opinion, have not received the full consideration that should have been given by the Republican Party. I shall not say that we have given too much consideration to the interests of our great city populations but that we have given too little consideration to the comparative interests of our country populations.

As a result of this neglect of country interests our cities have become so abnormally wealthy as compared with the country, the earnings so incomparably greater than in the country, that the people of the cities have lived on a plane of luxury, extravagance, and comfort far beyond the possibilities of country life. The ever-increasing cost in the price of labor and in manufacturers' and retailers' prices to maintain this higher standard of city life has found no fair counterpart in farm life.

Taking my own State as an illustration, 95 per cent of its products must be shipped and sold outside its own borders. Our State laws therefore could not protect the farmers in the matter of distribution and sale of their products. They were at the mercy of trade organizations built up and conducted for their own financial benefit in every great city of the country. It was inevitable that the farmers should get the worst of it under such a system. They should have been helped to free themselves from the clutches of that system. Failing to secure that help from the National Government, they sought through this organization to help themselves.

I do not think anyone can call me a Socialist. I am so far from it that I never believe in the Government attempting to do that which the individual citizen can do as well or better. I have never known a Government enterprise that was not vastly more expensive and far less efficient than it would have been if operated by individuals. When the Government enters into any line of business enterprise it must recoup its losses and meet its extravagances by taxing the very people who may be in competition with it, a manifestly unfair thing to do.

But it must be remembered that in our State there is but one business—agriculture. Therefore that State can lend its assistance to that industry in many ways without injustice to any other industry. It can not be said that by rendering this assistance to agriculture you are levying a tax on the miner or the manufacturer, for we have no miner and no manufacturer. Every dollar expended by the citizens of our State must first come out of our own State soil. If the farmer does not get that dollar, no one gets it. We should, therefore, be most liberal in assisting this farmer to increase his dollars. His increased prosperity will add just that much to the prosperity of all our people.

The patriotism of our North Dakota farmer, whether within this league or out of it, can not be justly questioned. By my standard of measurement that patriotism is of the very highest quality, because, notwithstanding the fact that the Government grossly discriminated against him; notwithstanding the fact that the Government forced down the price of his product far below the market price and at the same time grossly boosted upward—doubled and trebled—the price of everything he must purchase, he has nevertheless met every liberty-bond call to the full limit of his ability; and if that is not a test of fidelity and patriotism, then I know of no true standard.

I can only say to the farmers of the country that the Republican party to-day stands for the advancement of the agricultural interests of this country until it reaches a plane of prosperity equal to other great industries, until the American farmer and his family can have and enjoy all the comforts and luxuries enjoyed by other prosperous vocations throughout the land, and it will proceed to enact legislation to accomplish that purpose.

THE NECESSITY FOR VIGOROUS PROSECUTION OF THE WAR.

Mr. WILFLEY. Mr. President, the peace proposals of the German chancellor should not divert the attention of Congress and the American people from the immediate tasks before them. While a revenue law is being prepared to provide the greatest annual income ever raised from taxation by any government in the history of the world, and the country is subscribing to a bond issue in the largest amount ever attempted in any single loan in history, the valor and the victories of the American Army in France bring us to a clearer realization that this war will be won. The situation is of supreme importance to the cause in which the world is now so deeply concerned. In the stupendous battle that is now raging from the North Sea to Lorraine the American Army occupies a position of strategic importance and faces the hardest problem and the most arduous task of the war. The brilliant stand at Chateau Thierry and the quick and decisive achievement at St. Mihiel brought Germany to realize that the courage and strength of the American soldier is more than a match for the skilled Prussian, so well schooled in the arts of war. Up through Argonne Forest the American Army pushed its way, from hill to hill, from tree to tree, from rock to rock, despite the stubborn resistance of the mischievous machine-gun nests of the Germans. American soldiers are sharing the burdens and victories in the present drive between Cambrai and St. Quentin. Metz, which, in fortification and equipment of defense, is the pride of the Empire and the key to Germany, is being bombarded by the guns of the American Army. It is remarkable that the American soldier, untrained and untried in the arts of war, should be assigned to the task of taking this most powerful fortress of the world. This is a strategic position, because of the fact that within a radius of 35 miles of where American guns are now in operation is found the richest iron-ore deposits of the earth. Before the American advance, extending down to the Belgian and Luxemburg frontier lie the iron deposits of Longwy and Briey, flanked by the valley of the Moselle and the fortress of Metz. This field provides German armaments with more than 80 per cent of their steel, without which Germany could not long conduct her frightful slaughter. The output of this region, and the iron fields of Russia, seized by Germany, give her unlimited supply of this all-essential element of war, and enable her to take care of the immense demands for war purposes. Forty-eight years ago this month Metz was surrendered to the Prussians by the French, the first time in its history, extending from the time of Cæsar, that it ever succumbed to an enemy. This resulted in the federation of the German Empire, and since that time this region has furnished minerals which have enabled Germany to attain her commercial greatness and prepare for the conquest of world dominion for which she brought on this war. Bismarck's famous utterance that "not by speeches and majority votes are the great questions of the day decided, but by iron and blood," was more than a mere figure of speech. It stated a fact and embodied a program upon which the policy of the German Empire was founded. The waging of war by industrial nations such as are engaged in this world conflict requires immense quantities of iron. It is an essential element of war. No substitute has been discovered to take its place for war purposes. It is the basis of necessary equipment for military operation. The constituents of battle are iron and blood. This is why Germany shortly after the outbreak of war took possession of Luxemburg, and the adjoining territory of France and Belgium, which gave her control of the greatest iron region of the world. This iron field is imperative to Germany's military operations, and she will hold it until she is whipped to exhaustion, unless she can sooner successfully promote her peace propaganda. Germany knows the value and importance of iron in commerce as well as in war. German bankers and manufacturers are more concerned about iron fields than they are about colonies. It was chiefly for the purpose of acquiring the iron mines of Lorraine that Germany fought France in 1870. With the spoils of that war she has not only developed her gigantic industrial and commercial system but has also built up her tremendous military equipment. Had Germany not gained riches through her coal and iron industries of this section of Lorraine—although she has rich coal deposits elsewere—she would never have had the means with which to wage this war. This is why her expressions, heretofore, have indicated her purpose to contend for the absolute control of this important raw material, which in her hands may be used for her own weal and for the woe of the rest of mankind. She will stoutly contend for these iron fields. The Kaiser has very recently proclaimed that the central powers "will defend this territory with the last drop of their blood."

Control of these raw materials would make Germany the industrial master of Europe, but, more than that, it would, in spite of any treaty provision that might be imposed, make her an immeasurable and intolerable menace to civilization. If by dint of war she could hold these great iron fields and retain those now held by her in the Ukraine, she would have only one rival in this essential element of war and industry, and that would be the United States. In its advance upon the region of these iron fields in the valley of the Moselle, the American Army faces the fiercest conflict of the war and must meet the utmost resistance Germany can command. That Germany is feeling the inevitable result of the American advance in this vital part of the battle field and the early consequences of that advance, is evidenced by her proffers of peace, while she still holds these great natural reservoirs of commercial prowess and military might. Without Lorraine's iron Germany's blood can not win the war. For that iron she will shed her blood until the vitality of her army is reduced to where submission and surrender are inevitable. If the war is fought to a finish the most stubborn and finally the most sullen, and, I fear, the bloodiest battle will be at Metz. It will require the maximum effort and test of all the determination, spirit, and energy of the American Army. Germany realizes that not only her military but also her commercial supremacy will be lost when she surrenders Metz. This fortification has been the protection of these iron fields in Lorraine. Rather than surrender them she has opened negotiations for peace. For nearly half a century Germany has been increasing the fortifications of Metz, which in 1870 was one of the strongest fortresses of France. Metz now ranks with Strassburg—the two great bulwarks of the west frontier of Germany; but the Prussians to-day treat Metz as the principal pivot of offensive operations against aggressions from France. Of the "minimum terms of peace" none is more important than that Germany must disgorge this great iron region as well as the Ukraine. This, not for the purpose of exercising "the power of economic penalty," but to emasculate her military machinations. We have no selfish commercial purpose to serve in taking from Germany the vast iron fields she has seized or in relinquishing Germany's grip on Europe's steel capacity. North America produces more than one-half of the known iron of the world, and the industrial supremacy of the United States is already established beyond the possibility of destruction. Aside from our coal and iron, we also have incomparable possessions of copper, and after the war our advance in wealth and power will be equal to all European countries. We are not fighting for commercial supremacy. We have a holier purpose than that, but our present business is to perform our part, the major part of the war burden, and use our vast wealth and power toward a successful termination of the war. There will be no spoils of war; but there should be adequate indemnities for the ruthless devastations of German invasions. This war has brought about a most oppressive taxation, which can only be met by the exercise of the most rigid economy on the part of all peoples at war. When we joined the allied forces of Europe in the task of overcoming this cruel and powerful autocracy, which had undertaken to obliterate from the world the principles upon which Christian civilization and democratic governments are founded, we assumed an obligation to the world to wage this war to a final triumph of justice and fair dealing. So far as we are concerned, this is war against war. Germany must not only be compelled to surrender and submit to a "common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations" but she must of necessity be subjected to limitations that will make it impossible for the cruel lust of conquest, that may again fill the hearts of her savage rulers, to involve the world in such a holocaust of horror. This is the only way to give guaranty to the future generations that the principles which civilized society has considered fundamental shall indeed be eternal, and that free government and Christian principles shall never perish from the earth. Germany's promises have proven untrustworthy and means must be found to protect the world from her treachery and deceit. No one step can be more effective in that direction than to restore to the countries which she has robbed the iron-ore beds which rightfully belong to them. This does not violate the principle that "the impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just." It would be unjust to future generations to leave Germany where it would be possible for her to again build such a gigantic military machine as that which is now bringing such untold horror and misery upon the world.

Germany can consistently and safely be supplied with all the iron she needs for commercial and industrial purposes, either from the surplus of the European nations controlling this ore or from Brazil and the United States. Her export trade will naturally and of necessity be greatly curtailed by the loss of friendly foreign commerce, which she has heretofore enjoyed, and which was growing with such marvelous progress when she entered upon her ruthless conquest of destruction. German atrocities have destroyed her good name in trade and commerce. That is the inevitable misfortune of her own acts for which she will have to suffer. We do not lose sight of the fact that when the war is over there will be 70,000,000 people in Germany who will have to work out their own destiny, under a sentence that will impose sacrifices that will test their spirit and industry for a long time to come. But the cost of war will fall heavy upon all the nations involved, and its burdens will be borne by many who are innocent and who will derive no benefits from the burdens they will have to bear. This does not relieve Germany of the sentence her conduct has brought upon her and the economic penalty she must pay in retribution of her deeds of devastation and destruction. There are certain means of discipline and control which must be exercised in the common interest of all, and among these is the taking of the iron ore beds of Europe from Germany, which she could no doubt use to her commercial advantage but which she could also use to build up another military machine with which she might seek "to determine the fortunes of peoples over which she has no right to rule except the right of force." These observations are suggested by the present strategic position of the American Army and its advance upon the coveted territory now held by Germany and the immediate effect of that advance upon the destiny of the central powers. I do not propose to take the time of the Senate to discuss even in a general way the many problems of the war. I have limited my observations to this particular phase of the situation, because it appears to me to be the controlling feature at this time. The peril of these iron fields is the chief concern of Germany and had more to do with forcing her proffers of peace than any other existing influence.

Every American is watching our Army, anxious and confident that the blows now being dealt by it will soon wrest from Germany the territory so imperative for her welfare, and without which she can not long maintain either offensive or defensive warfare. So long as the American Army occupies this important and perilous position, the American people must realize the tremendous necessity of giving their unlimited support. Great as is the task before us to raise revenue and organize industry and marshal the energies and resources of the Nation, it is not comparable to the strain and endurance required of our soldiers on the battle field. The daily casualty list reminds us that our boys are paying the supreme sacrifice. They are facing the fiercest fire of the greatest guns in the hands of the most skilled gunners the world has ever seen. The American soldier, without experience or education in the arts of war, is in a death grapple with the greatest military machine of history, at the very climax of the decisive battle of the war. As he stands on that battle front, on a strange foreign soil, and bares his breast to that bold and savage foe, he presents an example of the most heroic sacrifice in the history of war. The world recognizes that he is sounding the doom to German military might and freeing mankind from the threatened tyranny of the most savage foe that has ever menaced civilization. So long as the American Army is engaged in this momentous struggle the American people must bring to its support the combined resources of the Nation. The reply of the President of the United States to Germany's proposal demonstrates his far-sighted statesmanship and ability to handle peace proposals. We are not yet so much concerned with the problems of peace as we are with the mighty problems of war, which at this critical time must command all our energies and resources and consume all our thought and efforts. This is a momentous hour of the war, because both the civil and military forces are engaged in the most stupendous efforts they have ever undertaken. Those efforts must continue with increased vigor and determination. The retreating enemy is desperately seeking positions of advantage on the field of battle and the field of diplomacy. The forces of civilization are successfully subduing the powers of trained barbarism. The conflict is fierce and desperate, the sacrifice may be very great, but the forces of the allies are prepared to make that sacrifice and to wage this war to a conclusion of unconditional surrender of the armies and navies of the central powers.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENTS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment in order that I may make a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska withhold his motion?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 4637, being Calendar No. 526. It is a bill for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and I will say to the Senate that there is no purpose at all to take it up this afternoon for consideration. I should like, however, to have it considered on Monday next, and I merely wanted to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill, and then, if that motion is agreed to, have it laid aside until Monday.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire if that is the bill which is designed to pension the civil-service employees of the United States?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir; it is, in a way. It is for the retirement of the civil-service employees.

Mr. THOMAS. Has the Senator any estimate of the added expense to the Treasury?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir; I have all the figures, and I should like to lay them before the Senate Monday and let the Senate pass upon the measure, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I could not object to its consideration, but I have some views about the expediency of entering upon a matter of that kind now when we are spending so many billions in other directions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think when the Senator hears a statement about the cost and finds that instead of being a burden upon the Government, for the first 10 years it will be a source of income to the Government, because of the employees paying in more than will be taken out, the Senator will not oppose the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator knows the length to which the Army pensions have gone.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that, and I may simply say to the Senator that I think, upon hearing, perhaps he will be willing to agree to the bill; but at any rate, all I want to do now is to take up the bill, make it the unfinished business, and on Monday proceed with it.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not make any objection to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4637.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4637) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service.

ABANDONMENT OF GERMAN LANGUAGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article issued by the Council of Defense of Victoria County, Tex., suggesting the abandonment of the use of the German language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Issued by the council of defense, Victoria County, Tex.]

Sixty years of Germany in America—A tale in four chapters—"Where is the German fatherland? As far as the German tongue is spoken and German prayer is said." (German national hymn.)

CHAPTER I.

AN ADDRESS SUGGESTING THE ABANDONMENT OF THE USE OF GERMAN, PUBLISHED BY THE VICTORIA COUNTY COUNCIL OF DEFENSE JUNE 1 TO JULY 30, 1918.

The National and State Councils of Defense request that the use of the German language be proscribed among us.

The highest evidence of patriotism is self-abnegation. The customs and language of a lifetime are dear to the heart of every man. The traditions of a fatherland, even though remote, are part of the life of an amalgamated people such as ours.

But to-day all loyal American citizens must know no creed save that of a firm belief in the cause for which we stand—freedom for humanity; must feel no divided allegiance, and must follow only the guiding star that leads to full and complete victory for our arms.

There are loyal Americans among us to whom our country's cause comes first, but who, by the circumstances of birth or parentage, have learned to speak the German tongue.

This does them no discredit. They may look with pride upon true greatness in their ancestry. No man need hang his head in shame for German blood.

The crime of all the ages is the prostitution of that great people by militaristic masters, whose barbarities befoul the world.

Free Germany will follow fast upon free America.

In war we must break all fetters that bind us to those whose ideals are human slavery.

The German tongue is a language of our enemies.

As a high evidence of patriotism and love for those tenets of freedom for which our sons are dying we call upon all loyal Americans to abandon the use of the German language, in public and private, as an utmost condemnation of the rule of the sword.

A few there are who know no other tongue and are too old to learn another. To these only this demand is not addressed.

Your sons are in the trenches. Will you deny them this?

VICTORIA COUNTY COUNCIL OF DEFENSE.

CHAPTER II.

THE PETITION OF TRINITY EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH PRESENTED TO THE VICTORIA COUNTY COUNCIL OF DEFENSE AUGUST 10, 1918, AND PROMPTLY REJECTED.

To the honorable COUNCIL OF DEFENSE OF THE COUNTY OF VICTORIA, TEX.

After having taken due notice of the demand made by the local council of defense to proscribe the use of the German language among us in public and private, and as a congregation appreciate and further the more intense use of the English, as the language of our country, both in public and in private, as the history of the past four years of Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church proves, and knowing that the National Council of Defense and the State council of defense—and in like sense we interpret also the demand of the honorable council of defense of Victoria County—do not desire to work a hardship upon those who are not able to speak the English language; and that the National Council of Defense recommends not force but educational methods to bring about the common use of the English language.

We, the undersigned, appear before this honorable body in the name and in behalf of Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church, not to complain but that there may be better cooperation toward a common aim between Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church and the honorable council of defense, and ask that for the members of Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church who can not understand an English sermon and who, in part, are the parents of boys serving in the Army and Navy of our country now, and who can only worship and pray to God in the German tongue, one service per Sunday in the German language be permitted.

Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church believes that it is entitled to this consideration on the following grounds:

1. That there is no Germanizing influence in Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church. The name "German" justly can claim no space in its title, for during the past four years English has been making rapid progress in her midst. So rapid has this progress been that there are not only regular services in the English language every Sunday but that her organizations, such as the Luther League and the Lutheran Brotherhood, are entirely English. All instruction in Sunday school is entirely in the English language; also the regular catechetical classes are conducted in the English language. German is fast passing into oblivion, and within a comparatively few years will cease to be used in Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church. Why, then, by sudden suspension create sympathy for it now, even in the hearts of such who otherwise would sneer at it?

2. That the patriotism and the loyalty of Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church can not be questioned. This is borne out by the existence of a strong auxiliary to the Red Cross and a large surgical-dressings class, the reputation of which can easily be inquired into at the local chapter of the Red Cross or by a visit to Luther Hall. It is also borne out by the purchase of liberty bonds, not only by the individual members but by the congregation as such, the Luther League, and the ladies' aid organizations, and by her 51 sons who followed the call to the colors and among whom are represented both the volunteers and the selectmen, some of whom speak only the English language, while others speak both equally well. All of whom, however, if they were here before this honorable body to-night, would emphatically express the desire that their fathers and mothers be permitted to pray for their boys and for their country in the only language they know and themselves receive the spiritual comfort and encouragement they need at the public worship in their church. Dare we deny them this?

3. That the guilt of the neglect to learn and to use the English language can not be laid at the door of the citizens of German extraction alone. Business men catered to them in the German language, and even in the public schools German was taught. Why, then, should they learn another language when they could get along so well with the one they knew. It is therefore both gratifying and surprising to notice that in spite of such conditions the younger generation of the members of Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church possesses a good knowledge of English, which is the best argument for their thorough Americanization.

4. That Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church, through the undersigned, appears before this honorable body only after an actual test with the exclusive use of the English language in the regular services had been made and the hardships therefrom become apparent, and then only after voluntary and not solicited appeals came from 26 such members who can not understand an English sermon, requesting it to intercede for them with the honorable Council of Defense.

Respectfully submitted.

(This petition was signed by the present pastor and two trustees of the church.)

CHAPTER III.

REASONS WHY THIS PETITION WAS REJECTED, AS SET OUT IN ARTICLE BY V. B. PROCTOR, CHAIRMAN OF PUBLICITY COMMITTEE, WHICH ARTICLE WAS ORIGINALLY PUBLISHED IN THE VICTORIA ADVOCATE, AND WAS DIRECTED TO BE PUBLISHED IN THIS PAMPHLET BY THE VICTORIA COUNTY COUNCIL OF DEFENSE.

"Where is the German fatherland? As far as the German tongue is spoken and German prayer is said."

The above lines are an exact translation of the opening words of the German national hymn. It may be a lie, like many things put out by Germany, but the Germans believe it, and there is some foundation for their faith.

I wish every citizen of Victoria County could read two recent publications. One of these is a pamphlet, issued under the auspices of the United States Government. It is known as Number Twenty-one, and is entitled, "The Tentacles of the German Octopus in America." The second publication is one that appeared in the May number of the Forum, and is entitled, "Our Danger: To-Morrow's German-Americans." The limits of a newspaper article preclude any attempt to state the substance of either of these publications. They stress the one central idea of all recent German writers and philosophers, namely, that the German tongue must be perpetuated in all countries, so that there may arise thereon the structure of pan-Germanism with its hideous gargoyles of dual allegiance and hyphenated citizenship. Of course, the object of pan-Germanism is the undisguised one of merely subjugating the earth and making all the peoples thereof serfs of Germany.

Do you know that several months after America had declared war on Germany there were hundreds of public schools in Nebraska, Iowa, Michigan, and Wisconsin and other States which were conducting their entire exercises in German, and at which schools the morning exercises were usually begun by the singing of the infamous hymn above quoted from? This was the poisoning of the minds of hundreds of thousands of American children As an illustration nearer home:

As a witness myself, I can state that a number of years ago I had occasion to examine the municipal records of a town not 100 miles from Victoria, and I then discovered that the entire records of that municipality, for its entire existence, had been kept in the German language, and this was only one of quite a number of towns of the same character. Indeed, there are dozens of them in Texas, where German is the rule and English the exception.

There is a church in Victoria, known as the German Lutheran Church, but the correct title of which is "Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church." This church has been stablished in Victoria probably 60 years. Its pastor for some 35 years, immediately preceding the incumbency of its present pastor was a man who, however admirable otherwise he may have been, could not carry on the most commonplace conversation in the English language, and he was just as German in appearance, conversation, and tongue as any German in Germany to-day.

Several weeks ago the Council of Defense of Victoria County caused to be published in the Victoria Advocate an address to the people of Victoria County stating the views of the council of defense as to the use of the German tongue. This address was in most courteous language, and, in substance, took the following position: That a state of war always calls for self-sacrifice and, its attendant virtue, self-denial. That many people in our community have the habit and custom of speaking German. That almost every American family, in Victoria and elsewhere, has some of its own flesh and blood in the fighting line, facing such things as poison gas, shrapnel, and other bric-a-brac of hell, "Made in Germany." That the German language, of course, has a similar trade-mark. That it would be a gracious act of self-denial, and practical demonstration of patriotism, for people who had formed this habit of speaking German to cease such habit. The address closed with the following words: "Our sons are in the trenches. Will you deny them this?"

At the last meeting of the Council of Defense of Victoria County there was presented to this council a petition of the Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church, which petition is printed in full in this issue of the Advocate. A similar petition, with different petitioners, was presented to the councils of defense of the counties of De Witt, Colorado, Caldwell, and probably other counties in Texas. De Witt County had granted this petition, and the other counties had rejected the same. The Victoria Council, by a vote of 12 to 1, rejected this particular petition.

The attention of the citizens of Victoria County is therefore invited to these two things:

First. The address published by this council, which can be easily found in the Advocate of some two weeks ago.

Second. The language, purport, and objects of the particular petition which this council saw fit to reject.

At the request of a number of members of this council, and as chairman of its publicity committee, I am going to indicate some of the reasons that influenced us in rejecting this petition, and I ask that these reasons be considered by the citizenship of Victoria County, with the language of this petition before them.

First. This is the only petition that has come before this council on this subject. Therefore, apparently, there is no complaint as regards the spirit of this address anywhere save in one particular organization.

Second. If the previous address of the council and the petition are read together, no one can escape the conclusion that this petition was framed and designed to answer the address of the council, and to protest against it.

Third. It is plainly stated in "Ground 1" of this petition that if the German language is suddenly suspended "a sympathy will be created for it." Our council wants to know who are the people that will conceive this sudden sympathy for the German language. Also, if such people do conceive this sudden sympathy for anything German, will they not immediately manifest a corresponding lack of sympathy for something American? If there are any people in Victoria County to-day that are going to conceive, suddenly or gradually, any sympathy for anything German, language or otherwise, the quicker they are smoked out of their holes the better it will be for the public welfare. Therefore we do not think that "Ground 1" states any reason whatsoever.

Fourth. "Ground 2" is even more objectionable. It is camouflaged with a great deal of language about patriotism and loyalty, but just take the butter and the honey out of this "Ground 2" and see what we have left. We find left only a statement that the Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church has 51 sons in the United States Army, and the council of defense "does not dare deny these 51 soldiers the privilege of having their fathers and mothers preached to in German." This council thinks this is a calumny on 51 of our Victoria boys. We know no difference between the 51 sons of the Lutheran Church and the hundreds of sons of the other churches, constituting the over 800 soldiers from Victoria County. The council isn't going to deny anything that is right to any American soldier, whether he be a son of the Lutheran Church or not, but it likewise is not going to confer any special privilege upon or play any favorites among the boys of Victoria County and a covert threat does not sit well with this council that it does not "dare to deny" the use of the German language to the parents of 51 American soldiers.

This council is supposed to be a body, organized by the citizenship of the county, for the purpose of conserving the resources of Victoria County and keeping alive the home fires of American patriotism. The use of the German tongue is not necessary for the one and is calculated more than anything we know to put out the other.

Did the reader ever consider what thought really was? It is nothing but the framing of words by the brain though those words are unspoken. It is a doubtful psychological question in the writer's mind whether any brain can think good, honest United States patriotism in German words, but there can be no question that the best vehicle with which to express good, honest United States thoughts is the language of the United States itself.

"Ground 3" of this petition actually claims that the reason why the astounding condition prevails that there are 26 old people, members of this church, who can not speak the language of this country is due, in great measure, to the fact "that business men catered to them in the German language, and even in public schools German was taught." "Ground 3" then asks, "Why, then, should they learn another language when they could get along with the one they knew?" Is it not utter nonsense to attempt to lay at the door of merchants of Victoria the shameful neglect of these people in failing to learn the language of their own country, and is not the very fact that the language was spoken in the stores and taught in the schools an eloquent demonstration that both of these things should stop, and the suddener the better.

As to these 26 members who can not understand an English sermon, the writer asks these questions:

Name each one of these members, and name when he came to America, and how long he has lived here?

Did each such person come to this country to remain a German or to become an American?

Who kept these people from reading, speaking, or talking English, and who kept them from attending a church where the English language was preached, prayed, and spoken?

How many of these 26 have been forced, under the laws of the United States, to register as alien enemies and file their photographs and thumb prints with the United States authorities, and name each one of these so photographed and thumbed.

How long has each one of these alleged Americans, who cared so little for this country that he would not even learn its language, lived in this country and enjoyed its freedom, bounteous opportunities, and lavish hospitality?

How many of them are poorer in worldly goods than when they came to America, and how many are now willing to quitclaim to the United States what they have made in the United States, and go back to the German language and a German country?

Furthermore, it is stated in this petition, that for the "past four years this church has conducted most of its services in English." What did it do for the previous fifty-odd years of its existence? Is it not as much responsible for these 26 benighted persons as the "merchants of Victoria" or the public-school teachers? It is a fact—and the present pastor of this church has so admitted—that an American soldier was buried by this pastor at Victoria, Tex., and the funeral rites were conducted in German, and a German sermon was preached over his body. Do the people of Victoria County approve of this as a question of propriety?

There are also expressions in "Ground four" of this petition which state that "the hardships of the exclusive use of the English language are apparent." Again we ask that the citizen be named who is of the opinion that it is a hardship that he or she be required to speak the language of their country, and not the language of their enemy's country, in a time of a desperate and bloody war.

But the most conclusive answer of all to this petition is the one now stated. Just reverse conditions and geographical environments. Let us imagine a petition of an American church, signed by its pastor and two of its members, handed to any German organization in Germany, asking that that church be permitted to preach English sermons to 26 aged persons, members of that church and citizens of Germany, who could not speak or understand German, and actually stating in this petition that if this request was not granted, a sympathy would be created for the English language, and sons of this American church, soldiers in the German Army, would be offended, etc. As soon as the hilarity died down there would be a first-class hanging, and 29 would be the exact number hung, the 3 askers and the 26 askees.

Our country does not follow German methods. All of us over here believe in Christ, who, on the cross, prayed: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Even Christ's wondrous prayer, however, is not broad enough to embrace or forgive Germany and German soldiers, because they know exactly what they do, and not only know it, but they vaingloriously boast of it. If the German language is disgraced and humiliated—and, frankly, I think it is—its deplorable status can not be laid at the door of the "merchants of Victoria" or public-school teachers, but the corpse lies at the door of the German people themselves.

If we could spotlight this entire episode and see in the contracted lighted circle only 26 aged persons and their prayer for religious worship in their native tongue, and could exclude in the outer darkness all else, even such things, as the tens of thousands of likely petitioners with similar plea, the great tidal wave of Pan Germanism threatening to engulf the world in a second deluge, this time of blood and not mere water, the shameful lessons of Pan Germanism as written and taught by its satanic advocates and demonstrated by German troopers, its devotees, and, above all, could we so exclude and forget the sacrifice our own soldiers are now offering, then we could grant this petition. We can not so contract our vision. Pan Germanism is a world force, and in both structure and shadow is present in our land. From turret to foundation stone the structure is of German clay cemented with German tongue. Diverse tongues destroyed the Tower of Babel, but one tongue has built and preserves the tower of Pan Germanism. The building permit, however, for this unrighteous structure, and its maintenance, repair, and alteration, was filched from the careless generosity of the American people, and we think the time has come to cancel such permit, and for good cause. It is true this particular Victoria incident is but one brick in the building, and one brick may appear of little consequence, but suppose every one of the tens of thousands of such communities as Victoria each preserves its one particular brick, when will the building fall?

Nations, people with a multitude of tongues, are either despotisms or no man's land. There is no genuine, honest American household where the English language stops at the front gate.

Also, we have before our eyes the vision of some wounded American soldier, one of our own Victoria boys, returning from France and dropping in at one of these German services in his own town. After what he has seen with misted eyes, after what he has heard from pallid lips, after what he has suffered with smiling face, after what he has lost with unshaken nerve, what will he think of a German sermon as a rest cure at home? In his bitterness he may even think the bitterest of all thoughts. "What's the use?"

We predict that councils of defense who approve by their action of the German tongue anywhere or any time will have short shift "when our boys come home again."

This home-coming day is going to be the white-stone day of America. Why not put our houses in order now? Some of our boys will not return. Can we explain to the dead that we intended to stop everything German after the war? Why not keep the faith now and suddenly, and then afterwards, and then forever and a day.

Our council is not going to be misunderstood about this matter. We know no racial lines. Distinctions of blood are absurd, since in only 12 generations each of us have some 8,000 ancestors. We will stake our lives on the utter faith and loyalty of countless thousands of American soldiers and citizens of immediate German blood. The most useful American we have to-day, barring only the President, is of both German blood and name, Charles Schwab. We care nothing for pedigrees. It is the German mind, the German heart, and the German tongue, of which we disapprove.

In last Saturday's New York Times there is an article by Lafayette Young, president of the Iowa Council of Defense. He claims the fight in Iowa is not to make Germans Americans, but to keep Americans from being made Germans. He says the foes of his council are three—German churches, German schools, and German newspapers. He says the plea of these churches always is "that there are a few 'old people' who can not understand English." He says the German textbook is usually a panegyric on the Hohenzollern family. He asks if "anyone ever saw a real red-hot patriotic American sentiment in a newspaper published in the German language?" The answer is easy. If anyone lives as old as Methuselah and travels farther than the Wandering Jew, he never will see bona fide Americanism garbed in German words. Isn't the problem about the same in Texas as in Iowa?

The council of defense stated in its original articles of organization that "it knew no race and no creed, but that it would not permit Germanism on the part of any persons." It further declared that "Americanism was a matter of soul, not of racial lines." The council has not changed these articles of its faith, and it proposes to hew to these lines, regardless of who is hit by the chips. It does not believe that any American citizen should ask of this council the privilege of holding services in the language of the enemy's country, and such an enemy!

This council further believes in the absolute loyalty and good faith of the vast body of the citizenship of Victoria County, and thinks racial lines cut little figure in such loyalty. It is just as proud of "the 51 boys" from Victoria County in uniform as it is of any other 51 Victoria boys in similar uniform and no prouder. All these boys merely did their duty, though it is conceded that duty is the sublimest thing that can be done by any man.

This council repeats, however, that there is a lesson that a few yet in Victoria County must learn, and this lesson is a plain one if the heart is right. The lesson is: That we are fighting Germany, German soldiers, German methods, German ideas, and everything conceivably German, and there is no compromise in us, and we have just begun to fight; that America has already changed the goose steps of the German soldiers to the goose bumps, and we are going to continue the transformation process to all Germans at heart, whether they are in America or Germany; that between the United States on one side and Germany on the other there is an ever widening gulf of blood in which now lie some 20,000 dead and maimed American boys, and in which there may lie hundreds of thousands of the same kind. Before this war is over there will be hardly an American household that is not saddened by the loss of some near kinsman, if not one of their own very flesh and blood. This gulf between America and Germany is too wide ever to be bridged again, and no hands will ever be clasped across it. During this war and after this war there will be no more talk of the "old country."

Our State has seen the danger of the German language, and for many years we have had a statute prohibiting the record of any instrument save one in the English language, and the last legislature took a much-belated action in prohibiting the teaching of German in our primary schools.

We can have no "bits of Germany" in America. Inches soon become ells and bits bushels. The Stars and Stripes will show but faintly upon a background of German prayers or German sermons. All of the young men and women in this country know this, and, regardless of racial lines, each is zealously claiming the right to serve the United States, and why not? Each son and daughter of our own motherland is equally as dear in her sight. The trouble lies chiefly among those of the aged, who have kept their bodies in America and their hearts and hopes in Germany, who have been poisoned with such treasonable publications as the Vaterland, who have spoken the German tongue in their households, and cradled their American children with songs of triumphant Germany. Verily, trouble lies "where the German tongue is spoken and German prayer is said."

CHAPTER IV.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND TRINITY EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF VICTORIA, TEX., UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

There is in existence a letter, written, of course in German, by this very church to Mr. E. F. William Stellhorn, dated September 18, 1913. It is signed officially by the then pastor and seven trustees of the church. Two of these very signers subsequently signed the original petition set out in chapter 2. This letter is most edifying. In the main it embodies complaint of an Ohio synod which was evidently properly trying to get even some English into this particular Victoria church. It contains many strictures upon Rev. (then student) Paul Ebert, subsequently and until quite recently pastor of the English Lutheran Church at Victoria. Mr. Ebert's character and reputation in Victoria are amply able to take care of themselves. This council of defense indorses Mr. Ebert as a proven loyal American, a Christian gentleman, and a most admirable citizen. With this comment we can dismiss the Ohio and Mr. Ebert phases of this remarkable letter.

There is one portion of this letter, as to any use of English, which we will quote in correct translation:

"You further remark you have waited for years for our parish to begin English. We needed no English and need none as yet to-day in our parish. All of us can still understand German. Is it not wholly absurd to preach English to German people? What would Martin Luther say to that, Mr. Professor? Is it not true? What would you answer him? Now you wish to come and act as our guardian. That can never be. Why did you not come 61 years ago?"

Wake up! This letter was written when this church was 61 years old. It was written not at Bingen on the Rhine in Germany but in Victoria, Tex., on the Guadalupe, in the United States of America, September 18, 1913. Why, the utter supreme gall of this sort of thing!

The Victoria County Council of Defense is not going to give any German privileges to American citizens.

And, "Mr. Professors," this council has its compass set on George Washington and it will not shift it, even to Martin Luther.

THE VICTORIA COUNTY COUNCIL OF DEFENSE.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS.

During executive session the following conventions were ratified, and, on motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

EXTENSION OF ARBITRATION WITH JAPAN.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, an Agreement between the United States and Japan, signed at Washington, August 23, 1918, extending for a further period of five years from August 24, 1918, the Arbitration Convention concluded between the two Governments on May 5, 1908.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 29, 1918.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned the Secretary of State has the honor to lay before the President with a view to its transmission to the Senate, if his judgment approve thereof, to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, an Agreement between the United States and Japan, signed at Washington on August 23, 1918, extending for a further period of five years from August 24, 1918, the Arbitration Convention concluded between the two Governments on May 5, 1908.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 27, 1918.

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, desiring to extend for another five years the period during which the Arbitration Convention concluded between them on May 5, 1908, and extended by the Agreement concluded between the two Governments on June 28, 1913, shall remain in force, have authorized the undersigned, to wit: Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, and Viscount Kikujiro Ishii, His Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at Washington, to conclude the following Agreement:

ARTICLE I.

The Convention of Arbitration of May 5, 1908, between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, the duration of which by Article III thereof was fixed at a period of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications, which period, by the Agreement of June 28, 1913, between the two Governments was extended for five years from August 24, 1913, is hereby extended and continued in force for the further period of five years from August 24, 1918.

ARTICLE II.

The present Agreement shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, and it shall become effective upon the date of the exchange of ratifications, which shall take place at Washington as soon as possible.

Done in duplicate in the English language at Washington this twenty-third day of August, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, corresponding to the twenty-third day of the eighth month of the seventh year of Taisho.

DEVELOPMENT OF COMMERCE WITH URUGUAY.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention between the United States and Uruguay, signed at Washington on August 27, 1918, to develop commerce between the two countries and to increase the exchange of commodities by facilitating the work of traveling salesmen.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 31, 1918.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate, if his judgment approve thereof, to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, a convention between the United States and Uruguay, signed at Washington on August 27, 1918, to develop commerce between the two countries and to increase the exchange of commodities by facilitating the work of traveling salesmen.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 28, 1918.

The United States of America and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, being desirous to foster the development of commerce between them and to increase the exchange of commodities by facilitating the work of traveling salesmen, have agreed to conclude a convention for that purpose and have to that end appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States; and

The President of Uruguay, his minister, Dr. Don Baltasar Brum, Secretary of State in the Department of Foreign Relations—

Who having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

Manufacturers, merchants, and traders domiciled within the jurisdiction of one of the high contracting parties may operate as commercial travelers either personally or by means of agents or employees within the jurisdiction of the other high contracting party on obtaining from the latter, upon payment of a single fee, a license which shall be valid throughout its entire territorial jurisdiction.

In case either of the high contracting parties shall be engaged in war, it reserves to itself the right to prevent from operating within its jurisdiction under the provisions of this treaty, or otherwise, enemy nationals or other aliens whose presence it may consider prejudicial to public order and national safety.

ARTICLE II.

In order to secure the license above mentioned the applicant must obtain from the country of domicile of the manufacturers, merchants, and traders represented a certificate attesting his character as a commercial traveler. This certificate, which shall be issued by the authority to be designated in each country for the purpose, shall be viséed by the consul of the country in which the applicant proposes to operate, and the authorities of the latter shall, upon the presentation of such certificate, issue to the applicant the national license as provided in Article I.

ARTICLE III.

A commercial traveler may sell his samples without obtaining a special license as an importer.

ARTICLE IV.

Samples without commercial value shall be admitted to entry free of duty.

Samples marked, stamped, or defaced, in such manner that they can not be put to other uses, shall be considered as objects without commercial value.

ARTICLE V.

Samples having commercial value shall be provisionally admitted upon giving bond for the payment of lawful duties if they shall not have been withdrawn from the country within a period of six (6) months.

Duties shall be paid on such portion of the samples as shall not have been so withdrawn.

ARTICLE VI.

All customs formalities shall be simplified as much as possible with a view to avoid delay in the dispatch of samples.

ARTICLE VII.

Peddlers and other salesmen who deal directly with the consumer but who have no established place of business in a given country shall not be considered as commercial travelers in that country but shall be subject to the license fees levied on business of the kind which they carry on.

ARTICLE VIII.

No license shall be required of:

(a) Persons traveling only to study trade and its needs, even though they initiate commercial relations, provided they do not make sales of merchandise..

(b) Persons operating through local agencies which pay the license fee or other imposts to which their business is subject.

(c) Travelers who are exclusively buyers.

ARTICLE IX.

Any concessions affecting any of the provisions of the present Treaty that may hereafter be granted by either high contracting party, either by law or by treaty or convention, shall immediately be extended to the other party.

ARTICLE X.

This Convention shall be ratified; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Montevideo within two years, or sooner if possible.

The present Convention shall remain in force until the end of six months after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same, each of them reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at any time. And it is hereby agreed between the parties that, on the expiration of six months after such notice shall have been received by either of them from the other party as above mentioned, this Convention shall altogether cease and terminate.

In testimony whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed these articles and have thereunder affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate, at Washington, this twenty-seventh day of August, 1918.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 11, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, there are eyes that are weary with watching for the dawn of peace; there are hearts that are breaking at the violence done to the laws of love; there are souls that are longing for the permanent reign of justice and humanity. We ask Thee to bless every agency that is redeeming the world from the curse of this terrible war. We pray Thee that Thou wilt bless those who are fighting, those who are working, those who are giving, and those who are praying. Bless our legal machinery and our military and naval organizations. We pray Thee, O Lord, above all, that even though the cost be great we may have a clear vision and retain it, and we may have a strong faith and be true unto it. May our dear country endure hardness—the hardness that is demanded of a good soldier of Jesus Christ—so that when the victory comes we may have humility in our triumph and reverence in our use of power and kindness and opportunity for all men. And Thine be the glory through Christ, whose way to triumph was the bloody path of Calvary. This we ask in the name of Him. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, October 8, 1918, was read and approved.

RESERVE OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I want to speak to the Members for a moment. I would not ask this except on account of the disease that is now raging throughout the country, which is carrying off a good many hundreds of our people each day. In the city of Washington in the last 24 hours more than 50 persons have died as the result of this disease——

Mr. PADGETT. Seventy-two.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; 72 have died—I thank the gentleman—and more than 1,200 new cases have been reported.

Mr. PADGETT. Seventeen hundred new cases were reported this morning.

Mr. FOSTER. I am corrected again; 1,700 new cases this morning, and we probably have not reached the crest of the epidemic. As it is moving on west there will be thousands more cases and hundreds of deaths as the result of the disease.

The Public Health Service is battling as best it can to stamp out this disease, teaching the people how to prevent it, and how to care for themselves when they get it. As we know, there are between 30,000 and 35,000 doctors who have been called into the service of the Government, and in many localities, as is the case in the country in which I live, there are many small cities and towns that are without the services of a physician. I understand from my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], here on the Committee on Rules, that there is a town of 5,000 people in Pennsylvania where there is not a single doctor left. In other communities there may probably be a surplus of physicians that might be removed from one place to another. The Public Health Service believes that if it were given the power to commission these men and send them into the communities where they are so badly needed from the communities in which they can be spared it would be of great service to the people in this crisis.

The Committee on Rules this morning ordered reported out a rule to be presented to the House for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 63, to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service. The officials in that service say that they do not want any money; that the million dollars appropriated heretofore is sufficient for all their purposes. That is the situation as it is now.

Now, we know that we agreed last week not to pass any legislation until next Monday, and I am, of course, loath to ask that we should take up this resolution at this time. While I think that possibly conditions might change, so that no man would offer an objection to the consideration of this legislation which is believed to be so necessary for the health and to prevent the death of our people, I am willing to do anything that I can at all times, and I know all gentlemen present are willing to do the same that we may stamp out disease among our people and that we may save human life.

That is the situation, gentlemen. I know that no man will probably want to object to this legislation at this time. I bring it up and make this statement to you this morning, and if it is not considered this morning it will be brought up the first thing on Monday after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. Would not this be in the nature of an emergency measure?

Mr. FOSTER. It is thought so, and that is the only reason I speak of it. If it is passed at all it ought to be passed at as early a date as possible.

Mr. HEFLIN. The agreement, I think, would not touch a case of this character.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any request to make?

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution only if there is a universal opinion it ought to be passed. I have only stated the case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is not, I think, such a case as ought to be brought up here in the absence of a quorum and in the face of a private agreement. If we passed this resolution to-day, we would have to wait until Monday anyway before it could become a law, because the Senate is not now in session. It might just as well be put through on Monday, when a quorum will be here, and it will become a law just as quickly as if we were to pass it to-day.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Senate has already passed the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. That may be so; but it would have to go back to the Vice President for signature on Monday.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is not the Senate to sit again until Monday?

Mr. WALSH. That is what the RECORD says. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he thinks he will gain anything by passing it to-day?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it might; but if the Senate does not have a session until Monday, it would not be delayed very much, and I do not insist.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. I understood that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through Judge SIMS, intended to ask that the action brought out in recommending a substitute for the Senate resolution be rescinded, and that action be taken on the Senate resolution with an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad to have the gentleman state that.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is ill with influenza. I feel myself that we should act as expeditiously as possible; but in view of the fact that the Senate will not be in session until Monday, if we could give a privileged status to the resolution on Monday, Judge SIMS will then be present and give assent to the action.

Mr. FOSTER. In view of the statement by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that the Senate will not meet again until Monday, and not wanting to violate any agreement made, I withdraw my request for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 10609) allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange a post-office site in Eatonton, Ga.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4982. An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to save daylight and provide standard time for the United States," approved March 19, 1918; and

S. 4945. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad," approved April 18, 1918.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 331. Joint resolution authorizing readmission to the United States of certain aliens who had been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 3438. An act to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress;

S. 933. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent for certain land to school district No. 9, of Sanders County, Mont.;

S. 3225. An act to reserve as a part of the Oregon National forest certain lands that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. against the United States;

S. 4871. An act to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa.; and

S. 2493. An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12982. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to purchase from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a large dry dock and appurtenant lands; and

H. R. 12402. An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for a minute or two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know that the membership of the House are interested in the state of progress of the work of the Committee on Appropriations in connection with the pending deficiency bill. The committee will finish its hearings to-night. It will finish those hearings by closing them. There are a number of minor matters that the departments have brought to the attention of the committee informally, that they would like to submit, and that are in process of reaching the stage of estimate and submission; but the matters that are before the committee have been heard as fully as the opportunities permitted. I have personally had hearings every morning from 10 o'clock, and every afternoon and every night, sometimes as late as 12 and half past 12 o'clock at night. It will take some time to mark a bill of this magnitude. Of course, the hearings are for the purpose of enabling us to mark it intelligently. It will then take a day or two for the mechanical preparation of the bill in its final shape, and for the clerks to check up the items and see that the bill is in proper form.

Mr. MADDEN. Then it will be more than a week before the bill is reported?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I hope that by continuing to work day and night and Sunday, we will be able to present the bill to the House Wednesday morning, and to present it along with printed copies, so that if the House is desirous it may be taken up that same day instead of going over until the next day under the rule. That is a matter for the judgment of the House; but the bill is one of tremendous importance, and practically its consideration has forced a review of much of the entire Army program from its inception, because, as I stated the other day, you can not intelligently determine a deficiency without going into the question of moneys that have been had, and the total estimated expenditure for the fiscal year.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Can the gentleman give an estimate as to how long it will take to consider the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is entirely with the House. If the various items in the bill are discussed at length, you might spend a week or two weeks or a month in the consideration of it. Of necessity the committee is required to act very largely from the military viewpoint touching the major sums that are involved. Whether the House will feel disposed to act on that same basis or not is for the House to determine. The responsibility of the committee is tremendous. For my part I am always glad to have any sort of action that the House may choose to take, either affirmatively or negatively, touching any action that the committee takes on matters of such enormous magnitude as are involved. I do not think that even the membership of this House, conversant as it is with war matters, can have a full appreciation of the intricacy of the problem that is put up to the Committee on Appropriations at this time, a problem that involves matters that affect practically every activity known to man.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. A good many of us, like the gentleman himself, have been here during all the session since the war began. It just so happens that in our States those who wish to vote in November must go home and register, and we can not vote unless we do go home and register personally. The last registration day is next Tuesday. I want to go home and register. I would like to be here also while this bill is under consideration, and it would please me—though, of course, I would not have any right to ask other men to be inconvenienced—if the consideration of this bill should not begin until a week from Monday.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is for the House to determine. There is perhaps no man in this House who is ignoring more completely than I am his personal situation.

Mr. MADDEN. I am doing the same thing.

Mr. SHERLEY. I represent a district that has always been politically close, and there is a campaign on in my district. What the result of it will be the election alone will disclose. But I have a primary duty here on the floor. It is a duty of a magnitude that I would not voluntarily assume, but with the war coming on, all of us have had duties placed on us that tax more than our capacity. For my part I am going to continue at the work on that bill and bring it to the House at the earliest moment that I properly can, and then whatever the House wants to do touching its consideration, or the convenience of its Members, is for the House. I shall stay here until the bill is passed, because as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I owe that to the House and I owe it to the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The bill will carry about how much money?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not answer that. The estimates on their face run close to $9,000,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the bill be itemized, or is it largely in lump sums?

Mr. SHERLEY. It will follow the usual form of appropriation bills. The biggest items relate to the Ordnance and the Quartermaster Corps. The items under consideration as to the needs of the Army in connection with the Field Artillery and ammunition therefor will total something like $2,500,000,000. Those are carried in four or five items. Of course the committee has undertaken to go into the details of that, and the hearings, which will cover more than a thousand printed pages, undertake as far as possible to give to the House the financial side of it. It is physically impossible for the committee, except very incidentally, to touch upon the detail of expenditure and production and of all the matters that are engaging the attention of hundreds of thousands of men to-day.

Gentlemen, I am sure, realize that no committee working for an indefinite time can possibly hope to follow out all the ramifications of the expenditure of the money. All we have tried to do is to examine, as best we might with the facilities in hand, the financial statements to see upon what they were predicated. In doing that I think the committee has been able to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the officials presenting the estimates that in many instances the estimates submitted were not warranted by the facts.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it planned by the Senate to set aside the business they have in hand and take up the bill for passage immediately after its passage by the House?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not advised formally as to that, but it is my understanding that the Senate Committee on Appropriations will probably immediately consider the bill and, judging from other bills that have gone over from the House, will report it in a day or two to the Senate and the action of the Senate will only take a limited number of days.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the House allow me to propound a question to the gentleman from Illinois, the acting leader? Under the agreement that there would be no business done until next Monday, and under the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, will it be the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois to continue his motion to adjourn until next Wednesday, when the appropriation bill will be ready, or will the gentleman see that there is a quorum here on next Monday? Like the gentleman from Kentucky, I am here all the time, and am going to stay here, but if there is an adjournment of three days at a time until Wednesday there is the matter of the liberty loan at two places I would like to attend to.

Mr. POU. Before the gentleman from Illinois answers the question, I would like to remind him, and also the gentleman from California, that on Monday there will be an effort made to present the measure referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, Dr. FOSTER, and if the House is going to act on it at all it ought to act on it not later than Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Mr. RAKER. Will that necessitate bringing a quorum here, and if it should develop that there was no quorum will a quorum be brought here?

Mr. POU. I would not think that a quorum would be necessary, because I believe the matter will be considered of sufficient urgency to go through on its own merits—practically by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. The statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will undoubtedly be published widely because it is so important, and Members being informed that the bill will not be brought in until Wednesday many might not think it necessary to be here until that time, although on the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, Dr. FOSTER, that the measure he refers to is so very important, Members might deem it necessary to return to make a quorum.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will say that in accordance with the understanding and agreement as announced on the floor we expect a quorum to be here next Monday if a point of no quorum is made. That was the understanding over a week ago. We expect a quorum to be here when these important war measures are considered.

Mr. RAKER. And Members will not be notified that their presence is not desired here on Monday?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No.

THE PRICE OF WHEAT (H. DOC. NO. 1323).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Department of Agriculture, which was read, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, October 8, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of a copy of House resolution No. 429, requesting me to furnish to the House of Representatives with a copy of a report made by the Agricultural Advisory Committee touching the price of wheat on or about the 20th day of August, 1918, and a copy of a report made by me to the President touching the price of wheat on or about the 24th day of August, 1918.

With respect to the report of the Agricultural Advisory Committee, I will say that it was made on a matter which I did not present to it, which I was not handling, and on which no official communication was received by me. In reference to the report referred to as having been made by me to the President, I may say that it was submitted by me in an advisory capacity to the President for his information in studying and deciding a matter in the discharge of an executive duty.

I therefore do not feel at liberty to comply with the request contained in the resolution.

Respectfully, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that two weeks' leave of absence be granted to my colleague, Mr. IRELAND, who is making liberty-loan speeches.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOOHER, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for four days, on account of death in the family.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE—INFLUENZA.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes on the prevailing influenza.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, as we know, the number of cases of influenza are rapidly increasing and the death rate each day is growing larger. The Washington papers have stated that Washington is already crowded and that it is practically impossible for the boys and girls who come here to secure lodgings.

The doctors are overworked and the nurses are practically exhausted. In view of these facts, I am to-day writing to the young men and women of my district urging them not to come to Washington. I feel that I should do this for their protection. Many of them have waited for months and months to receive favorable action on their applications, and fear if they do not come they will not get another opportunity to do their bit. I therefore hope and trust and believe the Civil Service Commission will at once send out statements to the effect that no one should come here until the disease is thoroughly in hand and that no further appointments will be made, even though the applicant should come, until present conditions have been relieved. [Applause.] I do not believe the Members of the House should be forced to write to their constituents not to come, nor do I believe the Civil Service Commission will make same necessary, now that the matter has been, in a way, officially called to their attention, for I know they have the welfare of the young people thoroughly at heart. If I am mistaken, the House should pass a resolution urging the departments not to bring any more young men and women to Washington until the disease is under thorough control.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. I want to say that this is what is occurring in my section of the country: There are news items now being sent out from Washington by the Associated Press and other press agencies to the effect that the Government departments here in Washington are in great need of men to enlist in the Government service for work in departments of the Army as well as for work in departments of the civil government. These news items are daily and weekly being published in local newspapers throughout the country. One particular department in which I have been somewhat interested is the Judge Advocate General's office. The motor-truck service of the Quartermaster's Department and the Judge Advocate General's Department are two departments of the Army service which have within the past week been called to my attention as having news items published reciting that these departments are in great need of men to join these services at once as commissioned officers for service abroad.

This morning in my mail I received five letters from attorneys in my State, stating they had read in the papers notices that the Government was in dire need of attorneys to enlist and accept commissions in the Judge Advocate General's office for over-sea duty. For the past 10 months I have been frequently told by the officers in charge here of the Judge Advocate General's Department that they have several thousand more applications than they have places to fill in the Judge Advocate General's Department. However, these notices of the need for additional men are going out from that department and from almost every other department of the Government I have had anything to do with, and are being published in the newspapers of the country, and people in near and remote sections of the country are being led to believe that their services are badly needed by the Government in Washington, when such, of course, is not the case.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that the department is sending out these notices?

Mr. NORTON. Department agents are. I believe one of the notices to which I refer that is being published at the present time in the papers of my State emanates from agents or representatives of the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Mr. SEARS. I thank the gentleman from North Dakota. These notices are being sent out by some one, and it is these notices that I hope to correct. If some one does not introduce a resolution stopping it I shall next week introduce the resolution myself.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the statement of the gentleman from North Dakota ought to go unanswered. Is not this the condition in regard to the Judge Advocate General's Office? There are two or three thousand applicants now, and the Judge Advocate General's Office has sent out notices to the various supreme court judges, governors, and others in the States that they are asking to investigate the candidates, that they have more applications now than they can handle, and, further, that there is no necessity for men to come to Washington to be appointed in the Judge Advocate General's Office. The statement of the gentleman in regard to that office is contrary to the information they furnish at the office.

Mr. SEARS. The statement of the gentleman from California is absolutely true, but I take this position: The head of each department where these notices are going out should, over his own signature, state to the country there are no vacancies. I am not criticizing any department, but simply trying to get relief and prevent further crowding in an already overcrowded city. It is certainly not just to permit patriotic girls and boys to come here until this epidemic is checked, and to do so, to my mind, will almost be criminal.

Mr. NORTON. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from California that I am not endeavoring to, and do not mean to, make any criticism——

Mr. RAKER. I do not take it as a criticism.

Mr. NORTON. I am just stating the fact that notices to-day are appearing in the papers which mislead attorneys throughout the country to believe their services are greatly needed here by the Judge Advocate General's Office for over-sea duty, and practically very attorney in the country is being mislead into believing that he is needed at Washington at once. Similar misleading information concerning the need of men and women here in Washington in other departments of the Government is likewise appearing daily in the press of the country. The publication of these misleading notices is wrong and harmful and should be stopped.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Monday, October 14, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation required by the Bureau of Fisheries for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1321); referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Engineer Department for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1322); referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

3. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture in response to House resolution 429, requesting copy of report made by the Agricultural Advisory Committee regarding the price of wheat on August 20, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1323); referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an urgent deficiency estimate of appropriations required by the United States Public Health Service for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1324); referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 13059) regulating the personnel in the Coast Artillery bands; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13060) relating to chaplains of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13061) to authorize the appointment of additional field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, for service with the American expeditionary forces; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13062) to amend the one hundred and eighteenth article of war to authorize the calling into service of dismissed or discharged officers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13063) to permit organizations, units, and detachments of the military forces to sell kitchen by-products, waste, garbage from their messes, and to permit the Government to be the purchaser thereof; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13064) to authorize the requisitioning of lands, including buildings thereon, or the temporary use thereof, required for hospital purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DENTON: A bill (H. R. 13065) granting an increase of pension to Catharine Conn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JAMES: A bill (H. R. 13066) granting a pension to George W. Taylor; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OSBORNE: A bill (H. R. 13067) granting a pension to Ida Helene Davis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13068) granting a pension to Louisiana Thompson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13069) granting a pension to Alice H. Von Pinnon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13070) granting an increase of pension to Jacob B. Mundorff; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SNYDER: A bill (H. R. 13071) granting a pension to Melissa Roche; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

Mr. MAGEE laid on the Clerk's desk a petition of La Fayette Grange, No. 1330, of New York, protesting against the postal zone rate system, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SENATE.

MONDAY, October 14, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for Thy gracious favor, for the blessings conferred upon us as a Nation, for the indication that Thou art leading us forward to the accomplishment of a worthy end, in the fulfillment of Thy designs for us as a people. We thank Thee for Thy guiding victory. We pray that Thou wilt complete the work. Lead on the lovers of liberty and those who stand for the rights of humanity toward the completion of their glorious task. Make us fit for the battle. Make us fit for the victory. May we be willing instruments in the hands of God whether upon battle field or at peace table to accomplish Thy righteous will. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on October 5, 1918, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 4194. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4543. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4722. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PEACE PROPOSALS OF CENTRAL POWERS.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, the newspapers of yesterday morning printed what purported to be the reply of the German Government to certain interrogatories propounded to it by the President of the United States. What I am about to say, consuming a very few minutes of the time of the Senate, is based upon the assumption that that report is approximately correct.

Mr. President, speaking for myself, I am against a negotiated peace now as I have been from the moment the United States entered the war. I think I know the temper of the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent sufficiently well to say they share this objection. For four years Germany has run amuck among nations, during which she has wrought the greatest havoc the world has ever witnessed. In that time she has desolated Belgium, devastated France, strangled Serbia, wrecked Poland, and made a shambles of Russia. She has violated the most sacred rights of the United States by destroying women and children on the high seas and finally forced us to take up arms in the defense of the most sacred of human rights. In all that this Government has since done in prosecution of the war the President has had the support of both the great political parties and of the whole people to a degree never before accorded a President either in peace or in war. For four years Germany drenched a continent in blood without conscience or compassion. It has been her policy to leave behind her nothing but wreck, ruin, devastation, and woe. She has spared neither the property, the persons, nor the souls of men and women who stood in her path, and wherever the German heel has trod the ruin has been made complete. As yet no blade of grass on German sod has felt the pressure of a hostile foot. Not a field or vineyard of the Fatherland has been disturbed. Every German city is intact, every German home in order.

At this stage they see the turning of the tide, and in order to save themselves whole they say to the President, "Let us cease fighting where we are and from this time forth carry on the war by correspondence." They seek to be permitted to do peacefully what the armies are already compelling them to do at the end of the four most terrible years of all recorded history at much greater speed than they would employ if left to move without being hindered. Northeastern France is ablaze and the whole of Belgium a smoldering waste at this very moment. Fifty thousand American boys have died or suffered wounds in driving the despoilers back beyond the Rhine. I do not believe that the people of this country or our allies will be even momentarily content to barter with the Hun. Nothing short of absolute, complete, and unconditional surrender, carrying with it full reparation for the damage wrought, will be accepted or tolerated, and it is my belief that anything that has even the appearance of willingness to accept anything less will be taken as a failure to carry out the purposes for which we entered this war and will be resented with a unanimity and an emphasis that will permit of no misunderstanding. I think I have not misjudged or misrepresented the attitude of mind of the American people in making this statement.

Mr. President, the United States did not enter this war from any selfish motive. We desired no colonies, sought no commercial advantages, but took up arms in the direct interest of human rights and with no other purpose than that these might be forever guaranteed. But, Mr. President, in the 18 months during which we have been cobelligerents we have made sacrifices that can not be computed. The lives that have been lost can not be restored or compensated for. We have neither hope nor desire to regain the fabulous sums of money we have spent and may yet spend before the end is reached. But, sir, while all this is true, I do not believe that the American people will wittingly or complacently submit to seeing themselves placed at a permanent and irremediable commercial disadvantage through the medium of the terms of peace, whenever or wherever they may be submitted. I therefore think the time not wholly inopportune to invite the attention of the Senate and the public to one of the 14 terms laid down by the President on the 8th of January last and since repeated in some form on various occasions. I refer to the third article, which reads as follows:

The removal, as far as possible, of all economic barriers, and the establishment of a neutrality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

Mr. President, as I read it, if this article means anything it means the announcement on the part of the President of a purpose to write free trade into the peace treaty. It is, of course, possible that I may misconstrue the President's meaning, but I find myself unable to place any other construction on it. Nor have I been able to find one among the many with whom I have talked concerning it who takes any other view of its import. If this be indeed the purpose, and it is carried into effect, it would, in my belief, entail more serious financial consequences to us than those inflicted by the war itself. From these we shall in time recover but from the consequences of that kind of a compact we never should or could recover. I am aware that eminent Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber will disagree with this opinion; but, Mr. President, I believe it is sustained by the judgment and experience alike of a great majority of the people. Treaties with us are not mere scraps of paper. One participated in by as many nations as must be party to this one can not be lightly abrogated if its effects prove unwholesome. A mere popular election will not suffice. Once entered upon it would bind us hand and foot, almost, if not quite, beyond hope of relief. Therefore I repeat that I do not believe the American people will view the possibility of it with approval or complacence. It is not my purpose to discuss the matter at length on this occasion, but particularly in the light of recent and prospective events I do believe it time to direct attention to it that it may have the serious consideration which I fear has not been accorded it up to this moment. It is well that we should ourselves understand fully just what the nature of this proposition is.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Myers	Sutherland
Bankhead	Harding	Nelson	Thomas
Benet	Hitchcock	New	Townsend
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Trammell
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Underwood
Culberson	Kendrick	Phelan	Vardaman
Cummins	Kirby	Pittman	Wadsworth
Curtis	Knox	Poindexter	Walsh
Dillingham	La Follette	Pomerene	Warren
Drew	Lenroot	Reed	Watson
Fernald	Lodge	Sheppard	Wildey
Fletcher	McCumber	Shields	Williams.
Gerry	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Gore	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Guion	Martin, Va.	Smoot

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] on account of illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent, owing to illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PEACE PROPOSALS OF CENTRAL POWERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution. I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 314) as follows:

Whereas all treaties are made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

Whereas the German Government has indicated to the President its desire for peace in accordance with his views as outlined on and since the 8th day of January, last; and

Whereas any negotiation or formula for the establishment of peace between the United States and Germany must receive the constitutional sanction of the Senate, thus making its views on the subject of great present importance: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the program for a lasting and permanent peace among the nations, as declared by the President of the United States on the 8th day of January and thereafter, and those announced by the spokesmen for our several allies, including the recognition of Polish and Slav peoples as communities entitled to their independence and to self-government, collectively represent the attitude of the entente allies regarding terms of peace with Germany.

That the President's outline of a basis for peace, made with full knowledge of, and wholly consistent with, allied demands for reparation, restitution, and guaranties, does not supersede those demands, but supplements them.

Acceptance of all these conditions and requirements must, therefore, be embraced in any offer of peace proceeding from the German or Austro-Hungarian Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not at this time interrupt the ordinary procedure of the Senate. After the morning hour is over, if I can get the floor, I shall address myself to the subject of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Meanwhile the resolution will lie on the table.

MANUFACTURE OF PRISON-MADE GOODS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an additional report from the consul at Dakar, Senegal, relative to the extent to which prisoners, paupers, or detained persons are utilized in the production or manufacture of the commerce of the various countries, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 933. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent for certain land to school district No. 9, of Sanders County, Mont.;

S. 2493. An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916;

S. 3225. An act to reserve as a part of the Oregon National Forest certain lands that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. against the United States;

S. 3438. An act to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress;

S. 4871. An act to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa.;

H. R. 12402. An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes; and

H. R. 12982. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to purchase from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a large dry dock and appurtenant lands.

PEACE PROPOSALS OF CENTRAL POWERS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have here a communication, in the nature of a petition, from the Connecticut State Council of Defense, accompanied by a letter to me, which I should like to have the Secretary read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"CONNECTICUT STATE COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
"STATE CAPITOL,
"Hartford, Conn., October 9, 1918.

"Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed is a copy of resolutions which were unanimously adopted by the Connecticut State Council of Defense at its meeting on October 7, 1918. We know that you will agree heartily with us in the belief that it expresses the profound conviction of the citizens of this State that the present peace offensive of the central powers can not be regarded as bona fide, but that it represents an effort on the part of mid-Europe to escape the penalties of its moral and political criminality.

"Yours, very truly,
"CONNECTICUT STATE COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
"R. M. BISSELL, Chairman.

"Sent to President Wilson and members of Cabinet."

"RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONNECTICUT COUNCIL OF DEFENSE, OCTOBER 7, 1918.

"Resolved, That the Connecticut Council of Defense heartily rejoices in the unparalleled achievements of the allies. Bulgaria has unconditionally surrendered. Turkey is cut off from the Central Powers. The right wing of the Austrian Army is fleeing from Serbia. Its left wing is being steadily pressed out of Albania and Montenegro. The Italian drive is on the way. From the North Sea south all along the western front the allies are steadily driving Germany and her vassals out of Belgium and France. On September 9 in resolutions then passed by the council we said: 'We wait with confidence the day when American troops, under their own commanders, shall execute their orders and carry on a battle upon their own sector. They will emulate the valor and military skill of our allies, and we can not ask for more.'

"Three days later Gen. Pershing struck at the St. Mihiel salient and the American forces won in an incredibly short time one of the most brilliant victories of the war. The valor of our troops had been demonstrated at Seicheprey and in every conflict in which they have been engaged since.

"St. Mihiel told the world that the American general could conceive a plan of battle which is the admiration of military experts, prepare it to its last detail, and carry it out ahead of schedule time, successful at every point.

"All of this continued, triumphant progress is due in no small measure to the unity of command under that master of strategy and self-control, Marshal Foch.

"Germany is resisting desperately. As she is forced back she leaves behind her a waste of desolation and woe. No single thing that trained and ruthless cruelty could conceive of has been omitted. Her cruelty continues on land and sea. Every industry which could compete with Germany is destroyed. All that she can do to despoil Belgium and France that she continues to do.

"Germany is organizing her industry and her business so that after the war she may flood the markets of the world with her goods at a cheaper rate than any can sell for. Her industry and her business have largely been under government control. Her mercantile marine and her fleet are largely intact. Her present purpose is to secure an economic dominion upon which to build another world-dominion war. Neither the German Government nor the German people show the slightest appreciation of their crimes, nor the smallest desire to make reparation. They finally see that their doom is impending, and they ask directly or through their vassals that we enter upon negotiations for peace—'for an honorable peace,' as William proclaims, meaning a peace which will not strip the Fatherland of all the land it has seized, or the plunder its troops have taken, nor make her pay for the losses she has caused to the innocent wherever her troops have gone.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the council there should be no peace considered until Germany and her vassals are thoroughly beaten and her far-reaching plan of world dominion destroyed. We are opposed to any peace by negotiation, conciliation, or bargaining.

"Germany must be stripped of all the territory she has won, and her grip on territory, nations, and peoples adjoining her must be loosed. The safety of the world depends upon this.

"Justice demands from Germany and the German people and her vassals—and Connecticut insists upon that demand—that they make reparation for the damage and losses caused by them, and that they be compelled to give adequate assurances for the future and to practice lawful liberty to all. We are opposed to any peace treaty which does not substantially include these provisions.

"Resolved, That this council is opposed to every suggestion of an armistice while a soldier of Germany is without the bounds of Germany as they were at the outbreak of the war and while a single submarine is operating against the ships of the allies.

"Resolved, That the making of a peace treaty with Germany and her vassals at this time, unless preceded by an unconditional surrender, is against the interests of America and her allies and against an enduring and a just peace."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to read two very brief telegrams, which I think are typical of the feeling in the State of Connecticut, as I think the resolutions of the Connecticut State Council of Defense, which the Secretary has just read, are typical of that feeling. The first telegram comes to me from the town of Washington, which was the home of my predecessor, the Hon. Orville H. Platt, and which reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, CONN., October 14, 1918.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please convey to the President the following: The people of this community view with distrust any temporizing with Germany. We hope and believe that this Government will accept unconditional surrender as the first step of negotiations.

WASHINGTON WAR BUREAU,
S. F. SEELEY, Chairman.

The second telegram is from New Haven, and reads as follows:

NEW HAVEN, CONN., October 13, 1918.

HON. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Urge you insist Germans unconditionally surrender. No armistice; no compromise.

JAMES HILLHOUSE.

Mr. President, it is my firm conviction that any armistice at this time means the losing of this war. I can not picture to myself the German Army standing in battle array, facing the armies of the allies, while a joint commission, part of which consists of Germans, in whom the President has repeatedly stated that nobody can place any confidence and whose agreements are not worth the paper on which they are written, while such a commission negotiates.

If the allies stop fighting, Mr. President, and the war is transferred from the battle field to the council chamber, the allies will never resume fighting. The imperial German Army, even if it retires behind the Rhine, if peace should then be established, and Germany surrenders all the territory which she has invaded, the imperial German Army, then standing in Germany, would face upon her east a prostrate Russia, out of which a great imperial Germany could be built. Bulgaria, as soon as the army of the allies had withdrawn and disbanded, would again fall like a ripe plum into the lap of Germany. Every hero who has died and every man who has impoverished himself in attempting to help his country raise the money for this war would have made his sacrifice in vain. It would be a tragedy such as the world has never looked upon, that on the threshold of victory we had dashed the cup of victory from our own lips and had been seduced by a nation whom we have all been saying for the last three months it was useless to have any bargain or contract with.

Mr. President, there are three articles—one in the Washington Sunday Star of Sunday, October 13, by Frank H. Simonds, the military expert, who writes for the New York Tribune and other newspapers about the war; another by the military critic of the New York Times in the Times of the same date; and a third from the Outlook of October 9, entitled "With whom and for what are we at war?"—which I should like to have incorporated in my remarks in the RECORD, as they show the situation both from a military point of view and from a political point of view. If I may have that permission, I will content myself with simply reading the last paragraph of the article in the New York Times. It is as follows:

Either we shall stop fighting and make a patched-up peace or the war will continue for two more years, if not longer. It may, therefore, be said as the logical conclusion that if we grant an armistice before we are ready to make peace a military decision will have been averted and we shall have lost the war.

That, in my opinion, is the logic of the situation, and I will state that my position is and has been and ever shall be in favor of conducting this war as we instructed the President to do when Congress declared war, to a successful conclusion as a war, and pledged all the resources and every dollar and every man in this great Republic to that end.

I am in favor of conducting the war to a defeat of Germany in the field, and I am satisfied in my inmost soul that that is the only thing which will bring the change—the necessary change—in the German soul, and which will put Germany, the mad dog of the nations, where she belongs—behind the bars, manacled and fettered—and will, in truth, make the world safe for democracy or for any other kind of government that each nation chooses to establish for itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted to the Senator from Connecticut to have printed in the RECORD the matter referred to by him.

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Oct. 13, 1918.]

CAMPAIGN OF 1919 NECESSARY TO WIN WAR, MR. SIMONDS SAYS—NO MILITARY DECISION THIS YEAR LIKELY, AND UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER OF GERMANY BEFORE ARMY IS BEATEN HARDLY TO BE EXPECTED—GERMAN PEOPLE MAY PREFER TO PROLONG WAR IN THE HOPE OF BENEFITING BY NEGOTIATED PEACE.

[By Frank H. Simonds. Copyright, 1918, New York Tribune, Inc.]

"For three months, ever since Foch launched Mangin in the decisive counter thrust south of Soissons, our armies, the armies of all the nations fighting Germany, have been marching from victory to victory. Since Napoleon was defeated at Leipsic, a century ago, there has been no such amazing transformation in military history as we have seen in something less than a hundred days.

"As a consequence of military events and the resulting peace offensives, both Austrian and German, there has developed everywhere, but particularly in this country, where there has been no such series of disappointments as have tempered European optimism in the past four years, a quickly mounting conviction that the war is rapidly coming to an end and that the present will prove the last campaign.

"On the face of the military situation as it now exists this belief seems to me unwarranted, and I purpose in this article to lay stress upon the military reasons why it seems inevitable, on the basis of things as they now appear, that there will be one more campaign, and a campaign likely to make a supreme demand alike upon the human, the material, and the moral resources of the nations at war.

CHANCES 50 TO 1 AGAINST DECISION.

"It is well to recognize at the outset that there exists a remote but still patent chance that the German armies may in the two or three weeks left for active campaigning be decisively defeated, meet a colossal Waterloo or Sedan. Marshal Foch is unquestionably striving for a decisive victory, a win-the-war success, exactly like that sought by Ludendorf in the opening months of the campaign. Under the terrific pressure which is being exerted German military strength may collapse at any moment, but I do not believe there is one chance in fifty of such a collapse, given the practical certainty that within three weeks the weather conditions will place a final veto on further general offensive movements. If we had two months, or three, then the chances would be even, but we have, perhaps, no more than a fortnight.

"In the same fashion political developments between November and March may make further fighting unnecessary. Germany may surrender; she may offer the same proposals which have been accepted from Bulgaria, and she may be forced to offer such terms because of internal conditions, concerning which we are at best only imperfectly informed. Again, it seems to me that such a surrender is almost out of the reckoning, but not quite; and, of course, if Germany surrenders there will be no more fighting.

SURRENDER OF HUNS IS DEMANDED.

"But we have to face the situation which we have deliberately created. As a Nation we have said, and we have meant, that short of a German surrender we will not make peace with Germany. We have clearly demonstrated that we mean to continue the battle until the capacity of the German Army for resistance is exhausted, until the German people are compelled to recognize that the doctrine of force invoked by them at the outset is altogether false, that their army can not conquer the world, that it is not even strong enough to defend Germany herself against the collective strength of aroused civilization.

"This means, if it means anything, that short of the destruction of German military power by a victorious battle, or series of battles, peace can only be attained by the unconditional surrender of the German people to the will of the nations which are now at war with them, a complete resignation of all power to resist, an unqualified consent to accept, when their armies have been demobilized and their conquered Provinces evacuated, the decisions of their enemies in the matter of the payments for past crimes and the guaranties for the future safety of the world.

WHAT SURRENDER MEANS TO HUNS.

"In sum, Germany must resign not merely her grandiose dreams of Mitteleuropa, not merely her domination of Russia, still continuing, but she must resign in the world, for the present, that position which has been created by a long series of aggressive wars and has enabled her from the treaty of Frankfort to that of Brest-Litovsk to dominate European counsels. She must see the economic edifice which she created in Europe and out of it, at the expense of her neighbors and by the use of threats and blackmail, propaganda and corruption, demolished. She must consent to return to many of the conditions existing before the Franco-Prussian War politically, and in a sense economically, and she must consent to have her future, during the period of the new settlement, determined by the nations whom she has attacked. This is what surrender means: It means that the German must submit his will to that of civilization and take his chance.

"Now, does the military situation warrant the expectation of such a surrender at the close of the present campaign? Let us analyze the facts. We have by our victories of July deprived the German of the initiative, not for the time being, but for the balance of the war. We have by our August offensive turned him out of the lines of 1916, on which he accepted battle. We are at the present moment sweeping him out of the Hindenburg line. It is already clear that he will end the campaign at the Meuse and the Belgian frontier, and he has in two months and a half lost more than a quarter of a million prisoners, nearly 4,000 guns, and war material without measure.

"On the basis of what has happened since July 18, on the west front, we are justified in demanding and expecting that Germany will consent to evacuate the rest of France and all of Belgium, abandon all claim for indemnity or for the return of any of her lost colonies. Meantime, in the east, the victory of the army of the Orient has eliminated Bulgaria and broken the German edifice of Mitteleuropa into fragments. Coincident with this disaster has been the defeat of the Turk in Palestine and the creation of a situation which must inexorably lead to the surrender of Turkey on Bulgarian terms and the final liquidation of the estates of Germany's eastern allies on the terms of Germany's allies.

"At no distant date all of Serbia will be free, all of Bulgaria will be in our hands, the Turk will have surrendered or be at our mercy; Mitteleuropa, which yesterday reached the Euphrates and the Jordan, will end at the Carpathians and the Danube. Germany has only her Russian conquests left, and upon these her hold is precarious, while she has now to guarantee her Austrian ally against Roumanian as well as allied attacks at the south. And unless she can do this she must expect to see Austria at no distant time make a separate peace or fall into anarchy and ruin.

1914 BASIS WILL NOT SUFFICE.

"At the present moment, then, Germany and her Austrian ally must and unquestionably will make peace, if they can, on the basis of 1914. But we are all of us in America and Europe agreed that the basis of 1914 must not be restored. We mean to erect a stronger Roumania, a greater Serbia, to bar forever Teutonic expansion toward the south; we have recognized the Czecho-Slovaks in Bohemia, we have given unmistakable pledges with respect to Poland, we have in a very large measure committed ourselves to a program which, in liberating the Slavs of Austria and the Poles of Russia, insures the dissolution of the Hapsburg empire and the erection of a Polish barrier to Teutonism in the east.

"In the present mood of the world it seems to me unmistakable that any list of peace conditions would include a Poland which reached the Baltic at Danzig and comprehended Posen as well as western Galicia. In the same fashion we have accepted the view that the Jugo-Slavs shall occupy all of the Adriatic littoral save for the portions which belong rightfully to Italy. We have determined that Alsace-Lorraine shall return to France and we have resolved that Germany shall pay dollar for dollar and brick for brick for the terrible devastations of her army in Belgium and in France.

"All of this means but one thing. It means that the Germany which emerges from this war will be weakened as no other nation at war will be weakened; it means that the Germans will have to lay aside all the dreams which they have cherished for half a century—dreams of world power—and accept conditions growing out of their conduct of the war which will for a generation leave Germany crippled. I do not think there is a single one of the conditions which I have sketched above which is not consonant with the conscience and the sense of justice of civilization. I do not think any one of them is nonessential to the making of a safe peace and an honorable peace, a peace which shall guarantee the world against another tragedy. But granted all this, is the German military situation so bad that Germany will accept such terms?

GERMAN ARMY STILL STRONG.

"I do not believe this is the case. On the contrary, the German armies, despite great reverses, are still numerous, powerful, capable of sustained resistance. They have before them a whole winter for recuperation after a few weeks more of fighting, and they have behind them admirable lines of resistance still far outside of German territory. If we conceive that the Germans will halt at the line of Antwerp-Tournai-Mezieres-Metz at the end of the present campaign we may see them standing on the far shorter and stronger line of Antwerp, Brussels, Namur-Mezieres-Metz in the spring, or even at the line of the Meuse from Holland to the front north of Verdun, and behind this line is the line of the Ardennes. Last of all there is the line of the Rhine, strong, as we all know, and certain to be strengthened in the next months.

"Is it not conceivable that the German general staff will calculate that it can break the force of allied attack between the Scheldt and the German frontier by the end of one more campaign and that an exhausted world will at last consent to peace by negotiation, which will save for Germany not her conquests of 1914–1918 but her position of August, 1914, her position when she set forth on her great and tragic adventure? As it stands, peace on such terms as are conceivable means the surrender of all Germany's aspirations, ambitions, and not a few of her actual assets.

"The military situation of Germany is bad, but it is not yet sufficiently bad to lead German rulers and leaders to accept the only terms on which peace is to be had from the enemy. Napoleon refused better terms than William II can now obtain in the months between Leipzig and Fontainebleau; the result was ruin, but the alternative was the sacrifice of his dreams of European domination. For many months Napoleon believed that he could wear out his foes; that he could separate them by playing upon their mutual rivalries; he believed that France would rise against the invader in 1814 as it did in 1792. His calculations were wrong, but the German general staff is not likely to see more accurately.

WHY HUNS WILL FIGHT ON.

"It seems to me that the decision of the world—of the allied world—with respect to Germany is so clear, so definite, and so fatal to German hopes, to German future, that those who rule Germany are bound to fight on, because between the terms which are now obtainable and those which would be obtainable after military defeat—complete defeat—there is no great margin of difference, and there is still, for them, the chance, remote, but real, that they may escape the decisive defeat, and endure until war weariness and domestic unrest in allied countries make peace by negotiation inevitable. And peace by negotiation means the salvage for Germany of much—of very much—from the wreck.

"As I see it, the situation is this: The German general staff expects to escape any decisive defeat this year and to stand with its main mass of armies still unbroken on some strong defensive system when bad weather closes the campaign of 1918. Despite its losses of men, material, and territory, it will then claim that it has defeated the allied effort to win a decision and that it has demonstrated that no decision is possible and that the war must go on indefinitely at a terrible cost unless it is ended by negotiation. Then will begin a period of reorganization by the German armies for the next campaign and the fortification of new lines on the basis of the lessons of the present campaign.

PEACE OFFENSIVE THIS WINTER.

"Meantime Berlin and Vienna will launch a tremendous peace offensive designed to separate the rulers of the various countries—that is, the leaders from their people. They will make every conceivable verbal concession, put aside all claims for profit themselves, and argue that only the imperialistic ambitions of their foes prevent the making of peace. Such an offensive will certainly have a great effect in Germany; we shall have to be on our guard to prevent its making progress in our own country.

"We may assume that the peace offensive will fail; we may assume that the allied nations will stand firm and insist upon a complete surrender as the only condition of peace. Then, when spring comes, Germany will have made her plan for another campaign; she will retire to her selected positions, leaving devastated districts behind her, and strive to break our first offensive blows as she broke those of Nivelle and Haig in 1917. All of her still considerable resources will go into this first effort, and the German leaders may calculate that they will prolong the fighting for another whole summer and see the campaign end with the Germans at last within their own boundaries, out of Alsace-Lorraine, and behind the Rhine. In such a situation Germany may hope and will hope that peace can be had without surrender, with her position with respect to Russia unshaken, and with the essential integrity of Austria assured. This would be a far better ending to the war than is now obtainable. And there is always the possibility, certain to be counted upon by Germany, that some allied nation would weary; that, for example, the new election in Britain might turn out a victory for pacifism.

CAMPAIGN OF 1919 LIKELY.

"Short of a military victory this year, wholly improbable, I believe that there will be a campaign of 1919, because the only conditions on which we are willing to make peace with Germany are conditions which the mass of the Germans will not accept until their capacity for military resistance has been exhausted, and that is far from the case at the present moment. Frederick the Great and Louis XIV successfully defied Europe, after terrible defeats and even invasions. Germany hopes now to make peace on the basis of things as they were in 1914, while keeping alive the possibility of profiting from the destruction of Russia. But this means nothing more nor less than that Germany will consent to abandon now what she feels that she can not accomplish in the present war, and that she will begin on the morrow of peace to prepare a new attack upon civilization, building on the same foundations on which she built in the years before the present struggle.

"There is no middle ground for compromise between the world and the German; not to break his military power or compel him to surrender is to consent to the continued existence of his military machine; is to leave open for the future all the old avenues of attack upon democracy. Victory is not and will not be geographical. Frederick the Great lost Berlin, but won his war and retained Silesia. Victory is not comparative; it is in the nature of things absolute. The destruction of German militarism is the destruction of the German Army, whether by defeat on the battle field or by even more ignominious surrender in advance of the final blow.

"Looked at calmly, our successes since July 18 are only a degree more impressive than those of Ludendorf before that date. We have not yet progressed as far north of the Hindenburg line as the German got south of it in the spring. He took 200,000 prisoners and 2,500 guns; we have taken 250,000 prisoners and 3,500 guns. He has Belgium behind him and the lines of the Meuse, Ardennes, and the Rhine. He arrived within 40 miles of Paris; we are not yet as near as that to Brussels. He has lost a campaign, but we have lost the campaigns of 1915, 1916, and 1917. Bulgaria has quit him, but Russia quit us. Turkey is falling, but Belgium, Serbia, and Roumania fell and still we endured.

MORAL FACTORS AT WORK.

"Now, the moral factor can not be estimated and can not be exaggerated in its importance. The German may be morally conquered, but there is yet no sign of it. He is fighting doggedly, determinedly, and his defense is not a shade weaker than our defense between March 21 and July 15. He is fighting, not with the idea of victory in his head, but with a growing consciousness of what absolute defeat means. He sees about him the ruins of Belgian and French cities and Provinces; he knows that the same ruin or the price of the ruin must be found in Germany. His courage may depart or a wild and agonized determination to avert impending national ruin may fire him to still more determined resistance.

"I find about me a growing conviction that the war is over and that we are seeing the last phase of the decisive battle—that 'peace by Christmas' is assured. It may be so; but it is at least as likely that we are seeing the end of one more campaign in which there has been no ultimate decision, no breaking of the armed resistance, and no taming of the will of the opponent. For myself, I expect to see a campaign of 1919; I believe the German will still be in arms and fighting desperately when next spring comes, and that it will take all of our best strength to break his military power next year in a full and terrible campaign.

NEGOTIATED PEACE DANGERS.

"Negotiated peace is and will remain possible, if we are willing to make it, at any moment now. Between the present hour and the opening of the next campaign the German terms will grow more and more reasonable. The German maneuver to catch the weak, the blind, the weary of the enemy nations, to break the home front as it was broken in 1917, will be repeated. But the German is not likely to accept the only terms which he can obtain, because he is almost certain to conclude that he would do better to risk all the consequences of another campaign rather than accept terms which will not have become materially harsher if he fights and loses next summer, and may be greatly modified if he fights and postpones a military decision.

"This much, at least, is to be said and must be said: It would be the height of folly to make any calculation of any sort based upon the assumption that this year will see the end of the struggle. Two evils would instantly flow from such a calculation. Insensibly, but inevitably, war effort would slacken and equally inevitably disappointment would weaken our moral strength next year. By each of these weaknesses the enemy would profit; by both he might succeed in escaping from the defeat which must come if the war is to be ended properly.

"Reading history one may see that bad as is the German's present posture, nations have escaped from worse, as did Prussia in the Seven Years' War. That victory which, now assured, is only assured if we increase rather than lessen our effort and strengthen rather than weaken our determination. Two years ago we were just as sure of immediate victory as now and with almost as sound reason. Then the German peace offensive surprised and routed us. A new German peace offensive is in preparation, and there is the same peril.

"Constant victory, the interminable reports of the forecasts of captured Germans, the large scale map, the catalogue of captured positions, all these build up an optimism, natural, within limits useful, but dangerous when it gives rise to unbounded confidence in a speedy and complete collapse of the enemy. It took the Leipzig campaign of 1813, the Marne campaign of 1814, and the Waterloo campaign of 1815 to rid Europe of the Napoleonic peril and to destroy the Napoleonic legend. If we have won the Leipzig campaign this summer, we have done nothing more. We have not advanced a foot in Germany; we are still demanding that the German make peace on the basis of what we expect to do, not what we have done and not what he believes we can do. Our victory is still limited; our terms absolute.

"In sum, on the military side no allied success up to the present hour supplies any conclusive or impressive evidence that the German Army can be decisively beaten this year or that it will surrender rather than bear the cost in blood of another campaign. On the political side the peace conditions which we are agreed must be imposed upon Germany are such that the Germans may not improbably prefer to risk all the sacrifices and burdens of another year in the hope of escaping our present terms, satisfied that even if they lose that campaign they can hardly face much stiffer terms. On the moral side we know little, but two years ago, when we were counting upon a moral collapse of the German, our own morale broke down in Russia and Italy and was severely shaken in France and in Britain as a result of the German peace offensive.

BOTH SIDES FAIL TO UNDERSTAND.

"All through this war there has been nothing more striking than the utter failure of the people of the two contending groups to grasp in any degree the actual state of mind of the enemy. We have been wrong just as often as the German. We have again and again been convinced that German masses were eager for a surrender peace; we have been convinced that a starving Germany was on the point of throwing off its rulers and embracing democracy and peace, and at the critical moment we have found that we had calculated on our hopes rather than with regard to the facts.

To-day the German people may be willing to surrender, they may compel their generals and their statesmen to abandon the struggle and pay the price of surrender. They may, on the other hand, be in the mood of France after Sedan, when the people rose to the defense of the nation. Until the German Army is decisively beaten we shall not be assured of peace, and the German Army is much further from decisive defeat than was French military power after the opening disasters of 1870. We have never yet failed to blunder when we based our military and political calculations upon what we believed to be the German state of mind and the German situation materially, and all our past mistakes have led to disastrous disappointments.

NO COMPROMISE IS POSSIBLE.

"The issue between the German and ourselves is one that can not be settled by compromise. Either he or we must surrender, and for either surrender means the abandonment of national faith. Bernhardi said nearly a decade ago that the issue of the next war for Germany would be 'world power or downfall.' Time has not changed the issues, nor can the German now escape downfall by any other means than arms. Therefore it seems wisest to believe that he will fight on until he can fight no more, conscious that his fate then will be but little worse than it would be should he surrender now.

"As I close this article, on Monday, October 7, the world is discussing the latest German peace offensive. But nothing which has yet been disclosed with respect to this offensive modifies the views expressed above and in earlier articles. Germany is seeking to acquire immunity for the past and preserve her army and the Prussian tradition for the future. She proposes not surrender, but compromise. She is willing to bargain, but the very proposal to bargain indicates that she does not believe that surrender is necessary.

"By the campaign of 1918 we have brought Germany to the point of resigning her plan to impose her terms of victorious peace upon a conquered world. I see nothing now to suggest that short of the campaign of 1919 we can bring the enemy to accept those terms which we all agree must be the foundation of the future, the basis of any just and enduring peace. We have driven the wild beast back into the jungle, but he will return if we do not pursue him into his own fastnesses."

FOE'S DILEMMA IN FRANCE ANALYZED BY MILITARY CRITIC—FOCH IS TRYING TO FORCE DISASTER FOR KAISER'S ARMIES, WHILE THEY TRY DESPERATELY TO EXTRICATE THEMSELVES WITHOUT LOSING HUGE ACCUMULATION OF SUPPLIES—GRAVE DANGER TO ALLIES' MILITARY TRIUMPH IF AN ARMISTICE SHOULD BE GRANTED.

[By the military expert of the New York Times. Copyright, 1918, by the New York Times Co.]

"The past week has crowded the press with reports of allied victories on a scale which the war has not seen before from the beginning. At almost every point from the North Sea to Verdun the German tide has been receding.

"In the north, where the pressure has not been constant, the retrograde movements have been conducted without direct pressure on the part of the allies. The movement has progressed quietly and the German troops have made good their escape as far as they have gone. In the south, however, they have been in serious difficulties. But, in calculating upon a German retreat, we must bear in mind the purpose of Foch's strategy.

"His object is not primarily to force a retreat. In fact, he does not want a retreat at all unless he can force it to take place along lines which he himself is dictating. His object is, first, to destroy the German reserves, to deplete the army so that, when he is ready to administer the final blow, the power of resistance will be reduced to a minimum. If, in the process, the German Army is forced to retreat, it will be forced to abandon the supplies which it has gathered together during four years of occupancy of France and Belgium, together with much of its artillery, and return to its new and, possibly, its final line, a much weakened and badly crippled army.

"The Germans, on the other hand, are determined not to retreat at all until they can do so under conditions favorable to themselves. To fall back now would be to invite serious difficulties which would embarrass them for the remaining days of the war. They are, therefore, playing a waiting game, trying to hold on until winter comes.

"This situation forces them to take desperate chances. Even though they may be driven into a military situation which is almost impossible, they are compelled to hold on and trust that they will be able to escape in time before the débâcle comes.

FIGHTING NEAR CAMBRAI.

"The principal actions of the week have occurred on the front between St. Quentin and Cambrai. There are several reasons why this section of the front is considered by the allied commander as the most vital in the west. The strength of the German position has rested primarily on the chain of bases which extend from Rheims to the North Sea, a chain admirably connected by railroads and having numerous secondary means of communication. The foundation of the chain in the north is Lille, while in the south it is Laon. The center of the chain was Cambrai.

"But Laon is more than the southern pillar of the north-and-south line. It is also the pivot of the line where it swings to the eastward and supports the eastern line in the Champagne. This chain might be broken in the north by an extension of the attacks at Lens and in Flanders, which would envelop Lille and squeeze the Germans out. But in this event the Cambrai positions would still remain intact and the line in the south could remain steadfast in spite of the successes in the north. Success south of Cambrai, however, would flank the latter city, force the Germans out of it, but would at the same time throw the allies well to the east of St. Quentin and force the Germans back to the Oise River. This would in turn half surround Laon, and if persisted in would drive the Germans from this important angle, releasing the troops in the Champagne. This is the principal reason why the allied attacks have centered between Cambrai and Laon. This would seem to negative the idea that Foch is primarily concerned with the destruction of the army and not with forcing a strategic retreat.

"But there is no real inconsistency. If the chain of bases could be badly broken, not through the destruction of a single link but through the disruption of the entire system of transportation, the Germans might get out. They would, however, lose many thousands of men in the process, and, most important of all, they would have to abandon much of their stores and supplies, so that the retreat would, after all, tend strongly to the destruction of the army as a well-armed and thoroughly equipped fighting body.

FOCH'S STRATEGIC GAME.

"A few words will show how this general strategy has worked out. The early part of the week was devoted to minor operations on this front. There was some very hard fighting by the British, but nothing like a general engagement was attempted. Presumably these earlier operations of the British were for the purpose of getting necessary military information.

"Then came a terrific attack, participated in by British, French, and Americans. The Germans were struck on the entire front between Cambrai and St. Quentin. Their entire line gave way. Previous inroads into the German positions by the British had brought the British lines close to the end of the Hindenburg defensive zone. The last attack carried them clean through the defensive area and out into the open.

"This was more than the Germans had bargained for. It was no part of their game to meet a superior army in the open. And the allies are superior in all that goes to make up a military force. It was necessary to stage a retreat as quickly as possible. This was done, the allies using cavalry and small tanks on a large scale to follow closely. One line after the other was crossed, Le Cateau was taken, and the British pushed on and beyond the Selle River.

"In the south the Germans were also seriously affected. The French, operating on the right flank of the attacking force, swept east of St. Quentin and reached the line of the Oise practically all the way from La Fere to the great bend near Longchamps. This immediately drew the line in the north tightly about Laon, leaving the area of the city guarded only by the Oise River. The result in the north was to stretch the British line all along the southern bank of the Sensee Canal, the most eastern point of the line being 35 miles east of the most western part near Arras. In other words, the German line is outflanked by that distance.

"The conditions on the western front may most easily be grasped by considering it in two sections. One is a huge semicircle, roughly, the horns of which are at Solesmes on the Selle River in the south and at Nieuport in the north. The radius of this curve is about 35 miles and contains, at distances varying from 30 to 20 miles, the important bases of Lille and Douai.

"The northern part of the curved area is guarded by the Lys River. The allies hold the northern bank entirely and the Germans the southern bank. No attempt has been made to force a crossing, this part of the front having been relatively quiet since the Belgian attack of 10 days ago, which first completed the northern part of the circle.

"The southern half of the circle is formed by the line from a point east of Arras to Solesmes. This section is guarded by the Cojeul River and the Sensee Canal, the Germans holding the northern bank, the allies the southern. Here the British have made several attempts to force a crossing. On one occasion they really got across and took the town of Arleux, but a heavy counterattack drove them back across the canal. Thus the Germans would appear to have their flanks in the north carefully guarded.

"The southern semicircle, which is the second part of the line we need consider, begins at Longchamps, on the Oise, follows the river around as far as La Fere, and then, curving around to the east, follows the Ailette and later the Aisne.

"Here we have a condition similar in many respects to the northern curve. The northern flank of the Germans is guarded by the Oise River, which is a most effective barrier. It has not, so far as we know, been under attack, the French having just reached it as this is being written. The southern flank is guarded by the Ailette and then by the Aisne, the semicircle being complete at Berry-au-Bac. The Ailette front is just as securely guarded as is the Oise front in the north. The Ailette itself is not much of a barrier, but the steep hills which rise from the valley of the river make it an obstacle of great defensive value.

"The danger point is found near where the Ailette turns north. This is the only unguarded section of the entire German line.

If the French can push their lines but a little farther eastward and clear the line of the Aisne as far as Berry-au-Bac there is every likelihood of their being able to cut off Laon from the east by an advance northward from Berry-au-Bac.

"It is possible that the Germans may yet disappoint the allies and get away, but minus a large part of their military paraphernalia. Their method of retreat has always been the same; it consists in holding tightly on the flanks and gradually drawing away the center, the sides gradually yielding as the center pulls back. For this operation the Germans, as we have seen, are admirably located. They can not, of course, get away clean, but they can escape disaster unless Foch is able to crush in the sides of their defense before the center can get far enough eastward.

"There can be no doubt of a German retreat. It is inevitable. Germany may be able to delay it for a few days longer at great risk to herself, but it is certain to come.

"Distinctive features of the week's fighting are also seen in the operation of the French and American forces between the Meuse and Rheims. The Americans have completely cleaned out the Argonne in one of the most tenacious bits of fighting we have recently seen. It has been brilliant work, well carried out, and of great importance. It practically clears out of the way all obstacles of terrain between the Argonne and Sedan.

This operation has one great value—it prevents the Germans from occupying for any great length of time any line west of a line through Grand Pre and Mozieres. This has been one of the main objects of the American action and illustrates the farsightedness and calculating ability of the allied commander. Foreseeing that his blows farther west were going to force a German retreat, he planned the attack of the American forces to prevent that retreat from stopping too soon. Any position which the Germans might take west of the line mentioned would be in immediate danger of being taken in the rear by the allied advance between the Aisne and the Meuse.

EARLY PEACE PROBABLE.

"With the Germans giving ground on all sides it is thought in many quarters that the war is over, and that we shall have peace before the new year. That will depend on just what kind of a peace we mean.

"We can have peace tomorrow if we wish—a German peace, a peace made around the council table on a basis of compromise. But if we still hold that there can be no compromise between right and wrong, that you can not arbitrate murder and piracy and pillage—if, in short, we hold that the only peace we will accept will be a German surrender, there is no probability of peace this year, certainly not before summer of next year.

"What Germany will do, what she is doing, is to fall back to shorten her lines. She can take up a line back of the Meuse River over a hundred miles shorter than her present lines and thereby add from three-quarters of a million to a million men to her fighting strength. Her position will be admirably suited for defense and will involve a great deal of fighting before it can be taken.

"The end is in sight for the first time since the war began, but it is still some distance ahead. It is useless to deceive ourselves on facts which are so patent. We are merely yielding to our sentiment and not to our understanding.

"The crying need for the moment for Germany is time. Her armies are for the most part in an impossible military situation, the extrication from which can be accomplished only with difficulty. It can not be accomplished at all except with grievous loss unless Germany has time.

"She has accumulated in France and Belgium since 1914 mountains of supplies of all kinds. Shell has been sent to the front for offensive and defensive purposes in enormous quantities. These represent millions of dollars of expenditure. Her organization of depots, of repair and replacement facilities, of billets, has been without limit. For the four years of the war this feature has gone on concurrently with the military operations and on an ever-increasing scale.

"Now, as a result of the allies' incessant hammering, she finds herself confronted with retreat or disaster. For various reasons the retreat can not be a small affair, but must involve the entire front from Rheims to the sea. There is not sufficient transport in the world to remove Germany's accumulations from the danger zone in a short space of time. And the allies, realizing their advantage, are pressing the situation with all possible speed.

THE GERMAN SCHEME.

"Germany, seeing the processes of destruction at work, begs for time, her petition coming to us in the nature of a peace proposal. She wants an armistice. Without going further into the matter, it may be stated that two results will doubtless flow from a cessation of fighting: The first is that, no matter what may happen, even should we discover at the last moment that the German proposal was but another hoax, another lie, another example of a plighted faith broken, once the fighting is stopped for any appreciable time the war will be over. It is hardly possible to conceive that, once arms are laid down, they can be taken up again. The heart of the soldier, his morale, will be gone. There will no longer be the spirit for fighting of which victorious armies are made.

"The second point is that if Germany is granted the time she wants and for which she will do anything, give anything, say anything, promise anything, she will utilize it in withdrawing her arms, her mountains of supplies, her artillery, her shell, and her men to a much shorter and much more powerful line, a line possibly behind the Meuse, through the French and Belgian Ardennes, before Metz, and down the Vosges Mountains, and there she will stay. She will have shortened the battle front over a hundred miles and will be able to hold it with a million less men. Everything that we have done since July 18 will thus be scrapped. Our losses will have been for nothing.

"Either we shall stop fighting and make a patched-up peace or the war will continue for two more years, if not longer. It may, therefore, be said, as a logical conclusion, that if we grant an armistice before we are ready to make peace, military decision will have been averted and we shall have lost the war."

WITH WHOM AND FOR WHAT ARE WE AT WAR?

[By an expert in international law.]

"In discussing this war we often speak of it as a war between nations, and speak of the German Empire as if it were a nation subject to the rules and entitled to the benefit of international law; but the Kaiser and his associates in the Prussian military autocracy have put themselves outside the pale of international law. Long before the war began the Kaiser declared, 'Nothing must henceforth be settled in the world without the intervention of Germany and the German Empire.' By international law, however, 'nations are equal in respect to each other and entitled to claim equal consideration for their rights.'

"So far from being satisfied with the natural development of her manufactures, her agriculture, and her commerce, the German leaders maintained the right and the duty to make war for the acquisition of territory and the destruction of rivals. Bernhardi declared, 'France must be so completely crushed that she can never again cross our path.'

"In reference to the conduct of war they were even more audacious. Nietzsche describes the German warriors: 'These men are, in reference to what is outside their circle (where the foreign country begins), not much better than beasts of prey. * * * They feel that they can revert to the beast-of-prey conscience like jubilant monsters who, perhaps, go with bravado from the ghastly bout of murder, arson, rape, and torture.' This description has been realized during the present war.

"It is true that before the war the Imperial Governments went through the form of sending delegates to international conventions. The most notable of these was at The Hague, in 1907. In one of the conventions adopted at The Hague, and signed by the delegates of Germany and Austria, it was agreed: 'Arbitration is recognized by the contracting powers as the most effective and at the same time the most equitable means of settling disputes which diplomacy has failed to settle.' In order to facilitate immediate recourse to arbitration, an arbitral tribunal had been established.

"Another convention, signed by the same delegates, regulated the laws of land warfare. Among other things, it was agreed that prisoners of war should not be employed in works that had any connection with the war operations. 'All necessary measures should be taken to spare as far as possible buildings devoted to religious worships, arts, science, and charity, historical monuments, and places of assembly of sick and wounded.' 'The honor and the rights of family, the life of individuals, and private property should be respected.' 'Private property shall not be confiscated.' Contributions in money in occupied territory shall be levied 'only for the needs of the army or of the administration of said territory.' 'Looting is positively forbidden.' Hospital ships shall be respected. The bombardment of undefended cities or villages is forbidden. 'It is forbidden to lay submarine mines off the coasts and ports of the enemy with the sole object of interrupting commercial navigation.'

"Long before these conventions were made it was a principle of international law that a merchant vessel should not be captured without giving to the passengers and noncombatants on board an opportunity to depart in safety.

"From the beginning of the war every one of these sacred rules has been persistently and brutally violated by the Germans and the Austrians. With the approval of Germany, at the outset Austria refused to arbitrate the matter in difference between herself and Serbia. They have thus placed themselves outside the pale of civilized communities and have become nothing more than organized bands of pirates, entitled to no more consideration than were the buccaneers. These also had a certain rude government. Their principles of action were similar to those of the Germans and Austrians in this war. They were finally suppressed.

"It is our business in this war to suppress the buccaneers of the twentieth century. We shall win the war. Overtures for peace will be made, as they have been made, the design of which has been and will be to enable these pirates to retain as much of their booty as possible. Such peace would simply give them an opportunity to repair their losses and renew their attacks upon peaceful nations. What, therefore, we ought to obtain may be summed up in one famous phrase: 'Indemnity for the past and security for the future.'

"To gain these results we ought to impose upon the conquered Imperial Governments of Germany and Austria terms which will execute themselves and will not be dependent on the good faith of those who have shown by their actions that they have no sense of honor, and love a lie more than the truth.

"Before considering the terms in detail, let us note the analogy between the situation of the allies in this war and that of the United States in 1865. Then, as now, we were fighting for fundamental principles. It was impossible for the United States to permit for a moment the dissolution of the Union or the continuance of a government founded on slavery. As Mr. Lincoln said in 1858—and the words are equally true to-day:

"The real issue in this country is the eternal struggle between those two principles—right and wrong—throughout the world. They are the two principles which have stood face to face from the beginning of time, and will ever continue to struggle. The one is the common right of humanity, and the other the divine right of kings. It is the same principle in whatever shape it develops itself. It is the same spirit that says, 'You work, and toil, and earn bread, and I'll eat it.'

"To establish forever the principles of justice and freedom, which are the foundation of the American Constitution, we refused again and again to make any terms with the Confederate Government which involved its continuance or the continuance of slavery. We did not count the cost, either in life or in money, and we were deaf to every overture. We repeatedly offered protection to the rights of individuals in the South and compensation for emancipation. But on the two main points, the continuance of the Union and the abolition of slavery, we were inexorable. It is equally important now that we refuse any propositions for peace which will not include the destruction of the Prussian and Austrian autocracy and compensation, as far as possible, for the countless woes it has brought upon the world.

"The details are far more complicated than they were at the end of the Civil War, but the principles are the same. Let us consider these details.

"Indemnity for the past.

"This indemnity should be based on the fact that it is the Prussian military system that is responsible. Indemnity, therefore, should be taken, not in the form of a Government payment but by a seizure of the property of the guilty. Indemnity from the Government could be raised only by a loan. The taxes which would be levied to pay the interest on this loan would come in part, at least, out of the plain people. These have been deceived by a persistent system of falsehood, and thus have been like sheep led to the slaughter.

"It is claimed by some that the great commercial and manufacturing interests of Germany and Austria joined from the first with the military caste, and that the war was the development of their joint greed and ambition. Whether this be so or not, it is at least clear that the commercial and manufacturing interests of Germany and Austria could have prevented the war. Whether or not, therefore, they actually promoted it at the outset is unimportant. They are jointly responsible. Some of their property in the allied countries has already been seized. Whenever their property can be found in these countries, that should in like manner be seized. Their property in the central Empires should equally be appropriated at the end of the war. The vast fund which would thus be available should be applied to make good the actual losses which have been inflicted upon the people of Belgium, France, Italy, Serbia, and Roumania. The German Government is responsible for the Turkish atrocities committed against the Christians. For these also reparation should be made.

"When this is done, a suitable amount should be appropriated toward paying the expenses of the war which has been forced upon the allies. There would be a remnant which should be applied to the relief of the suffering of the plain people of Germany. There will be at the end of the war innumerable widows, orphans, and wounded men in the central empires who can not justly be blamed for the crimes that have been committed. It is very important that some provision should be made for them, so that in the countries now under the sway of the two Kaisers there should be hereafter an opportunity for the plain people to develop a new and better national life. In this way it will appear to the people of these countries that our object is justice and not vengeance.

"A very important part of this system of compensation is the taking over of all the German and Austrian ships that have been seized during the war. This will constitute a partial and appropriate indemnity for the ships that have been piratically sunk.

"Another and very important part of indemnity for the past is the punishment of the great criminals. Here again we have an American precedent. There was a German named Wirz who held a commission under the Confederate Government and was put in charge of the prison at Andersonville. In violation of the laws of war he caused to be killed many of these prisoners. When the war was over he was arrested and tried before a competent court for murder. The specification was that he had put to death, in violation of the laws of war, certain men who were prisoners in his custody. He was found guilty, condemned to death, and executed. We thus established the principle that killing men, even during war and under cover of a commission, is murder, if in doing it the perpetrator willfully violates the laws of war.

"It should be our business, when the two Kaisers are subdued, to make inquiry for the men who are responsible for the shameful violations of the laws of war, far more cruel than Wirz committed, and bring them to trial before a court-martial. Let them have the benefit of counsel, as Wirz had, but let us equally apply to them the words of the prophet: 'He shall have judgment without mercy, that hath showed no mercy.'

"One of the most conspicuous of these men is the commander of the submarine who sank the Lusitania. In his case the crime is especially clear, for after he had disabled the ship by his first torpedo he fired another, the only object of which could have been to hasten her sinking and destroy the lives of those on board. This was as much murder as though he had taken a rifle, picked out one of the women on deck, aimed directly at her, and killed her. There are those above him who have approved his action and rewarded him for it. They can be ascertained, and no rank should save them from a like condemnation.

"It is only by such an exercise of justice that we can hope to prevent the commission of similar crimes in the future. We hope, indeed, to establish a commonwealth of nations which shall in the future make war impossible. Whether this will succeed or not, we can not tell. But if there ever should be another war the men who go into it should now be made distinctly to understand that they do so at their peril, and that the leaders who involve thousands and perhaps millions of innocent victims in bloody strife can not expect immunity when the strife is over.

"Besides the punishment thus to be inflicted on the persons of these murderers, there are robberies for which restitution must be enforced. Nothing in modern warfare compares with the pillage of these Huns. There must, after the war, be a search for all the stolen property, and, as far as possible, it should be returned to the rightful owners.

"Indemnity for the future.

"The first thing will be to draw the teeth of the monsters with whom we are fighting. All the munitions of war of every kind which then shall be in the possession of the two Kaisers and their Governments must be taken away. Their manufactories of such munitions must be broken up. If there is any machinery in them which can be of use to the allies, it should be turned in as part of the indemnity. Everything else should be destroyed. If, for example, the Krupp factories at Essen can be used for peaceful purposes, care should be taken that they are put to this use only. Otherwise they should be razed to the ground. It is far better that Bertha Krupp should labor for an honest living and give up making guns to kill Christians gathered in church on Good Friday!

"Complaint would doubtless be made that this would leave the two allied Empires defenseless. In executing this decree they should, however, be permitted to provide for an adequate police force. In the league of nations which should be formed as part of the readjustment of the world that this war compels there will be provision for the protection of individual nations against wanton aggression.

"Another important element in this reconstruction is a declaration by the allied powers that the two Kaisers, having deliberately organized a military system for the subjugation of the world, and having persistently violated the laws of nations in carrying out their plans, have forfeited all right to sovereignty, and that their thrones have become vacant. This would be a similar principle to the action of the English Parliament which in 1689 declared that King James II had 'abdicated the Government, and that the throne is thereby become vacant.'

"It may be claimed that this action of the allies would be in violation of the right to self-government that America is maintaining, but it is so only in appearance. Every right is inseparably connected with a corresponding duty. The principle of the old maxim, 'Protection and allegiance are inseparable,' is of universal application. The moment the two Kaisers and their Governments joined with the Governments of other nations in international conventions they thereby declared themselves to be part of an international system. They admitted that each nation owed certain duties to the rest. For example, in one of the conventions adopted at The Hague in 1907 the Emperor of Germany and the Emperor of Austria, as well as the rulers of other powers, declared that they were—

"Animated by the sincere desire to work for the maintenance of general peace

"Resolved to promote by all the efforts in their power the settlement of international disputes.

"Recognizing the solidarity uniting the members of the society of civilized nations.

"In the face of this convention, how can the two Kaisers contend that they and their Governments have not become a part of an international society? If, then, they commit crimes against that society on the scale of this present war, they cease to be rulers recognizing obedience to the law of God and to international law, and become pirates. This is manifestly an abdication of the throne, and should be treated as such by all the nations.

"Taking this position does not give to the allied powers the right to impose new sovereigns upon Germany or upon the kingdoms composing the Empire of Austria-Hungary. It is for the people of these countries, in constituent assembly, to choose their new rulers; but for all international purposes the imperial houses of Hohenzollern and Hapsburg must cease to exist. They have too long tyrannized over their own people and destroyed the peace of the world.

"Under newly chosen rulers and forms of government based upon the fundamental principle of freedom, guarded by and subject to law, we may hope that these countries will become loyal and peaceful and prosperous members of the great family of nations. If they do, they will half a century hence look with as much satisfaction upon their emancipation as the South does upon the abolition of slavery and the restoration of the Union.

"There is one important element in this constructive program which remains to be mentioned. For that we have a precedent in the reconstruction of the American Union after the Civil War. It is provided by the fourth section of the fourteenth amendment that 'neither the United States nor any State shall pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.'

"In like manner, it should be provided at the end of the present war that no debt incurred either by the Empire of Germany or that of Austria-Hungary in aid of the present war shall be paid, but it shall be held illegal and void. The continuance of this debt would be an impossible burden for the people of these central empires if the indemnity before mentioned is provided. It is better to cancel it at once. It would be right to make some provision for small holders, who would be impoverished by the loss of all their savings. But the debt was contracted for purposes of aggression and crime and is therefore illegal and void.

"These propositions will seem radical. But the fundamental principle upon which they are based is the sole justification for the entrance of America into the war, namely, that the war is a war of aggression begun by the central empires as part of a plan to subjugate the world, and that in the course of the war they have committed every possible crime. When this is remembered, it will appear that these terms are just and that the enforcement of them is the only possible security against another war. In reality, they are far more merciful and less likely to promote continued rancor than would the boycott propesed by many.

"The author of this article was one of the first to urge upon the Government and people of the United States, immediately after the sinking of the Lusitania, that America should intervene in defense of her own rights and the rights of all nations; that convoy should be provided for merchant shipping; and that the German ships and terminals which were within our jurisdiction should be seized. Our Government, with the unanimous approval of our people, has finally done all this. It has declared war in a righteous cause; our people are incurring countless sacrifices in the prosecution of that war, and we must never rest until the objects for which we began it are accomplished.

"These were summed up by the President in his reply to the communication of his Holiness Benedict XIV: 'Peace should rest upon the rights of peoples, not the rights of governments—the rights of peoples, great or small, weak or powerful—their right to freedom and security and government.'

"One advantage of dealing with our treacherous foe in the manner proposed is this: Our victorious armies will ere long be in Germany. The indignation that has been roused in the soldier's breast by the crimes committed would naturally lead to retaliation. If the allies should announce their fixed purpose to punish the real criminals and spare the civilian population who have not shared in the crimes, the latter would be more mercifully treated.

"Another advantage would be this: The German leaders have stimulated the population at home to renewed sacrifice by assuring them that if the allies conquer and get a footing in Germany the people there would suffer as the French and Belgians have suffered. This appeal has been effective. If we make it known that the contrary will be the case and that our aim will not be the desolation of the country, but the punishment of the real criminals—in a word, 'retributive justice'—the German leaders will find their people indifferent or even opposed to the continuance of the war.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, resolutions adopted by the war committee of the Union League Club of Chicago, Ill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

"THE AUSTRIAN PEACE TRAP.

"Resolutions adopted by the war committee of the Union League Club of Chicago at a meeting held the 16th of September, 1918.

"Whereas the war committee of the Union League Club of Chicago, assembled in special session this 16th day of September, 1918, sees the Austrian proposal to call an informal conference to discuss terms of peace as a diplomatic trick whereby the central powers hope to avert the consequences of certain military defeat; and

"Whereas it is the belief of this committee that the central powers, by putting out this peace feeler, hope and plan to create a division of sentiment among the peoples of the allied nations which will bring about a slackening of military preparations; and

"Whereas it is essential to the interests of permanent peace that the military aristocracy of Germany be rendered incapable of further successful aggression: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the war committee of the Union League Club of Chicago respectfully urges upon the President of the United States of America and the Members of the House of Representatives and Senate thereof that there be no peace negotiations, formal or informal, until these two results have been achieved:

"1. The territories of all the nations which have been overrun by Germany and her allies have been evacuated; and

"2. The armies of Germany and her allies have been dispersed or captured: And be it further

"Resolved, That the war committee of the Union League Club of Chicago, having in mind the principles enunciated by the President of the United States, further respectfully urges that when these objects have been attained and the time comes for the consideration of a permanent peace dictated by the victorious entente allied nations, the terms which must be forced upon the defeated central powers shall be such that, among other things—

"1. Belgium, Serbia, and the other invaded States shall be fully compensated for the material damage which has been done in those lands by the brutal invaders from the central powers.

"2. Alsace-Lorraine shall be restored to France and reparation shall be made to France for the damage done during the present war.

"3. Poland shall be recreated an independent State, free from domination of Prussia, Austria, or any other power, and compensated for injury during the present war.

"4. Bohemia and the neighboring provinces of Moravia and Slovakia in Austria-Hungary shall be erected into a Czecho-Slovak State absolutely independent of Teutonic or Magyar control.

"5. That effect be given to the declaration of Corfu, and that the millions of Slavs held in bondage by Austria-Hungary in the southern part of the dual monarchy shall be set free and allowed to join with their kinsmen in Serbia and Montenegro in a great Jugo-Slav nation.

"6. That certain portions of Austria-Hungary, populated mainly by people of Italian nationality and adjoining the Italian borders, shall be restored to Italy.

"7. That the treaty forced upon Roumania by the central powers be abrogated, and that Roumanians living in the Provinces of Transylvania and Bukowina shall be allowed to join with their kinsmen in the formation of a free and independent greater Roumania.

"8. That the Brest-Litovsk treaty be abrogated and that Finland, Ukrainia, the Baltic Provinces, and other portions of Russia be freed absolutely from German domination."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have received a great mass of telegrams, with which I shall not undertake to fill the RECORD, but I have selected a few which I desire to read simply to illustrate the feeling as it comes to me from many quarters.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The mere suggestion of an armistice is an insult to the brave armies of the United States and our allies. A brutal, cruel, and inhuman foe, totally devoid of truth and honor, is rapidly being defeated, and no foundation for a real peace is possible until after the complete defeat and unconditional surrender of the military forces. Humanity demands the rejection of the German note.

Those are mere samples, which I have read to go into the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram which I have this day received from the Chamber of Commerce of Jackson, Mich., and I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

JACKSON, MICH., October 13, 1918.

Hon. C. E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a special meeting of the Jackson Chamber of Commerce, Jackson, Mich., representing 70,000 people, held this Sunday afternoon, a resolution was unanimously adopted opposing a peace conference in advance of an unconditional surrender of Germany and her allies. We feel that this same sentiment prevails throughout the country, and assure the President and yourself that our undivided cooperation is behind him and you in his and your support of such a proposition.

JACKSON (MICH.) CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
By C. F. HOLLAND, Secretary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented telegrams in the nature of petitions of George Seal, of Detroit; of the Federal Employees' Union of Soo; of Local Union No. 143, National Federal Postal Employees, of Kalamazoo; of Local Branch, Railway Mail Association, of Detroit; of the Michigan State Federation of Labor; of Local Branch, National Federation of Federal Employees, of Detroit; and of the Trades and Labor Council of Kalamazoo, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the passage of the so-called McKellar retirement bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented the memorial of J. A. O. Preus, State auditor of Minnesota, transmitting a resolution adopted by the Minnesota State Board of Investment, relative to the proposed tax on State and municipal bonds in the pending revenue bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Miss Hattie Woell, of Browerville, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on proprietary medicines in the pending revenue bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Minnesota Western Oil Co., of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on oil in the pending revenue bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WARREN. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial, from the One Hundred Per Cent American Society, of Hanna, Wyo., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

HANNA, WYO.

Senator FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

The One Hundred Per Cent American Society, of Hanna, Wyo., representing 500 miners and 65 men in uniform, demand the unconditional surrender of the central powers and unlimited force to bring this about. Such a peace only will compensate our outraged ideals, more precious than the lives required to enforce it.

W. L. COWDREY, President.

Mr. ASHURST (for Mr. THOMPSON) presented a memorial of Pomona Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Montgomery County, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation granting pensions to civil-service employees of the Government, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. THOMPSON) presented a memorial of the Wyandotte County Democratic Club, of Kansas City, Kans., remonstrating against the unjust discriminations by the industries of the country against the blind in denying them employment, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also (for Mr. THOMPSON) presented a memorial of the Missionary Circle, mothers and sisters of the boys in khaki, Ada, Kans., remonstrating against the execution of the order prohibiting denominational camp pastors from Army camps, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (for Mr. THOMPSON) presented a memorial of the Woman's Club, of Topeka, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to provide for the fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and also against creating political jobs during the present national crisis, which was referred to the Committee on the Census.

He also (for Mr. THOMPSON) presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from Federal Employees' Union No. 49, of Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and from the Federal Employees' Union, of Kansas City, Kans., and a petition from Local Branch, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of the so-called McKellar retirement bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present a telegram embodying a resolution adopted by the Farm Improvement Association and the farmers of Black Hawk County at Waterloo, Iowa, remonstrating against the further extension of the daylight-saving bill, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, October 12, 1918.

A. B. CUMMINS,
Washington, D. C.:

I am instructed to send you the following resolution adopted at a meeting of the Farm Improvement Association and the farmers of Black Hawk County at Waterloo, Iowa, October 12, 1918. The daylight-saving plan is operating to the detriment of rural institutions, and on account of the critical labor situation it is seriously interfering with our efforts in keeping up agricultural production, on account of the dews in the morning during the haying, harvesting, and thrashing season. It causes the loss of an hour of the best working time of each day. It enforces a further loss of time, feed, and profit through the improper and unnatural times for the care and feeding of all classes of live stock. It forces a serious hardship on country school children by compelling many during the cold winter months to leave their homes before daylight.

A. A. BURGER.

Mr. THOMAS. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Colorado Equal Suffrage Association of my State, protesting against the so-called campaign of certain women of this city against the Members of this body, which I desire to have printed in the record.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., October 9, 1918.

Hon. C. S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Colorado Equal Suffrage Association deeply regrets that the United States Senate should be annoyed and insulted, as is being done by any body of women, even by an organization so diametrically opposed to all the principles of the National Equal Suffrage Association as is the Woman's Party, and we are deeply chagrined that a Colorado woman should be among the number guilty of such acts, while we are keenly disappointed at the failure to pass the Susan B. Anthony amendment we are not discouraged and feel confident of success at a later date in spite of the conduct of these women.

THE COLORADO EQUAL SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments:

A bill (S. 829) to authorize the employment of Federal prisoners on public roads within the States; and

A bill (S. 4931) to insure a supply of coal for munition works, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12976) providing for the protection of the users of the telephone and telegraph service and the properties and funds belonging thereto during Government operation and control, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4990) to repeal a proviso of paragraph 3, section 1, of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and further amending said act, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 591) thereon.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. FLETCHER introduced a bill (S. 4991) to establish load lines for vessels in foreign trade, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3470) to amend section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States, which were, on page 1, line 6, after "Sec. 35," to insert:

Whoever shall make or cause to be made or present or cause to be presented for payment or approval to or by any person or officer in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, or any department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, any claim upon or against the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, knowing such claim to be false, fictitious, or fraudulent; or whoever, for the purpose of obtaining or aiding to obtain the payment or approval of such claim, or for the purpose and with the intent of cheating and swindling or defrauding the Government of the United States, or any department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, shall knowingly and willfully falsify or conceal or cover up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact, or make or cause to be made any false or fraudulent statements or representations, or make or use or cause to be made or used any false bill, receipt, voucher, roll, account, claim, certificate, affidavit, or deposition, knowing the same to contain any fraudulent or fictitious statement or entry; or whoever shall take and carry away, or take for his own use or for the use of another, with intent to steal or purloin, any personal property of the United States, or any branch or department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder; or whoever shall enter into any agreement, combination, or conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, by obtaining or aiding to obtain the payment or allowance of any false or fraudulent claim; and whoever, having charge, possession, custody, or control of any money or other public property used or to be used in the military or naval service, with intent to defraud the United States, or any department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, or willfully to conceal such money or other property, shall deliver or cause to be delivered to any person having authority to receive the same any amount of such money or other property less than that for which he received a certificate or took a receipt; or whoever, being authorized to make or deliver any certificate, voucher, receipt, or other paper certifying the receipt of arms, ammunition, provisions, clothing, or other property so used or to be used, shall make or deliver the same to any other person without a full knowledge of the truth of the facts stated therein, and with intent to defraud the United States, or any department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

On page 2, line 1, after "law," to insert "having knowledge or reason to believe that the property has been taken from the possession of the United States or furnished by the United States under such allowance."

On page 2, line 2, to strike out "and" and insert "or."

On page 2, line 2, after "years," to insert "or both."

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PEACE TERMS.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to introduce a Senate resolution, to be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask to have the resolution read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 315), and it was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that there should be no further communication with the German Government upon the subject of an armistice or conditions of peace, except a demand for unconditional surrender.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that when the Senate adjourns today it adjourn until 12 o'clock on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PEACE PROPOSALS OF CENTRAL POWERS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have received many communications upon the subject which is engrossing the American mind this morning, one of which I beg to read as follows:

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, October 13, 1918.

Hon. A. B. CUMMINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a public meeting held to-day the following resolutions were adopted:

First, That we stand back of the Government and President in demanding an unconditional surrender and nothing less;

Second, That we are opposed to any peace that is not wholly acceptable to our allies, who have borne the greater burdens of this war and who have suffered most and have most at stake;

Third, That we believe the treaty of peace should be written in Berlin by the allied nations, and that allied armies should occupy portions of Germany until the stipulated conditions have been complied with; and

Fourth, That there shall be no cessation of force to the utmost until Germany turns over to the allied nations both her army and her navy as parts of the unconditional surrender.

The telegram is signed by a committee of the citizens of that community.

If the Senate will indulge me a moment, I desire to make an obseravtion with regard to the subject matter.

Mr. President, we are drifting into an exceedingly unfortunate and dangerous position with respect to peace terms with Germany. Consciously or unconsciously, we are permitting general homilies upon the reorganiaztion and reformation of the world, and everybody in it, to obscure the one specific object we should hold constantly in view.

It is praiseworthy, whether in war or peace, to forward the cause of democracy and to stimulate as best we can the principle that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; but if in lauding this fundamental doctrine we allow Germany to escape her well-merited punishment, we will have made little progress in universal regeneration.

Our immediate, imperative purpose should be to make the world, and especially the United States, safe against Germany. It is true that Austro-Hungary and Turkey must be dealt with as our enemies, but they are not formidable, and we have nothing to fear from them in the future. The Czecho-Slovaks and the Jugo-Slavs will see to it that Austro-Hungary is dismembered, and Turkey will be necessarily eliminated in the natural readjustment which must ensue. Germany is the chief and powerful criminal, and unless this war ends in the right way her crimes will be repeated and she will again plunge all mankind into the indescribable horrors of another world war.

Let us forget, for a time at least, all about dividing eastern Europe into a series of sovereignties which will owe their existence, not to self-determination but to military force. Let us forget, in this vital moment, the league of nations which is to rule the earth in accordance with the Sermon on the Mount and in which the United States is to become a mere municipality. Let us fasten our attention upon Germany and answer the one burning question, What shall the allies do with her? And above all let this answer be so concrete in its substance and so clear in its form that plain people everywhere can understand it.

The overwhelming majority of the people of this country are determined that the war shall go on with ever-increasing vigor until the armies and navies of the Imperial German Government have unconditionally surrendered; and until the allies are in full possession of that country with power to impose just such terms upon her future existence as may be thought necessary to repair the wrongs she has committed and to protect humanity against a recurrence of her criminal endeavor. To the great body of American citizens any cessation of the brave and brilliant efforts of our armies on the land and fleets on the sea is unthinkable. I intend to assume that nothing that has been or can be said in any quarter will turn aside the allied nations from this unalterable purpose. My concern relates mainly to our attitude toward Germany after the victory has been won and after her surrender is complete, for it will be just as fatal to impose inadequate terms upon Germany as it would be to secure inadequate terms through negotiation. There seems to be great reluctance upon the part of the Executive who must, in the first instance, speak and act for us in this grave matter and also upon the part of those who have discussed the question in the Senate to approach the real problem and prescribe the only remedy. It is as easy as it is indefinite to declare that Germany must be so dealt with that there can be no repetition of the wrongs she has committed, but that declaration does not satisfy the common mind and heart, and least of all does it satisfy those who are bearing the burdens of this unparalleled struggle.

Aside from the suggestion that her path toward the East should be barred by the new powers that are to be established and the hope that a partial disarmament may be brought about among all nations, we are left to grope our way amidst the depressing uncertainties of the broadest generalities.

It is not strange that 14 articles, or even more, are required to cover the revision of the political map of Europe and to define the relation which all the nations of the earth should bear toward each other; but I venture the observation that a lesser number will be found sufficient to state what the allies should do with Germany. I take it for granted that when the allies gather around the council table to determine what shall be done with Germany certain things will already have been accomplished.

Belgium and Serbia will be free, without a hostile foot within their borders.

Alsace-Lorraine will be in possession of France, there to remain forever.

I dismiss for the present the infinitely difficult problems of Russia, of Poland, of Ukraine, of Austria, of Bulgaria, of Turkey, of Roumania, of Greece, and Italy. I disregard for this discussion the whole Czecho-Slovak and Jugo-Slav controversy. The Kaiser should have nothing to say about these readjustments. The question recurs with persistent force, What shall be done with Germany?

There is but one answer that will meet the demands of justice and satisfy the claims of an outraged world. There must be reparation for the past and security for the future.

First. Germany must pay, pay to the last farthing of her capacity to pay, pay until the generations yet to come will remember and curse the insane ambition which well-nigh destroyed civilization itself, and so she will repair in some small measure the destruction she has wrought.

Second. Germany is a menace to mankind because she has a cruel, wicked, malicious intent toward the remainder of the world, and because she has a powerful army and navy to execute her murderous designs. We can not change her intent, for it is the result of years and years of training and teaching in a false and selfish philosophy; but we can disarm her and leave her helpless and harmless.

It is to be hoped that armaments everywhere may be reduced, but Germany should have none. Her army must be disbanded, her navy must be distributed among the allies, her fortifications dismantled, and her munitions factories destroyed. Not only so, but there must be no resurrection of her military system until the allied nations are fully convinced that it is safe to free her from these restrictions. Until that time comes she must be a dependent nation, at liberty to engage in commerce but powerless to make war.

Viewed from the ordinary standpoint these terms are severe beyond precedent; but the situation itself has no parallel in history. I understand perfectly that these conditions mean the degradation, possibly the disintegration of a once mighty nation; but if we are to be safe, if the world is to be secure, they must be imposed.

We entered the war with our eyes open to the consequences which would follow as inexorably as the passage of time, for from the moment of our entrance into the struggle it was sure that either Germany or the United States must die as a first-class power. It must have been, must now be, obvious to every thoughtful man that if all other powers are not to remain an armed camp, nothing short of the absolute physical disability of this war-drunken people will protect us from her revenge and save the world for tranquility and peace.

It will be gratifying to see Germany supplant her existing government with a better and freer one, but that will not suffice, for republics are as strong in their purposes as autocracies. Oftentimes they are as ambitious as the most absolute of monarchies, and we are now witnessing the ease with which they mobilize and the success with which they fight.

My proposal is capital punishment for a nation, and I am keenly conscious that many innocent German people will suffer; but why shrink from the inevitable? Either they must suffer or the millions who have laid down their lives upon the battlefields of Belgium, France, Italy, and the Far East will have died for a mere truce with brutality. Either some innocent Germans must suffer in national pride, property, and progress or the hellish atrocities which have shocked and benumbed all Christian lands will be perpetrated again upon an unoffending world. Which alternative will you adopt?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read two telegrams, and, if the Senate will indulge me, I desire to make some observations with reference to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., October 12, 1918.

Hon. JAMES A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

This city demands unconditional surrender of Huns. All resent thought of parley. We shall give back nothing; they give up every foot, including our Alsace-Lorraine, immediately. Anger felt at any other thought. Nobody thinks the Huns sincere.

BATELE MCCARDLE.

TUCUMCARI, N. MEX, October 13, 1918.

Hon. JAMES A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

See Kansas City Post editorial last Friday, October 11, entitled "So the people may know," which expresses practically unanimous sentiment of your constituents, regardless of politicial affiliations, that no terms except unconditional surrender must be given Germany, and we must not negotiate with a Government that has neither honor nor conscience. We beg of you do not allow the fruits of our great sacrifices to be lost by sentimental or misguided considerations. The savage Huns must be crushed.

D. J. HAFF.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, to my mind, the Senate is at this hour charged with a very grave responsibility. I have all along maintained, as Senators know, that the legislative branch of our Government has not lost its vitality, force, and importance. At a time like this, when we are dealing with foreign relations, the Senate has a peculiar duty thrust upon it.

An unfortunate impression is, I fear, being made upon the country. Nothing the Senate does ought to add thereto. It seems to me that the country is getting the notion that the President of the United States intends to enter upon a system of parleying and negotiation with Germany, and that at the end of the negotiations Germany is to come off unscathed.

Also, it appears to be a part of that impression that we are to cease making war and sit down about the table at this time, without any guarantees, and barter and dicker with an enemy that we now appear not to have conquered, but to have at a very great disadvantage.

Mr. President, it is inconceivable to me that these conclusions are correct. Let us review the situation.

What has the President done? Some months ago he laid down 14 propositions which he said must constitute the basic ideas of peace. Last September he added four or five important points. At various times he has freely expressed opinions which have been in the nature of added demands.

As I said the other day, I do not understand the President to have attempted to lay down absolute, concrete conditions. What he did undertake to do was to lay down certain principles. If those principles are carried out as we understand they should be and as I believe the President intends, then we will have a peace that all of us can acclaim.

There seems to be an impression, however, that the President intends to permit or to insist upon a cessation of hostilities at this time, when Germany is in full retreat and at a disadvantage, and thus give her time to recover herself while we sit around the council table. I humbly and yet emphatically submit and insist that there is nothing in what the President of the United States has said to indicate that he has any such purpose in his heart. What has he said?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was about to ask the Senator this question: If he does not think that some of the feeling in the country to which the Senator has alluded and has stated was not well founded, was produced by the phrase in the President's response to Germany's request for an armistice that he did not feel at liberty to suggest that to the nations with which we were associated so long as Germany held any conquered territory, or words to that effect? Does not the Senator think that phrase responsible for some of the feeling in the country that he is contemplating an armistice?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will answer that by continuing the remark I was just about to make, because I think it will constitute an answer.

What did the President say? The President said: "Here are certain principles in accordance with which peace must ultimately be made." Germany replies: "We accept those principles as a basis of negotiation or talk." But Germany did not expressly say she agreed to the principles.

The President sent back word that he wanted to know whether the principles were to be accepted as a fact conceded or were to be merely a basis of negotiations. Unofficially we understand Germany has replied that she accepts the terms as laid down; that she accepts them in fact, and not as the mere basis of negotiations.

One of the things the President said was: Before I will even communicate your proposition to the allies of the United States you must get off all the conquered territory you have taken. Get off how? Has the President said that we will cease our fighting and allow them to peacefully withdraw? No. It may be that some will infer that that follows, but it seems to me the President is in a position to say to them, "Get off the best way you can. If you want us to cease fighting you as you retreat, then you must make a proposition to us which we can accept, and that proposition might well be a surrender of all the military supplies and all the strategic points; in other words, it might be a complete military surrender, as was the case with Bulgaria.

Mr. President, the solemn duty is upon us to construe the President's attitude as it is. What warrant have we to assume that the President intends to submit a proposition for a cessation of hostilities and allow Germany to begin negotiations with her arms in her hand?

What reason is there to assume that the President contemplates any such pusillanimous or foolish policy as that? He laid down his 14 principles months ago, but at the same time he called on Congress for a mighty army and a great navy. He laid down additional principles last September, but he continued to call for more and more of military supplies. He answered the German note a few days ago, but almost the next day in New York City he appealed to the American people to oversubscribe the greatest war loan ever proposed to any people by any Government. Every member of his Cabinet is before the people to-day asking for money and still more money to carry on this war. Every officer of the Government is engaged in mobilizing the resources of our great land. Every military chief is busy training soldiers and filling the camps with new recruits. Every ship is loaded to the guards carrying over, even during this present moment, tens of thousands of men who go for the purpose of enforcing an honorable peace upon our dishonorable enemy.

Is it possible under these circumstances and conditions that the President contemplates the throwing away of the advantage we now possess? I do not think so. At such a time as this I do not think the Senate ought to give a false note to the country.

I have not been a worshiper of the President, for I worship no man; but I honor the President, and I have always honored him. I respect him as a man, and I highly honor him as the Chief Executive of our great Nation. But I have never been a truckler and cringer or one who at command goes "to heel." However, at this hour I stand here to say that Congress can make no greater mistake, the Senate can make no more tragic blunder than to give the country to understand that Woodrow Wilson proposes to fritter away the fruits of this war. I do not believe it. I can find nothing in my heart, I can find nothing in his conduct, to warrant such an opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think anyone believes it.

Mr. REED. I hope nobody really believes it. It is inconceivable, sir, that such a thing should be in his breast. These telegrams that have been read voice a latent fear of the people; they also voice America's hearts' desire.

Why should the people not demand that there shall be stern justice meted out? Fifty years Germany has contemplated this war. Fifty years of criminal preparedness. Fifty years of premeditation. Fifty years of cold deliberation. Fifty years of malice aforethought. Fifty years of secret planning and unlawful conspiracy to commit the greatest crime in the history of the world.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. REED. I would rather not yield at this moment.

Mr. OWEN. I merely want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that 96 years ago these very powers entered into a written agreement to destroy every democracy on earth, and they never have departed from it a hair's breadth.

Mr. REED. I accept that, but I am talking of the later preparation. If I go back to the first German atrocities, I shall be forced to antedate the birth of Christ.

Behind the veil of Christianity they concealed the soul of barbarism. At the foot of the cross they summoned the gods of cruelty and lust. Within the temples of religion they plotted the atrocities of Tamerlane and the brutalities of Nero. They invoked the spirits of Attila and Thor and pictured them with flaming sword leading the armies of Germany to pillage, murder, and victory.

Peaceful Europe was to be transformed into an inferno of passion. Lust was to glut its appetite by the ravishment of virgins; thieves plunder with the sanction of authority; incendiaries burn cities by command of the Government; and assassins thrive by order of the King.

Murderers were to ply their bloody trade under the protection of the imperial houses of Hapsburg and Hohenzollern. Murder indiscriminate; murder by towns, by cities, by countries, by individuals, by millions. Murder coolly planned and deliberately done; murder unrelieved by passion, without palliation of hatred or mitigation of anger; murder in self-interest; murder of soldiers guilty of no crime save the defense of their native land, ruthlessly and criminally invaded; murder of unarmed and unoffending men; murder of helpless women who stood crying for mercy; murder of innocent babes who smiled into the faces of their assassins; murder of the national spirit of a free people; murder of human liberty.

Such was the crime contemplated. Such was the crime prepared. Such is the crime consummated. Four million men have been stretched dead upon the earth. Countless cripples endure the ceaseless torture of wounds. Innumerable women have suffered defilement and then death at the hands of their ravishers. Babes by the thousands have been slaughtered or left to die of exposure or starvation. Myriads of children have been carried into captivity. Soldiers, prisoners of war, forced by starvation, have been compelled to dig trenches for their enemy, and at the point of the bayonet to bring forward guns to slaughter their comrades.

Belgium, that lay smiling in the sun, has been destroyed. Her proud people are enslaved. Her treaties have been broken; her cities leveled to the earth.

Serbia has been transformed into a desert. Every rock of her mountains is splashed with the blood of her slaughtered people.

Russia, corrupted by loathsome bribery, has been turned over to the merciless dominion of anarchists and the even baser scoundrels who sold Russian honor for German gold.

Roumania is prostrate. The iron heel of the brutal conquerer is upon her breast, his knife at her throat.

Italy's battle line was broken by corruption, not by valor; thus were some of her rich Provinces crushed beneath the German Juggernaut; her people have been slaughtered by the tens of thousands; in every home candles of death burn before the crucifix.

The northern half of France has been harried until its beautiful fields have been transformed into cemeteries. Its wonderful cities are charnel houses filled with the bones of the dead; its altars have been desecrated; its churches destroyed; its homes violated; its families broken up. By the hundreds of thousands children wander in the streets or are turned over to the care of strangers, or have been carried into slavery by their oppressors.

To-day the retreat of the German Army is marked by a line of smoke and flame. Four hundred miles it stretches from the North Sea to the Swiss mountains. It is the fires of French homes set blazing by the torch of Germans infuriated by defeat. Villages 500 years old are given to the flames. In the lurid light of their ruins stand women and children, their lips frozen dumb by fear. The glare of the fiery furnace lights up the fiendish faces of the retreating Huns. Above the conflagration hovers the spirit of Attilla, the curse of God.

At such a time as this, with torches blazing, with bayonets wet with the blood of women and of babes, they present their hypocritical appeal for a cessation of arms, for peace by negotiation. Why is this prayer now upon their lips? It is because the sword is at their hearts. The invincible sword of freemen battling for the right; the stubborn sword of England, that never yields; the gallant sword of France, that knows no sheath; the resistless sword of America, that, having been drawn in defense of humanity, will not be returned to its scabbard until the liberty of the world has been attained.

In face of such conditions I do not fear that our President will meekly yield. I believe, sirs, that when the peace council shall have assembled it will be in the midst of a conquered Germany. It may be amidst the flames and smoke of a ruined Germany. I tell you, sirs, when the conditions of peace are written the name of Woodrow Wilson will not be, it can not be, subscribed to any treaty that does not compel Germany to tread the wine press of repentance, to pay back—to pay back to the world, as far as she can, in her own suffering for the agonies that she has wrought, for the desolation she has brought upon the earth.

Peace now, a cessation of war now? Who has proposed it? Why, sir, if we were to stop at this moment, what would be the condition? Germany is to-day an oasis in a desert of fire and blood, an oasis yet unscathed, yet untouched. What German village has been burned? How many of France's villages lie black and bare, with charred walls outlined against the sky? What German fortress has yet been dismantled?

Is it possible or conceivable that Germany could make a peace now that would be a peace without reparation? Do you fear that the President will subscribe to any document that will allow German statesmen to say to their people, "Behold, though all the rest of the world is wrapped in flames; though all about us there is desolation; though everywhere the German sword has hacked its way through human bone and flesh; though all their churches are destroyed, their crucifixes broken, and their altars desecrated, we have escaped unscathed and unpunished; reparation is not to be exacted"? I tell you, sirs, it can not be in his great heart; it can not be in the heart of any American citizen. The peace that shall come must be a peace of honor; but there can not be honor without retribution. International highwaymen must be taught that the business of the road does not pay. Titled rogues must learn that the thief will be punished, regardless of the quarterings upon his escutcheon. The murderers of the world must be made to know that a crown, though incrusted by priceless jewels, will not protect the head of the monster who brings woe and desolation to the earth.

So I say this much to-day: Let the word go out from this Senate, so far as we can speak, that we have every confidence in the future, and that we propose, and that this Government proposes, to make no peace unless it be a peace that will vindicate the majesty of our arms and, better than that, the majesty of that great cause in which we fight—the cause of human liberty; the cause of earth emancipation; the cause of justice for all races and peoples; and the peace and security of the ages yet to come.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I listened not only with interest but I was at times thrilled with the magnificent outburst from the heart of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I agree with him about everything that he said; my mind and heart are in the condition of his because of the cruelties and atrocities perpetrated by the Germans, all of which he has so graphically described; I agree with everything he has said, except one thing. I do not want to see "a ruined Germany." God knows there is ruin enough on this earth now. I want to see a broken German Army; I want to see a ruined Prussian and Austrian autocracy; I want to see the fiat of the civilized world go forth to the effect that "the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs have ceased to reign"; I want to see the people of Austria-Hungary and of Germany take the government of their land into their own hands; but it would give my heart no gratification to burn a single German village or to retaliate for the ravishment and death of Belgian women by killing German women.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Missouri did not mean that, of course.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will not quote me as advocating that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course the Senator did not mean that, but I only mentioned it because such phrases as that used by him—"a ruined Germany"—will produce in the hearts of those who do not think a vindictiveness that is not in accord with the character of the English-speaking race, either on this side of the water or on the other. The English-speaking race has been the race which has made magnanimous and just and generous peaces. Even when my own section went down in this country, although you subjected us to 10 years' of humiliation later, the terms of immediate peace, as granted by Gen. Grant and by Sherman, were at least in themselves just and generous. When the English-speaking race across the water made peace with the Boers they did it with a generosity and a magnanimity hitherto unprecedented in the history of the world, a peace which was followed by an equally unprecedented success in the practical administration of the country, which in its turn was due to the fact that the hearts of the Boers beat with gratitude that all the power of the great Empire of Great Britain had not been extended to humiliate and to punish.

So much for that, Mr. President. In all else that the Senator from Missouri said, I agree with him absolutely. I agree that we can not make peace; that we can not make an armistice looking to peace merely upon German promises; that we must have dictated conditions of armistice and dictated conditions of peace, which must be accepted, and not negotiated. I say that the very object of the President's inquiry was to get the opportunity to tell what we wanted. Senators seem to think that the President of the United States can dictate the terms of peace. He can not do that. Great Britain and France and Italy and Belgium and Serbia must have a voice in that. But before he could answer the German note he made an inquiry to ascertain upon what basis he could begin to talk with the allies about what we were jointly going to dictate or propose. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, upon this good day, and for several days gone, whatever the physical weather may have been there has been sunshiny weather in the heart and clear weather in the brain wherever Frenchmen or Britons or Belgians or an American heart or a Serbian's or an Italian's beat together in connection with this war. From far-off Mesopotamia, from Palestine, from the Italian front, from the Serbian desert, made so by the Bulgar and the Hun, from where the Americans are fighting in the Vosges, and cooperating with the British in Flanders, along the British front, along the French front by the Aisne, and through the pleasant valleys of the Champagne, there is sunshiny weather in the hearts of men, and there is clear weather in their brains.

Mr. President, God reigns, Woodrow Wilson is President of the United States, and the sun is shining everywhere. Senators need not bother themselves; they need not pester their souls or even pretend that they are pestered with the idea that Woodrow Wilson is going to make a German peace or a peace negotiated in German interest. I do not believe that anybody believes it or even fears it, no matter how some talk.

It was hard to get him into this war; he did not want to go into it if he could honorably help it; but, being in, it will be exceedingly hard to get him out of it, except upon those conditions which shall lead to security for the peace and freedom of the world in the future. He can be trusted to demand the proper guaranties; he can be trusted not to take the word of those who have hitherto regarded their plighted faith, even when written and signed, as a scrap of paper. Everybody knows that.

There will be no armistice, even, Mr. President, until after complete guaranties are given. And who is to tell what the guaranties are? Do you suppose the President of the United States can fix the military guaranties of a military armistice from the White House? Foch, Haig, and our own dear Gen. Pershing, from the very necessities of the military situation, will have something to say about what are sufficient guaranties for an armistice before one is ever entered into; the allies, France and Great Britain, will have as much to say as we will about the conditions of an ultimate peace, and it will not be a peace negotiated in the interest of Germany.

Mr. President, another thing: There has been much talk about "the danger of parleying," the danger that parleying might bring about and the danger of "peace talk." Woodrow Wilson, with a broader and longer vision than that of those who entertain the fear, or say they do, was glad to have a parley—he did not seek it; they sought it themselves. He doubtless was glad of it, because he knew that, while peace talk would do no harm right now in this country, even when it takes place in the United States Senate, and could do no harm in England or France or Italy nor on the army front, because the Tommies, the poilus, and the American doughboys are upon the very flood of victory, and because when peace is mentioned they scorn it except upon their own conditions, and because it will be harder to hold them back when we want to stop than it will to urge them forward as far as we want to go. He knew that it could not do any harm amongst us, but he also knew that it was a deadly weapon, almost equal to the army itself, among the populations in Germany and in Austria-Hungary, and in Turkey. Let him, then, keep on parleying here, and let the boys keep on fighting over there along the Aisne and the Suippes and the Oise and clear to the Flanders coast and among the Serbian mountains and in the rest of the Balkans. Let the armies go ahead. So far as I am concerned, if I were President, do you know what I would do right now? I would delay answering that and other notes awhile, in order that those enemy populations might "wobble upon the gudgeon" and "sizzle in their own grease." The utmost state of demoralization has already been created among them by the very fact that the German chancellor has proposed an armistice and has said that he wanted to comply with the President's conditions. This has been reinforced by President Wilson's innocent-looking "queries" and still further by the chancellor's apparent—to them—absolute surrender. It has even infected their army in Serbia and on parts of the west front.

That all of that apparent surrender was a camouflage, I have no doubt. That Germany said it for the purpose of securing an armistice so that the munitions works of Germany could resupply her armies with shells and guns and that her army might be reorganized behind the lines, I have no doubt; but I also have no doubt as to the fact that Woodrow Wilson is not a fool; that Clemenceau is not a fool; that David Lloyd-George is not a fool; and I have no doubt of the fact that they are just as patriotic and just as intense about a just and full victory at the end of this war as we are. I do know in my heart that neither of them is going to make a peace that is not a right peace for us, and I think I know in my heart that at least two of them are never going to make a peace which is not only apt to secure the peace of the world but which shall also be a just peace, and just even to the German people.

Mr. President, of course, there is a good deal of loose talk about what peace terms Tom or Dick or Harry would make if he had the power, and perhaps I might be justified in saying a few words along that line for myself. I do not see what good it would do particularly, but still I might say them, and I believe I will. If I had the outlining of it, in supplement and explanation to some of the President's points which have been emphasized here this morning; when I came to the definition of "invaded territory," for example, I would say it not only means Belgium and northern France and Serbia but it means Italia Irredenta and Alsace-Lorraine, because we regard them because of their populations as French and Italian territory. I would say, "It is true you invaded them some time ago and not during this war, but get out of them before the armistice shall even start." I would say another thing: "Before an armistice shall even be considered, before we shall cease firing at your backs as you retreat out of Serbia and Palestine and northern France and Flanders; before we cease firing at you, you must drop your arms, drop them where you are." I would say another thing to them: "In addition to these conditions, before an armistice, before any peace negotiations are begun after the armistice, you must give us guaranties that will free us of the fear that with the treachery of your ruling military caste you will use the armistice period and the period of peace negotiation or acceptance for the purpose of reorganizing your army for a future trouble. We therefore politely request—'a request for the present which will become a command if you do not comply with it'—that you shall put us in possession of Essen, where the Krupp armor and munitions works are; of Mannheim; and of the steel and iron works in Westphalia, and in possession of such other strategic points as will prevent your organizing in our rear and striking us while we are talking."

I am not afraid of peace talk doing any harm amongst us, and I believe that before it is over in Germany and Austria and has completed its awful work there it will not be necessary for the allies to say that "the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs have ceased to reign," but that the peoples there will say it.

I would say, moreover, "before even the armistice can begin you must not only withdraw your armies from Serbia, but you must withdraw them from the territory of the Czecho-Slovaks, because we have recognized them as a nation. And you shall withdraw them from Bosnia and Herzegovina, because they are Serbians in race, in language and religion, and you not only 'invaded' but stole them while Russia was busy with Japan."

I would say one thing more to the German chancellor if I were President. I would say, "You have to satisfy me that you speak for somebody else besides Wilhelm the Kaiser. I have to have a guaranty that he can not put a new chancellor in your place to-morrow who will reverse what you have done or unsay what you have said, because I know that a German chancellor is appointed by the King of Prussia, and your talk about the Reichstag's being behind you does not fool me at all, because, having been a professor in a great American institution, I have at least sufficient knowledge to know that the Reichstag has no authority or jurisdiction in Germany concerning foreign affairs. I would like to have a little plebiscite of the German people, if it please you, to indicate to me that they approve of these terms of peace before our allies and we can consent to withdraw the armies of occupation, although we will make the peace provisionally with whatever Government you shall have, but before we withdraw the armies of occupation, as a security that what has been done shall not likely be undone, we want a plebiscite of the German people upon the question, 'Shall these terms be accepted?' the voter to vote 'Yes' or the voter to vote 'No.' And if the German people vote for the treaty and make the peace with us, and the other guaranties be complied with, then we will not only withdraw our armies, but we will in our prayers pray for you just as we pray for all the other sons and daughters of men all over this world. There will be no vindictiveness in our hearts at all. Brutes—yes; a lot of you, but under orders and training of Hohenzollerns and Junkers. Help us pray God to forgive you."

One of the things I would want to do is to organize a commission for the purpose of discovering all stolen property and sending it back. We can not organize a commission of our own, except while we are in military occupancy, for that purpose, because that would destroy the sovereignty of the Austrian people and the German people, as well as of their Governments.

Then, my friends, I would take a hint from what took place at the close of our Civil War here and embodied in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. I would in the treaty of peace have it declared that no indebtedness made by Germany or Austria in aid of the prosecution of this war should ever be paid. These debts, however evidenced, should be canceled and declared invalid. Why? Because that would "spread," as John Allen used to say, "a holy wave of caution" amongst moneyed men as regards hereafter financing a war of aggression like this one. It would do more to keep the peace of the world for 50 years than any one thing that you can think of. A man would not buy a bond hereafter merely because a government issued it when war was to be prosecuted. He would exercise his judgment as to whether it was a war of aggression or a war of defense, and if it were a war of aggression he would say, "No, no. The result of what happened in America after the Civil War, the result of what happened as to German debts after Armageddon, convince me that I want to know beyond a reasonable doubt that this is the right sort of a war or you do not get from me the right sort of a dollar, which I made in the right sort of way." Then I would have Germany pay in reparation a sum equal to the total of the indebtedness thus canceled. Thus the common people would be no more heavily burdened with debt than now, and yet would pay a just indemnity for suffering and loss wrought by them.

Mr. President, I would include a few other little things as a part of the peace treaty. I would take over and hold all of the seized properties of German and Austrian citizens, and sell them and all of the ships that have been seized; and I would take the proceeds and devote them, first, so far as the property in the United States and the ships seized here are concerned, to the indemnity of the families of people who died upon the Lusitania, the Arabic, the Sussex, and upon the other ships upon which men, women, and children were foully murdered. And after I was through with that, I would turn the balance over to a fund for the restoration of Belgium, northern France, and Serbia. And I would demand in the treaty of peace that every interned German and Austrian ship on the earth should have its title vested in us and our allies by the consent of Germany and Austria, and I would also sell them and turn the proceeds into a fund for the restoration of these brutally blighted, devastated lands, and I would make the German Government engage to pay the owners of property destroyed or stolen any balance still left due.

But what good does it do for me to be talking about what I would do if I were making peace, or for half a dozen Senators on this side of the Senate and half dozen on the other side to so talk? We are not the constituted authorities. They exist in France, Great Britain, Italy, and here, and they are trustworthy; and, my friends, God will have more trouble—I am talking about our God now—in restraining them from going too far than He will have in urging them on to severity of terms.

Mr. President, I never heard of one atrocity being cured by another. That blessed old friend of my grandfather's, Jefferson Davis, the President of the Confederacy, could never be persuaded to retaliate, upon the ground that he did not see how the punishment of the innocent could cure the crime of the wicked. If you will show me the thief who looted the houses in Belgium I would restore the property and punish him. I would deal likewise with the individual who ordered the looting. If you show me the man who fired upon the Lusitania and fired the second shot after she was already helpless, I would have him tried by a court-martial and shot upon German soil.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I am not willing to hurt the man who did not do the deed. If you will show me the man who ordered him to do it, if anybody did, even if it were the Kaiser, I would be willing to have him court-martialed and shot upon German soil. I yield to the Senator now.

Mr. REED. The Senator has almost answered the interrogatory I was going to make. I was going to ask him what he would do with the responsible head of a government that, through its responsible agents, to wit, its minister to the United States, served notice that it was going to sink the Lusitania, and did it several days before the sinking occurred, thus showing, necessarily, that there must have been an order issued.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I read a very interesting story about that, which I will not go into now, to the effect that the real thing that Bernstorff thought would be done was that the Lusitania would be destroyed at another place by somebody else, and that this particular man in this particular submarine had received no particular orders. However, that has nothing to do with it. But I say that if I could find a man who had issued an order to commit such a murder upon the high seas, I would have him court-martialed and shot on German soil.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me, since he has allowed me to interrupt him, to say that his remarks concerning what I had to say I think were justified by the expression I used in the heat of running along. I used the words "a ruined Germany." I should have said "a humbled Germany," which more nearly expresses my thought.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this must happen to Germany, because this, like every other great thing, is in its ultimate analysis a psychological problem, to wit: There must be "a broken and contrite heart" in Germany, but that can be trusted to come about within due time after total defeat. Whenever you take out of the German mind the idea that they can whip and override the world as a superior race of supermen your psychological result has followed automatically. No people ever made more mistakes. Even Bismarck—brute as he was and liar as he was, because he brought on the Franco-Prussian War by a lie and a forgery—said that the imponderabilia were very important things. The modern German forgot the imponderabilia. He forgot that the strongest things in this world are traditions, ideals, sentimentalities, love, hatred of cruelty, a sense of justice, and aspirations for fraternity. These modern Germans came to the conclusion finally that they could erect a material machine, with no imponderabilia about it, a great organized industrial and military machine, dedicated to the god Efficiency, and that just so they had a machine perfect enough it did not make any difference what people loved or what people hated, what people's past was, or to what future people aspired. It was the same old philosophy, Mr. President, that brought the first "blonde beast," with his knife in his teeth, around the shores of the Caspian to devastate the Greek world and the Roman Empire.

The Senator from Missouri said one good thing—which was not the only good thing he said—that might be expressed in one sentence. The best thing he said, though not in his exact language, was that this has been a war with one side worshiping Christ, the God of love and justice, bearing aloft his cross, and the other side worshiping Thor, the brute god, and flourishing his hammer.

But do you think every modest merchant and every peasant in Germany serving in these armies was carrying any hammer of Thor? He probably never heard of Thor, or his hammer either. But they had been disciplined and taught; they are—I know them—at once one of the most docile people, while they are one of the most emotional people on the face of the earth. For forty or fifty years they had been indoctrinated with a religion new to the world since the Roman Empire died, the religion of State worship. It existed in Rome.

The reason why the early Christians were persecuted and burned and thrown to the lions was not on account of their religion, but because they would not bow down to and worship the image of the Emperor and the Roman banner as they were carried through the ranks. They were, therefore, held guilty of treason to the State.

So these false prophets taught the modern Germans State worship. "Whatever is for the good of the State is right," and "the right of the State is founded upon might," and "the might of the State is founded upon implicit military obedience" to the military autocracy. That became their religion, practically.

Suppose you had been educated that way, and your father before you had been educated that way, too. Would not you have been like them, brutalized by the philosophy of brutality? One of the reasons why I have always objected to Federal control of education consists in the fact that as long as you have 48 different schemes, there is no danger of stereotyping men intellectually or morally. But this autocracy did stereotype these Germans.

Do you hate them for it? I do not. I pity them, with my whole soul. I hate the fellows who organized the machine and made of them nothing but cogs and springs in it. But I do not hate them.

Mr. President, after all is said, you can trust the President of the United States, I think, to do another thing, and that is to organize one piece of machinery, if it might be so called, consisting altogether, nearly, of imponderabilia, and that will be an "Amphictyonic council of the civilized world," a league of nations to secure and enforce the peace of the world, first by commercial pressure, and if that fail then by force itself, just as the municipal law is ultimately enforced by force itself, although in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand no resistance is made to its execution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one sentence and I am through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4647) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, two men stand forth, to my mind, to-day as the greatest men upon the international arena at this time. There are greater men in the world of course, "mute, inglorious Miltons," and all that, who have never been in position, but the two men with the opportunity to be seen and known who stand forth greatest in civil rank to-day are Woodrow Wilson and David Lloyd-George, and I would rather trust those two than to trust myself. Which is the greater of the two it would be hard to say. David Lloyd-George has an element of audacity and a promptitude of action that our man has not to the same extent. Our man has some elements of nonpassionated, cool, and cautious and even-handed judgment that David Lloyd-George, with his peppery Welsh temperament, is incapable of.

Mr. President, I do want the American people to be persuaded by anything that is said here or elsewhere that there is the slightest fear that the hope of the world, the civilization of the world, humanity itself, gentleness and love and mercy, or the complete victory necessary to secure these, will be forgotten by either of these men or by either of the great countries which they represent. I want no man to fear that there can possibly be an armistice without absolute guaranties that render Germany harmless to violate the armistice; that there can be any peace except a peace which shall secure the peace of the world as fully as it can be done by mere human agency, a peace which shall be a just peace, and one which shall tend to the future development of democratic institutions all over the world. When I say "democratic institutions" I do not mean democratic forms of government. I care not whether the form be republican or monarchical or what not, but the spirit of the government should be democratic, as it is in France and in England and here, and Canada and Australia, and wherever English-speaking white men breathe, brought up with the worship of justice for which that race has always had an innate and a trained sense, which led to the development of the common law itself, which is the unwritten constitution of the great branch of the white race which inhabits the continents and islands on which the sun never sets.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I desire to offer and to have read and lie on the table. I merely wish to say one or two words on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 316), as follows:

Whereas the Constitution authorizes the President to make "treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"; and
Whereas it is the constitutional function and duty of the Senate to advise with the President in the making of treaties; and
Whereas the victorious Germans in 1871 required the French people to elect a national assembly for the purpose of negotiating peace; therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate respectfully advise the President that it is the sense of the Senate that the treaty concluding the present war and requiring the consent of the Senate should be made with the peoples concerned through representatives duly elected for that purpose and empowered to conduct such negotiations by them in the name and by the authority of the peoples of Germany and Austria-Hungary.

Resolved further, That the Senate favors the vigorous and uninterrupted prosecution of the war until a democratic, just, and acceptable peace is made certain upon the terms approved by the President and faithful to the cobelligerents of the United States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have no doubt the treaty of peace which will be agreed upon and submitted to the Senate for its ratification will provide for a just peace, an acceptable peace, an enduring peace. As to the negotiation of that treaty I agree with others that we remit those problems and that responsibility to those charged by the Constitution with that high and solemn duty. The President will, of course, vindicate the honor and guarantee the security of the United States and keep faith with our cobelligerents in any convention which may be entered into.

The resolution offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] meets one phase of the situation. The resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] meets another phase of the situation. Those resolutions relate to terms. The resolution which I have offered relates to methods. It does indeed imply the fate of the Hapsburgs and the Hohenzollerns. For my own part, I shall be disappointed if those dynasties, survivals of the Middle Ages, shall survive this war. I doubt if the American people will be satisfied with anything less than the abdication or dethronement of the Hapsburgs and Hohenzollerns. I believe that if the American people could write the protocol it would consist of two words: "Unconditional surrender." Their sovereign challenge to the Imperial German Government would be "You surrender." Such a result would commit, and such a resolution as I have introduced would commit the fate and the future of the German people to the hands of a democratized people.

In 1871 the victorious Germans compelled the French people to elect a national assembly for the purpose of negotiating peace. May we not with even-handed justice commend this German precedent unto German observance? I know of no better way to begin, or to permit them to begin their own democratization, than to have them negotiate the treaty of peace in the name and by the authority not of Hapsburgs, not of Hohenzollerns, not in the name of and by the authority of the Imperial German Government, but in the name and in behalf of the people themselves.

There are three motives or purposes for which war may be waged: For conquest or spoils, for revenge or retaliation, and for justice and an assured peace. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that America is incapable of waging war for conquest and for spoils. It would be unworthy of all our traditions, unworthy of the character alike of the American people and the American Government. The motive and purpose of waging war for conquest and spoils have been reserved in modern times to the Imperial German Government. America is likewise incapable of waging war for sheer revenge or retaliation. Our people are incapable of dealing destruction merely for the sake of destruction; are incapable of inflicting pain merely for the sake of inflicting pain. Such methods and motives are reserved for Huns and Tartars and untutored savages. We are waging war against such methods of warfare. We can not compete with them in cruelty. We do not pretend to be their rivals in ruthlessness. Our conduct should convince our enemies of the superiority of our principles and our methods and our civilization. We should seek a moral as well as a military triumph.

I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that the allies would not if they could burn one single German town for the sake of witnessing the flames. They would not, if they could, put to death one single German child or German woman, or punish the innocent and the helpless. That is not the motive; that is not the purpose of the present contest. Whatever reparation will be insisted upon I am sure will be insisted upon not for the mere sake of the burden, the injury, or the suffering that the reparation would visit upon the German people, but in order to amend, as far as it can be amended, the injuries and the devastation visited upon these invaded lands.

I would have the German people understand that America is waging this war not for those purposes and that the United States has no purpose to wreak vengeance upon the German people as mere vengeance. I would have the German people understand that America is waging this war to establish a just peace and to insure as far as human foresight can insure a permanent and enduring peace, a peace that no autocracy will dare to violate in the future.

I hope that one of the results of this war will be to convince autocracy everywhere, and to convince those who might by any chance aspire to autocracy, that they can not with safety provoke this great democracy to wrath and to arms. This democracy is slow to wrath. It should be slow to wrath. But when it once unsheathes the sword it should not sheathe it again until justice is established, or until security is made doubly secure. I would have this war teach this truth to the skeptical everywhere that no government can ever become strong enough to adopt as a rule of conduct the abhorrent doctrine that the moral law is not binding upon states and nations. The acceptance and practice of this doctrine is the fundamental fault, the fatal fault, of the German policy, German culture, German philosophy, German thought, and German conduct. This is the cult of international anarchy, the creed of international immorality. This shocking philosophy is the mother of evils. It should perish utterly from the earth.

Mr. President, I would teach that lesson in such a way not that the Hapsburgs and Hohenzollerns but that the German people themselves will celebrate the day that peace is concluded as the day of their own deliverance from the twin evils of militarism and autocracy. I would have those people convinced that the breaking of the tiger's teeth was as essential to their own deliverance as it was to the peace and security of an endangered world.

RECONSTRUCTION COMMISSIONS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. I ask permission to present a memorandum on the reconstruction commission established by Great Britain, France, and Italy, and several other nations. I think it will be of particular interest at this time, because there are several of these measures pending. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECONSTRUCTION COMMISSIONS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

[By Elisha M. Friedman, to appear in the New York Times Annalist.]

(The Weeks and Owen resolutions and the Overman bill providing for the creation of a Federal commission on reconstruction has aroused interest in the general subject. There had been previously introduced for a similar purpose a bill by Representative EDMONDS on May 16, a Senate resolution by Senator WEEKS on September 22, and a House resolution by Representative LONDON on October 4.)

It is only by studying the steps taken by the various countries, belligerent or neutral, on all the continents that we in America can properly understand the meaning of reconstruction.

1. FRANCE.

France was the first country to take any steps providing for the after-war period. It was because her territories were devastated that her statesmen were compelled to cope with the problems of rehabilitation. On May 18, 1916, the President of the Republic created an interministerial committee to aid in the reconstruction of the invaded regions. On July 28, 1917, this commission was reorganized by presidential order. It included the ministers of the interior, of public works and transportation, of agriculture, of labor and social prevention, of war and munitions, and the undersecretaries of the general administration of the army and of commerce, industry, posts, and telegraphs.

During August, 1917, a law was passed to open an agricultural credit of 300,000,000 francs for the purpose of purchasing material, draft animals, cattle, seed, grain, plants, and other material urgently needed for the resumption of agricultural life in the devastated departments. A similar measure was enacted to aid the merchants in the invaded regions in purchasing the raw materials and tools needed for the restoration of industry.

On September 25, 1917, there was issued a presidential order constituting the ministry of public works and transportation as a special committee charged with studying the means needed to reestablish dwellings and to rehabilitate the real property damaged or destroyed by the invaders. This committee includes representatives of the various cabinet departments and of their bureaus. Its duties are to conduct investigations, to control building materials, to find manual labor and means of transportation, and to prepare the plans necessary to restore roads and structures.

In a letter to the President, dated October 1, 1917, the minister of finance, L. L. Klotz, pointed out that although there had been paid out to the war sufferers installments to apply on the reimbursement for the war damage inflicted, this measure was inadequate to revive economic activity. He recommended, therefore, that there be created a commission to study the means of organizing credit, so as to facilitate the restoration of industry and agriculture. Shortly thereafter, October 17, the President created this commission under the presidency of the minister of finance, and including representatives of the various ministries, economists, engineers, bankers, members of the chambers of commerce, and of various agricultural and industrial societies. (Sources: Bulletin de Statistique et de Legislation Compars, for August, September, October, 1917.)

2. GERMANY.

Reconstruction in its wider aspects was taken up in Germany officially in August, 1916. On the 3d of that month the Bundesrat issued its decree nominating an imperial commission for the period of economic transition. (Reichscommissariat für Übergangswirtschaft.) Article 1 of this law specifically empowers the commissioner to control the importation of merchandise and its distribution according to the instructions of the Imperial Chancellor, who will fix the date when the law ceases to be in effect. The commission was to be aided by representatives of the Federal States, the officials of the Empire, and a number of specialists. The duties of the commission, according to an address of the Finance Minister Helfferich, at a meeting of the Reichstag committee on trade and commerce, October 14 and 16, were to bring the soldiers back to civil life, to care for the disabled and provide suitable work for them, to eliminate women and children from the labor market, and to restore protective labor laws. Its additional tasks were to create credit based on real and personal property, to revive trade, to deflate the currency, and to make liquid the capital tied up in war loans. Most important of all, it would study the raw material and shipping situation.

The commission consists of nine departments, covering (1) finance; (2) transportaion; (3) iron ores, timber, paper, and stone; (4) the nonferrous metals, graphite, and clay; (5) textiles, with subdepartments for cotton, wool, flax, and substitutes, etc.; (6) food, feeds, and meats; (7) over-seas imports, as rubber, tobacco, sausage skins, oils, and fats, skins, hides, and leathers; (8) overland imports; (9) the general organization of transition economy, priority, rationing, demobilization, and general economic and legal questions. There are also two special departments covering statistics and administration.

To aid it in its work there was also created a "transition economy parliament," a council of over 250 members, subdivided into 21 subcommittees, which include some of the leading financiers and manufacturers. On October 21, 1917, a new ministry was created to deal with problems of reconstruction, whose purpose was to unify the divers measures already undertaken. The imperial ministry of economics (Reichswirtschaftsamt) took over that part of the duties of the ministry of the interior which dealt with social and economic problems and absorbed the imperial commission for transition economy. The new ministry has under its jurisdiction policies concerning industry, taxation, statistics, bourses and banks, tariffs, treaties, foreign trade, as well as social legislation. Its three main tasks are at present to find a supply of raw material and foodstuffs, to supply and distribute ocean tonnage, to improve the rate of exchange, and, in general, to facilitate the transition from a war régime to a peace basis.

It is divided into two main sections, one dealing with commercial and economic questions and the other with domestic social policy. The former is subdivided into three subsections, the first dealing with agriculture, manufacturing, and banking, which are further classified by industries. This subsection will deal with compulsory amalgamation of industry, taxation, and related questions. The second deals with navigation, water power, fisheries, etc. The third is concerned with economic intelligence and information, exhibitions, publications, propaganda, and chambers of commerce abroad. 3. GREAT BRITAIN.

Late in 1916 the British Board of Trade appointed several committees in the various trades to consider their position after the war, with special reference to international competition, and to report such measures as might be necessary to safeguard those positions.

* * * * * * *

After vigorous appeals by influential Englishmen like Sidney Webb and Lord Parker, of Waddington, and largely as a result of the study of the progress of preparations for peace made in other countries, Great Britain established a ministry of reconstruction on August 21, 1917, to promote organization and development after the termination of the war. (New ministries act, 1917, 7 and 8 Geo. C, c. 44.) The act of Parliament provided that "it shall be the duty of the minister of reconstruction to consider and advise upon the problems which may arise out of the present war and may have to be dealt with upon its termination, and for the purposes aforesaid to institute and conduct such inquiries, prepare such schemes, and make such recommendations as he thinks fit. The act also provided that "the minister present a report to Parliament each year of such of the schemes prepared and recommendations made by him as he shall deem suitable for publication."

Shortly after its organization the ministry published a list of its committees and commissions, 87 in all and falling into 15 groups: (1) Trade development; (2) finance; (3) raw materials; (4) coal and power; (5) intelligence; (6) scientific and industrial research; (7) demobilization and disposal of stores; (8) labor and employment; (9) agriculture and forestry; (10) public administration; (11) housing; (12) education; (13) aliens; (14) legal (prewar contracts and "period of the war"); (15) miscellaneous (muntions, land settlement, and civil aerial transport). The reports of many of these committees have been submitted to Parliament and several published.

4. CANADA.

In Canada there was formed early in 1918 an unofficial committee called the Canadian Industrial Organization Association, in order to consider and prepare to meet the after-war problems in industry, to maintain industrial stability, and to obtain wise consideration and treatment of reconstruction problems. According to a statement issued by the executive committee of the association, it will investigate the conditions in the various industries, the markets which they must supply, the particulars of labor, competition, and the comparative cost of transportation. Among its other aims are to promote better relations between capital and labor, to improve the social and industrial welfare of women, to support technical and general education, to increase cooperation among rural producers, improve rural conditions, and provide for land settlement of the demobilized army. (New York Times, June 9, 1918.)

5. ITALY.

In the early part of 1918 the Italian Government created a commission to study and formulate measures needed to affect a transition from a state of war to a state of peace. There had been various committees working, but a new ministry of economic reorganization was advocated to consider the acquisition of raw materials for manufactures, the increase of the Italian merchant marine, the regulation of foreign exchange by the control of trade, and the treatment of problems in labor, education, and social policy. The new commission has two auxiliary commissions, the first of which deals with administrative, judicial, and social questions, and the second with industrial, commercial, and agricultural problems. Each of the auxiliary commissions will be subdivided into sections to investigate the question apportioned to them and submit their findings to the central committee, which will draft a report to Parliament. (Weekly Bulletin, Canadian Department of Trade and Commerce, May 27, 1918.)

6. JAPAN.

With a view to inaugurating new policies so as to insure continuation of its prosperity after the war, Japan appointed an economic commission, consisting of representatives of the departments of foreign affairs, finance, communications, and of agriculture and commerce, who ought to have the services of distinguished Japanese scientists. The scope of work will include a study of the changed conditions of industries as a result of the war, the retention of its foreign trade, especially in the Far East, and the fostering of the newly established industries and an investigation of the necessary tariff reforms and the effect of the war on national and international finance. (Japanese Official Gazette, Americas, April, 1917.)

As part of the plan for fostering foreign trade there was established in Yokohama a foreign-trade bureau, which will investigate foreign-trade conditions, collect and exhibit samples of imports and exports and catalogues and magazines. It is further intended to send technical commissioners abroad to study industry so as to maintain the efficiency of native industries. Exhibits of samples of Japanese goods in various countries are another feature of the after-war trade program. (Weekly Bulletin, Canadian Department of Trade and Commerce, Aug. 12, 1918.)

7. RUSSIA.

In 1916 Russia similarly had appointed a commission to study the problems of transitions from war to peace. The program was to include the development of the resources of the Empire, to adapt industrial concerns now on a war basis to peace conditions, to secure raw material, fuel, and machinery, and to secure employment for the demobilized army and navy. In addition, the problem of currency and the public debt was to be taken up. A brief summary of the scope of the work of this economic and financial commission included the following questions of—

I. Foreign trade.

II. Attraction of foreign capital.

III. Development of ways of communication.

(1) Financial measures necessary for railway construction and waterway improvement.

(2) Measures to coordinate rail and water transportation.

(3) Commercial navigation and the construction of ports.

(a) Creation of a commercial fleet, improvement of conditions of commercial navigation, and construction of ports.

(b) Development of navigation by sea, particularly the establishment of a northern water route.

IV. Development and improvement of agriculture.

V. Development of industry:

* * * * * * *

(4) Establishment of credit for industrial concerns.

(6) Measures relating to individual branches of industry and the promotion of new branches of industry to manufacture articles now imported.

VI. Regulation of foreign and domestic trade:

(1) Measures for promoting the sale of goods exported from Russia; the establishment of permanent official bureaus, both in Russia and abroad, for supplying information and promoting foreign trade; development of Consular Service.

VII. Measures for utilizing natural resources and developing industrial life in the north of European Russia and various districts of Asiatic Russia.

VIII. Measures relating to State dominions:

(1) Extension and improvement of forestry.

(2) Exploitation of oil-bearing land, salt springs, gold-bearing areas, and other State property.

(3) Consideration of introducing system in some branches of industry and trade.

8. BELGIUM.

Upon the recommendation of the minister of foreign affairs, King Albert created a ministry of economic affairs on October 12, 1917. In the words of the recommending report "the destruction and ravages of the war and the illegal despoiling of our resources by the enemy had previously led the Government to create a number of organizations to prepare for the restoration of the economic life of the kingdom. However, it is advisable that the work of economic reconstruction be directed after methodical plans in which all the great national interests will be harmonized. There should be an intelligent unity of conception in the economic field. A wisely coordinated plan will promote the best interests of the nation. A consideration of the ends to be attained and of the facts involved lead me to the conviction that only a new department will be able to prepare adequate solutions to the grave questions which will crowd in upon us."

Article II of the law provides "that there will be attached to the ministry of economic affairs (a) the bureau of economic studies; (b) the committee of economic inquiry at London, Paris, and The Hague; (c) the Italo-Belgian committee of economic studies; (d) the Belgian delegation to the permanent international committee of economic policy; (e) the bureau of industry, created in order to study the measures to be taken and the policy necessary for the industrial reconstruction of Belgium; (f) the national consulting committee of minerals and metals; (g) the commission for the industrial and agricultural revival of Belgium; (h) the bureau of war devastation." Article III provides that "the minister of economic affairs shall take over from the other ministers the plans in preparation for economic reconstruction."

Immediately upon his appointment the new minister, Paul Hymans, recommended that there be created an economic council, consisting of experts outside of Belgium, to whom the minister might look for advice and cooperation. This body was created by royal decree on October 13, 1917. A reconstruction mission, consisting of a representative of the Belgian Board of Trade, some scientists, some labor representatives, and technical experts, is to visit the United States for the purpose of making a survey of American industrial methods, which may be used in rebuilding Belgium.

An industrial company, whose aim is to assist in the purchase of tools and raw materials of all kinds, metals, leather, textiles, chemicals, farming and other machinery, electrical goods, cars, and trucks, was organized under the name "Comptoi National pour le Réprise de l'Activite Économique en Belgique."

The planning for industrial rehabilitation and for the rebuilding of destroyed villages and cities, the repairing of ruined structures, and the replacing of public and private equipment has been provided for. A committee on national reconstruction has been formed under the leadership of the prime minister, Baron de Broqueville. (Bulletin de Statistique et de Legislation Comparée, Jan., 1918. Commerce Reports, June 6, 1918. Christian Science Monitor, Apr. 24, 1918. New York Times, Feb. 24, 1918.)

9. AUSTRIA.

Like Germany, Austria also has a minister for transition economy. There was recently formed in Hungary an interministerial commission for the distribution and utilization of military goods which are no longer needed on demobilization. The commission will be charged with the distribution of these goods among the various branches of production and with the control of the central organization which is to be created to carry out the actual work. The commission consists of the minister for transition economy (as president), one representative from each of the ministries of trade, agriculture, finance, the interior, national defense, transition economy and national welfare, and the national food ministry. Pester Lloyd, Board of Trade Journal, Mar. 28, 1918.)

10. BULGARIA.

In anticipation of a revival of trade after the war, Bulgaria developed water-power facilities, created a bank for the promotion of trade, and founded a great variety of banks for the financing of industry with a total capitalization of about $50,000,000. (Commerce Reports, Oct. 27, 1917; Jan. 22, 1918.)

11. SERBIA.

In realization of the collapse of agricultural and commercial activity in Serbia, the State has undertaken to assist and control private initiative in the attempt to revive the national industrial life. The ministry of commerce communicated with traders and banks and others concerned in the reprovisioning of the country so as to regulate the quantity, price, and origin of imports, special preference being given to the allies.

Assuming that the central powers would retain Serbia, the Hungaro-Bosnian and Oriental Economic Central Association has undertaken a study of the reconstruction needs of Serbia in agriculture, industry, trade, as well as social and cultural institutions.

12. SPAIN.

In order to anticipate its future needs, Spain appointed, late in 1917, a commission of the directorate general of industry and commerce, which, within four months, was to draw up a memorandum dealing with the questions of the foreign trade of Spain. The subjects on which the commission is to report cover—

1. The state of the foreign trade of Spain in 1913 and 1914, classified by countries and articles and citing the competition encountered and the reasons Spanish manufacturers found it impossible to retain these markets.

2. The disturbance in the world market occasioned by the war; nations that have suspended their exports; nations that have maintained their export, showing the extent and the conditions; markets lost and won by Spain; the permanent and transitory character of new exports from Spain; the strengthening of former branches of the export trade; Spanish industries that have increased their productive capacity by entering such market.

3. The analysis of the economic consequences of the war, including the possibility of economic wars and the formation of two irreconcilable groups, or the necessity for living together economically with no greater separation than that of differential tariffs among allies; the consequences to Spain of either form of international trade arrangements, and the foundation on which Spain may base the continuation of its economic relations with the various groups; an inquiry into the system of commercial treaties, including a consideration of the "most-favored nation" clause; a tariff for encouraging Spanish industries; and a defensive custom tariff to counteract export bounties.

4. Economic independence of any country is not entirely desirable as it might isolate it from the rest of the world; the commission is therefore to include a classification by countries—the market and products of the goods which Spain can contribute toward the trade of the world in such a manner as to allow Spain to obtain supplies from foreign countries and build up home industries by acquiring outlets abroad. (Gacetta de Madrid, Oct. 15, 1917; Board of Trade Journal, Nov. 22, 1917.)

Late in 1918 the minister of public works announced "the creation of an organization which will forthwith take care of the economic life of Spain both for the period of transition between war and peace and for the lines of policy which will have to be followed after the war." (British Board of Trade Journal, Aug. 1, 1918.)

13. HOLLAND.

On July 2, 1918, the Netherlands minister of foreign affairs installed the "advisory commission for economic information abroad," with a view to coping with the increased impediments in the world's traffic after the war. Among the plans provided for are an increase in the number of consuls, greater facilities for travel by consuls, and the creation of an office of technical adviser at the important consular posts. (Commerce Reports, Sept. 3, 1918. New York Times, Aug. 7, 1918.)

14–15. SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES.

Representatives of the Scandinavian countries assembled at Stockholm to consider means for the protection of Scandinavian trade after the war, in the direction of further commercial cooperation, the adoption of uniform commercial law, a revision of the maritime law, and the further maintenance of the Scandinavian coin convention. (London Economist, Oct. 20, 1917.)

In order to acquire greater economic independence and to import the least possible amount of goods, the Norwegian Government established a department of industrial supply, whose function will be to develop the natural resources of the country and to build up the industrial organization of the country. (Commerce Reports, Feb. 7, 1918.)

In Sweden there was formed in the summer of 1918 a new organization to aid the export trade after the war. As a result of the close cooperation in Germany between the State and industry, Swedish merchants felt the need of following all measures taken in foreign countries which may be inimical to Swedish interests. By cooperation and centralization Swedish traders intend to secure the most favorable prices and conditions. An expert committee capable of negotiating new trade treaties is an outgrowth of the new organization. (Tidsskrift for Industri, Commerce Reports, July 6, 1918.)

16. CHILE.

On September 6, 1917, the President of Chile appointed a committee to investigate and report on the condition which the industries and commerce of Chile will face upon the reestablishment of peace, the competition between domestic and imported commodities and to recommend measures for the protection of the present condition and for the encouragement of their further development. (Commerce Reports, Dec. 15, 1917.)

17. BRAZIL.

Some recent economic measures, though not strictly relating to postbellum conditions, indicate the foresight with which all nations regard the future. At a recent meeting of the Commercial Association of Rio de Janeiro it was proposed to extend the commercial relations of Brazil by studying how to increase reciprocal commercial relations between Brazil and its allies, by asking for suggestions from chambers of commerce in foreign countries concerning Brazilian legislation, tariffs, exchange, and merchant marine, and by intensifying domestic production. (Commerce Reports, May 14, 1918.)

18. COLOMBIA.

A financial conference of the representatives of various chambers of commerce in Colombia convened to study the drop in foreign exchange, its cause and remedy, the deficiency of currency, and the fiscal crisis.

OPPOSITION TO RECONSTRUCTION DISCUSSIONS.

In England some of the leading publications have opposed the discussion during war time of afterwar conditions because of the many uncertain factors in the situation. The London Economist (May 4, 1918) severely criticized the report of the Balfour committee on commercial and financial policy after the war. A similar attitude is prevalent in Italy and Japan. (Corriere della Serra, July 16, 1918; Nichi Nichi, Oct. 22, 1917.)

PEACE PROPOSALS OF CENTRAL POWERS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I thank the senior Senator from North Dakota for his courtesy in yielding for a very brief statement. During the morning hour I presented to the Senate a petition in the form of a telegram sent to me by the chamber of commerce at Jackson, Mich., one of the strongest and most patriotic business organizations in our State. It expressed the almost unanimous sentiment of the people. It insisted that there should be no peace parley, no armistice, at this fateful hour, but that the President and Congress should demand of Germany unconditional surrender. I was glad to present that petition to the Senate and to say to my constituents that I am in hearty accord with their sentiments. I think it is unfortunate that this controversy should have arisen. There was no adequate excuse for it. The President's reply to the German chancellor has made equivocal what the people and its Army and Navy felt was certain. It is the doubt that disheartens, when hope and courage should predominate. The President, however embarrassing it may be to himself, must save the diplomatic situation. He should counsel with our allies before speaking to Germany. I must assume that his often-expressed desire to speak the will of the people still maintains and in some way will find expression now. I have presented this petition in order that he may understand what the peoples' will is. I trust that it will reach his attention.

To lose the advantage which the allies now have and to lessen our great influence with them would be a colossal blunder and might result in a practical German victory. It must not be.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I know of nothing that can be more valuable at this time than these discussions as they have been going on for the last two or three sessions of the Senate. I know that the President keeps in close touch with the sentiments of the people of the United States, but I believe that the sentiments of the several States are emphasized by the declarations that are made by the several Senators on the floor upon the great problem now before the American people.

I desire first, Mr. President, to have read a telegram, a single one which I have selected from many from my own State, which I believe very succinctly expresses the conviction of all the people of the State upon any proposed armistice or any suggestion of peace. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). The telegram will be read, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

MANDAN, N. DAK., October 13, 1918.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Citizens of Mandan oppose armistice that will give Huns opportunity to retire safely within their own borders with army fully equipped to defy the world. We should demand unconditional surrender as first step.

E. D. TOSTEVIN, Mandan Daily Pioneer.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now present, as epitomizing my own views upon this subject, the resolution which I introduced the other day. I ask that the Secretary may read the resolution, omitting the preamble.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. McCUMBER on the 7th instant, omitting the preamble, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 24.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be no cessation of hostilities and no armistice until the Imperial German Government shall disband its armies and surrender its arms and munitions, together with its Navy, to the United States and her allies in this war;

That before any armistice or peace proposals shall be considered the Imperial German Government shall unreservedly consent to the principles of reparation declared as terms of peace by our allies;

That it will pay in damages the cost of rebuilding and reconstructing all the cities and villages destroyed by its armies and restore to fertility the lands devastated by it;

That it will repay every dollar and the value of all property exacted from the people of any territory invaded by it;

That it will make proper compensation and allowance for every crime committed by its armies contrary to the laws of warfare and humanity, whether on land or sea;

That it will return to France Alsace and Lorraine and the indemnity exacted from her in 1870; and

That it, further, accepts all the additional conditions laid down by the President in his said address of January 8, 1918.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, until the President replied to the peace proposal of the German chancellor, Prince Maximilian of Baden, I had rested secure in my conviction that nothing would stay the progress of our war until we should secure an unconditional surrender on the part of the enemy, and that, after having secured that unconditional surrender, we would then be in a position not to make a negotiated peace but a dictated peace with the enemy which would not only assure restoration and reparation but also the future peace of the world. I had felt assured after the President's speech of September 27, in which he declared that—

We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the Governments of the central empires, because we have dealt with them already and have seen them deal with other Governments that were parties to this struggle at Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest. They have convinced us that they are without honor and do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principle but force and their own interest. We can not come to terms with them. They have made it impossible. The German people must by this time be fully aware that we can not accept the word of those who forced this war upon us. We do not think the same thoughts or speak the same language of agreement.

I say I had felt assured that there would be no further discussion until the Hohenzollern dynasty had been entirely eliminated by the German people themselves. I had also felt a degree of assurance and certainty that inasmuch as the President recognized that we and our allies were fighting a world war for world interest we would not even suggest terms that were not entirely in accord with the declarations of our allies.

The President's reply to the German chancellor, I confess, has made me a little less certain of our position. I have never made any criticism of that reply and shall not do so, because the reply did not speak the last word the President had to say on the subject, but rather presented certain queries the answer to which might determine his position as to whether he would give any answer whatever to the plea. It seemed to me, however, that the President's reply as it then stood left certain inferences and was subject to such implication as might estop this country from making the full demands which justice, right, and the sentiment of the American people and our allies demand. It seemed to me that when the President requested the chancellor to state whether or not he represented the powers which were responsible for this war or the German people, he would be more or less bound by the reply of the chancellor, and especially if his reply asserted that he did represent the German people, and also that when the President suggested to this chancellor that he did not feel justified in presenting the question of an armistice to our allies so long as the German Government was in possession of any part of the allies' country, and especially when he requested to know whether it was the intention of the German Government to immediately withdraw its armies from conquered territory, that the German Government might well assume that if they did declare their purpose to withdraw from invaded territory and proceeded to do so—as they are now doing with some speed, accelerated by the bayonets of American and allied soldiers—that an armistice would probably follow; and, further, that when the President asked the German Government whether or not they agreed to accept not merely the principle but the terms laid down in his address of January 8 and subsequent addresses, that the question carried with it the suggestion that if they answered directly in the affirmative, no other or further terms would be imposed by this country or its allies as conditions of peace.

And, Mr. President, it was because I felt that the country ought to know that the Senate of the United States does not believe that the mere withdrawal of German troops from conquered territory, and even the surrender of claim to the French Provinces seized in 1871, or the reconstruction of Baltic States, set out in the President's several addresses, ought to be the limit of our demands or the only conditions upon which we will discuss terms of peace with that Empire, that I introduced my resolution on the 7th day of October.

It will be remembered that nearly three-fourths of a year of most desperate warfare has elapsed since the declaration made by the President on the 8th of January, 1918. At that time the German Government defied the United States. Since that time about a million brave men have died because of that refusal. Does not that fact justify an additional demand if the President's terms do not include all that justice requires? Since that time the German armies have wantonly destroyed hundreds of cities and villages. Doesn't that fact alone justify and even demand additional penalties?

I now wish to present to the Senate and the country each specific declaration in my resolution, upon which I ask a response from the Members of this body. I know what the response of the people of this country is as to each demand contained in this resolution. The first is—

That before any armistice shall be considered the Imperial German Government shall unreservedly consent to the principles of reparation declared as terms of peace by our allies.

The Senate will remember that again and again have Great Britain, speaking through her several premiers, and France, speaking through Clemenceau, declared that inasmuch as Germany had made this unprovoked war, was wholly responsible for it, had been the cause of all the deaths resulting from it, all the misery and suffering, she should not and would not be allowed to escape by a mere restoration of the territory she had invaded. They insisted and demanded reparation as well as restoration. And I ask the Senate and I ask the American people, Ought we to demand and insist upon that reparation? Is not the insistence by us upon such a demand a solemn duty which we owe to our allies? We who have scarcely gotten into this war little realize what our allies have been suffering for more than four years, the crimes committed against them in the name of war, the awful acts of brutality which they have had inflicted upon them. And now, when the tide of battle has just begun to turn in their favor, when they, with our assistance, are in a position to punish those who have so brutally maltreated them, can we and will we call a halt in our onward march? Can we allow diplomacy to weaken the avenging arm? No, Mr. President; I know the answer, the heart response of the American people and of this Senate, and that answer can be expressed in two words only—"unconditional surrender."

That resolution declares that before any armistice shall be considered the German Empire and its allies pledge themselves to pay in damages the cost of rebuilding and reconstructing cities and villages destroyed by their armies and to restore to fertility the fields devastated by them.

I am not in this declaration assuming that this country or the allies will compel the criminal who committed this awful act against humanity to pay the full cost of the war. Of course that in justice should be done, but we can not afford to enslave a people because of the crime of their aristocratic rulers. But most of this destruction was not the result of ordinary warfare. There was no occasion demanding that soldiers should set fire to the homes of the peasants; that they should cut down their orchards; that they should murder their people. As Germany retires from France and Belgium there is no military necessity demanding the destruction of every city abandoned by them. Such destruction does not and can not impede the march of our victorious armies. It is done not through the necessities of war but through the sentiment of malice and hate engendered, encouraged, and commanded by this autocratic militarism against which we are now battling.

And again I ask of the American people, of the Senate of the United States—yes, and of the President himself—the heart response as to whether this wanton destruction of property at least should be met and covered by indemnity?

Again, this resolution declares:

That the central powers must agree to repay every dollar and the value of all property exacted from the people of any territory invaded by them.

Mr. President, things have transpired so rapidly, new wrongs and atrocities have followed one upon the heels of the other so rapidly, that we are wont to forget, and I fear possibly our souls become so inured to these acts that we might fail to demand that which was in our hearts at the time, full recompense for the injuries inflicted. The central powers deported from conquered territory the entire able-bodied population of both sexes from the age of 16 to 60, except women with young children. While we were paying enormous wages, as were Great Britain and France, for labor the central powers enslaved and forced to work behind their lines from the population of Belgium 7,500,000, of France 3,000,000, of Serbia 4,500,000, of Roumania 5,000,000, of Poles and Lithuanians 22,000,000, or a total of 42,000,000 slaves.

The plunder of human beings, supplies and property, laborers, war materials, provisions, minerals, raw products, manufactured products, personal property, art objects, and specie during the four years has amounted to at least $10,000,000,000.

Andre Cheredame, in his book Pan Germany, published at the close of the year 1917, gives the value of many items of property taken up to that time. I shall recite only a few of the more important ones.

Germans have taken possession of vast stores of raw materials in their descent upon France, Belgium, Serbia, and Roumania. Cannon, rifles, munitions, wagons, locomotives, cars, as well as thousands of kilometers of railway of which they make full use, representing billions of francs.

The Belgian railways system is worth three billions.

In France they stole all the horses, cattle, domestic animals, grain, potatoes, food products, meats, sugar, alcohol, and so forth.

They seized all the coal and iron ore, copper, petroleum, and so forth.

From the cities of northern France alone the Germans took 550,000,000 francs worth of hay. The plunder has been worth a number of billions to them.

Everywhere in the occupied territories they took motors, steam hammers, rolling mills, lathes, press drills, electrical engines, lamps, and so forth, and transported them to Germany.

They took private property of all character of the value of several billions and divided it among German officers.

The works of art taken by them are of enormous value.

War imposts:

Our official report shows that requisitions have everywhere been continuous. Towns that have had to meet the expense of troops quartered within their jurisdiction have been overwhelmed by huge levies. Belgium is staggering under an annual war assessment of 480,000,000 francs. Bucharest, after its capture by the Germans, was forced to pay a levy amounting to about 1,900 francs per capita of the population. At Cralova the levy was 950 francs per capita. An edict forbids the circulation of paper money unless it has been stamped by the Germans who retain 30 per cent of its nominal value.

In April, 1917, the Frankfurter Zeitung announced that the leaders of the Austro-German forces of occupation in Roumania would shortly call for an obligatory internal loan of 100,000,000 francs. In Poland the German Government has just issued a billion marks in paper money for enforced circulation.

As I have stated in another address, tribute upon the poor Belgians alone amounted to $500 per capita. In the light of all that afflicted country has suffered, the savage destruction of everything within its borders, in most cases for no other purpose than to satisfy the lust of the invaders to terrorize the population, ought we not to demand and insist by every principle of honor and justice that the sums extorted, the property stolen, should be fully compensated for? And let it be remembered, Mr. President, that in the speech of January 8 there is not one word concerning this retribution for these offenses committed against these innocent, helpless people; there are words of restitution, but not a word of reparation.

Again this resolution reads:

That it (the German Government) will make proper compensation for every crime committed by its armies contrary to the laws of warfare and humanity whether on land or sea.

Mr. President, prior to our entering the war, the President of the United States on many occasions declared to the German Government that this Government would hold that Government to a strict accountability for any infringement of the laws of war affecting American ships, property, or lives. Have we forgotten the Lusitania? Was that vessel sunk contrary to the laws of war? Was the act of the demon who hid under the waves, sent the shot without notice, without according the right to surrender, which sent mothers with their babes to the bottom of the ocean, an act of honorable warfare or the act of a murderer? Shall we maintain the word which we sent to the German Government at that time, that we should hold her to a strict accountability? What is the sentiment of the President? What is the answer of this Senate? What is the answer of the American people? You and I know what it is.

And again let us recall that our allies who have, as the President has often declared, and as we all now recognize, been fighting our battle for about four years before we really got into the war, have suffered a hundred fold more than we have suffered. Shall we desert them or shall we stand with them in demanding the reparation for the wrongs committed against them? There can be but one answer to this question. The American people will stand with France and Great Britain, and Belgium and Serbia, until all of these wrongs have been righted.

Again this resolution declares that:

The central powers shall make proper compensation and allowance for their crimes committed by their armies, contrary to the laws of warfare and humanity, whether on land or sea.

But a few days ago an American liner was torpedoed. After its little guns were shot away so that it could not continue even that feeble defense against a deadly submarine, the commander of this submarine proceeded to shoot into fragments its lifeboats that no one on board should escape. He seized the only lifeboat with its 20 occupants that had escaped the shrapnel, tied it to the submarine, and in that spirit of hellishness which has seemed to actuate the heart of every submarine commander, the submarine submerged. The breaking of the cable alone saved the lives of these doomed men who were thereby enabled to convey this atrocious murder of their comrades to the American people. And this is done at the very moment that the central powers are extending their hand and crying for mercy. What mercy had they for these poor helpless victims? Will this country demand as a condition of an armistice, or as a condition of peace, that the German Government surrender this monster for court-martial trial? Can you, and will you, say to the mothers of those brave boys who were sent down to death without any opportunity of defense, who were not accorded a single right accorded to the most desperate enemy when he has surrendered—will you say to these mothers and to the American people, that this matter is of such little concern, such a small incident in this great warfare, that we will not take notice of it? I would ask the heart response of the members of this Senate and of the American people upon this declaration. And remember again, that while we have suffered an occasion of this kind but once or twice, our allies have suffered it a hundred or a thousand times.

Shall we desert them in their just demands for retributive justice? Do you think that the captain of the U boat who, having destroyed a British merchant ship, proceeded to destroy all the lifeboats, then compelled the few remaining persons who were still alive to throw away their life preservers, and then submerged, sending all but one, I believe, to death—do you believe that that commander should continue to enjoy the sunshine and the blessings of life? Will you join the allies in the demand that this captain shall be surrendered and tried by a military court? Gen. Pershing reported that one of our American boys who had been captured was found with his head almost severed from his body, under evidence which showed a struggle, and that after his capture he had been most brutally butchered. Will you say to the American father who gave that son, There shall be no peace until these murderers pay the penalty of their crime against your boy? What is the response of Senators; what would be your response were it your own boy? What is the response of the American heart to this declaration?

Mr. President, there have been published in the New York Tribune each day accounts of a series of atrocities that have been established beyond any possible question, and which I wish to insert in an epitomized form, without reading them, as a part of this address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NO. 1.

Near Mellen, Belgium, a woman was standing by the roadside with a babe in her arms, watching the Germans of the Thirty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Regiments marching some prisoners by. A German officer halted and asked for water. The woman brought the water and observed that he should be shot instead. The officer pulled his revolver and killed the woman and babe.

NO. 2.

The Thirty-fifth Regiment of Germans were on hands and knees, moving against Belgian trenches near Antwerp, behind a human screen of Belgian women and children. One woman turned and faced the Germans and refused to advance. The German creeping behind her gave her two bayonet thrusts, at the second one of which she fell. One of the children ran to her, and the German placed his gun to its head and blew it off. Then the Belgians, who had been unable to fire for fear of killing their own women and children, left the trenches and attacked with bayonet.

NO. 3.

A German patrol—6 men and 1 officer—with 40 civilian prisoners was marching near Malines, Belgium. The officer stopped and knocked at a door. No one came. He ordered the men to break in. The peasant appeared, and they shot him for not coming quickly. The wife came out with a child in her arms. She put the child down and sprang at the Germans. She clawed their faces. One soldier killed the woman by a tremendous blow, another transfixed the child with his bayonet, and held it up for the others to see. Then the house was fired.

NO. 4.

For some reason the Huns declared the village green in Tamines, Belgium, a sacred zone. One day on this green were 20 German soldiers and one officer. A little Belgian girl and her two brothers came trespassing. To those who witnessed the act it appeared the children were only looking at the soldiers. They may have been impudent or taunting. Nobody will ever know. Suddenly the Germans slew the children, all three. The little girl was shot through the ear.

NO. 5.

One September evening four years ago a Belgian air scout reported to the defenders of Malines that the Germans appeared to be advancing with children in front of them. It was true. There were about 10 children in front of them. They were from 7 to 9 years of age and reached to about the Germans' chests. The Germans were firing above their heads as they advanced.

NO. 6.

At Monceau, Belgium, the Germans burned 312 houses and shot a lot of the inhabitants. They entered a house, and seeing a young man run into the garden shot him in his tracks. Then they took the father and a second son into the garden. They shot the boy first and compelled the father to stand close to his son, and shot the father in that position.

NO. 7.

Four years ago at Malines, Germans suffered first temporary defeat. Belgian soldiers saw one house not burned like the others and investigated. On the floor were the dead bodies of a man, a woman, a boy, and a girl, all with feet and hands cut off. One of the Belgian soldiers who forced the door was surviving son and brother. He went mad at the sight, seized a gun and a horse, and rushed off in the direction of the German Army. He was never seen again.

NO. 8.

Four years ago, on September 8, the English shelled Basseville, Belgium. Huns temporarily repulsed visited their vengeance on the helpless. On entering the village the British found in one house an old man by the fireside strangled, an old woman in a bedroom strangled, and a young girl about 17 in the yard strangled.

NO. 9.

At Campenhaut, three German cavalrymen entered the house of a well-to-do merchant who was known to have a good wine cellar. Having drunk 10 bottles of champagne they called in six more officers. Then one officer called for the society of the merchant's wife. She came, and he put his revolver to her temple and shot her dead; then told the merchant to dig a grave and bury his wife.

NO. 10.

In August, 1914, the Germans marched through Herve to Liege. A German officer in a motor car with several soldiers called to two young men, who, being frightened, started to run. They were shot in their tracks. On August 8 the Germans were stopped at Fléron by one of the Liege forts. Enraged at this, they returned to Herve for revenge. They burned 327 houses in two days and fired indiscriminately on civilians at the doors. Shot one woman at close range, although she had a crucifix in her hands and was begging for mercy.

NO. 11.

Between Flemalle Grande and Jemepepe in Belgium is an inn called Campagne de Flemalle. Fourteen Germans placed four men and one woman against a wall and then shot the four men. They did not shoot the woman. She cried and fell on her knees, begging for mercy. The four men were not quite dead, so the Germans finished their work with bayonets.

NO. 12.

Herod's massacre of all male children in Bethlehem 2 years old and under was with a purpose that could be understood. The slaughter of Belgian children by Germans was worse. Civilian prisoners were compelled to march with the Huns out of Malines. Near Sempst they passed a small farm homestead burning. Close by the road stood a woman with two children. As the Germans passed they drove their bayonets through the children. (Bryce report, appendix, p. 110.) "The two children," says the testimony, "were pitched into the flames by the soldiers who killed them; they tossed them in with their bayonets. It was a different soldier who killed each child."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we have read of the deportation of women and girls of France into Germany and of their abuse by the cruel military masters, and then when broken down in health and no longer able to work that they are returned to be a charge on the French Government. Let me cite here but one instance. There was returned only the other day a woman who testified that during the nearly four years she had been a prisoner she had been compelled to become the mother of three children. Two were boys, and they were kept. The third, a frail little girl, was sent back to France with the health-broken mother.

Senators, this may seem to be far away, but it is right at home in France; and this is but one case out of tens of thousands. Will we insist for France that those who have committed this crime against the daughter of some French mother, possibly whose husband has died for his native land, shall pay the penalty of that crime?

Now these, Mr. President, are things which I say the central powers may well say to be outside of, and not included within the clear terms of the President's declaration of January 8 and subsequent declarations. The question with us is, Should we make peace without those additional terms? Should we declare an armistice until we are in a position to enforce those terms? Is there any man in the whole United States with a soul, with a human heart, who does not feel that all of these are most righteous demands, demands which if surrendered would be a blot on our own sense of justice and humanity?

What I fear, Mr. President, is that taking this speech of January 8, 1918, as the basis of negotiation, the central powers expect that, except as to matters clearly indicated by that speech, to escape without further punishment across their own borders which have not been scarred anywhere by this awful war. I first ask myself, Can we in honor say this will be the extent of our terms? If I remember rightly the President in one of his speeches, which I do not now recall by date, declared in substance that the same principles of right and wrong which govern individuals in their relations with each other must henceforth govern nations in their relation to each other. With that I am in most hearty accord. But how are we to inaugurate such a system if we impliedly say to the world in our peace proposals that the nation which commits murder shall in no way be held in punitive damages for that murder? Let us present a parallel case. Your neighbor for years has been secretly preparing to rob you of your property, to murder you and your family. He has inculcated in the hearts of his own family the principle that force alone should govern this world. He has inculcated in their hearts hatred toward you. He has been preparing and waiting for an opportunity to carry his murderous purpose into effect. The opportune time comes. He knows you are not prepared to defend yourselves. Without a word of warning he fires your buildings. He forces himself into your home. You and your unarmed children defend yourselves with the best improvised weapons you can command. Being prepared he inflicts terrible punishment upon you. You see your children brained by this monster of hate, your wife murdered before your eyes. You see your innocent and helpless babe with a bayonet thrust through its breast. You battle on in desperation and resolve to avenge their deaths or die in the attempt. Your enemy begins to show signs of exhaustion. In the strength of your right, you find yourself at last able to meet him on something like equal terms. He feels his own waning strength. He reads vengeance in your eyes, victory in your raining blows. He must now depend upon his cunning to save his life. He proposes an armistice. He says to you: Do not battle further, and I will retreat and go back to my own home, and you and I will sit down together and we will enter into an agreement whereby there shall be henceforth peace between us. Let me ask you as a normal human being, what would be your response? Would you take his bloody hand, dripping with the life current of wife and babe, in yours, or would you continue that battle until he was mauled into submission? I know what your answer would be.

Now, this is just exactly what has transpired in Europe, except that nations and not individuals are engaged in that drama. The Central Powers were ready. They had schemed for 40 years the destruction of their neighbors. They had robbed France of two of her Provinces in 1871, and made her pay in damages for the privilege of being robbed. With the memory of the seizure of Silesia from Austria, of Schleswig from Denmark, of Alsace-Lorraine from France, the time had come for the conquest of Belgium, the domination of Serbia and Roumania, the great Mitteleuropan military power, the destruction of Great Britain, and the defiance of the world, and those powers struck the blow on land and sea. They struck it against nations wholly unprepared, at France first, and then Great Britain who, as I have heretofore stated, fought for two years with one hand while preparing for war with the other hand.

No act has been too atrocious to be eliminated from their mode of operation. They expected to win by terrorism. But a righteous and indignant people, though fewer in numbers, held them back until this great Nation, tardy of action, slow in preparation, came into the conflict on their side. We know what would have been the result had they succeeded—an enslaved world, buffeted and kicked and abused by the most despotic militarism the world has ever known. Their arrogance did not leave the world in doubt as to their purpose. They had even declared it long before the blow was struck. A confiding world could not believe that such an atrocious purpose could be possible. Let me read to you the terms the Central Powers had decided upon when their initial success in the great onslaught of March 21, 1918, gave them a brief but signal success. These were the terms:

Germany is entitled to the following terms because of its strength, and until they are realized there should be no armistice:

Annexation of Belgium.

Annexation of the entire Flanders coast, including Calais.

Annexation of the Briey and Longwy basins and the Toul, Belford, and Verdun regions eastward.

Restitution to Germany of all her colonies, including Kiaochow.

Great Britain must cede to Germany such naval bases and coaling stations as Germany designates.

Great Britain must give Gibraltar to Spain, cede its war fleet to Germany, give Egypt and the Suez Canal to Turkey.

Greece must be reestablished under former King Constantine, with frontiers as before the war.

Austria and Bulgaria will divide Serbia and Montenegro.

Great Britain, France, and the United States must pay all of Germany's war costs, the indemnity being a minimum of $45,000,000,000.

They must also agree to deliver raw materials immediately.

France and Belgium must remain occupied at their expense until these conditions are carried out.

This is what Germany would have imposed upon the world had she succeeded in her most accursed war.

In the face of these demands by those who had made this criminal war against the peaceful nations of the world, in the face of the condition in which we would be placed had this great Mitteleuropa propaganda been successful, let me ask Senators, let me ask the American people, yes, let me ask the President himself, if we are not committing a grave injustice to the American people and to our brave allies if we say to these central powers that upon the surrender of Alsace and Lorraine, which do not belong to you; upon the retrocession of the territory invaded by you; and upon the agreement to cede certain territories in the Balkans we will allow you to return to your own home and will make no further demand upon you than that you will agree with us that you will not again commit such an offense? Are we not clasping the blood-guilty hand of the worst criminal the world has ever known? Are we not dishonoring our own cause by failing to insist that before we will speak one word of peace to these powers we must bind their arms and insist that before they can expiate their crime they must respond in damages at least to the extent of compensating for those things which are outside the pale of recognized and honorable warfare? I insist that the nations engaged in the defense of the world against this ogre of militarism is committing a crime against its own people, an offense against its own cause, if it fails to exact this partial justice from our enemies.

Coming now to the present aspect of the case upon the exchange of notes between this country and the Berlin Government, what will the German Government lose if this war is continued until her armies are defeated? Mr. President, she will, first, lose the Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. They will be returned to France, and returned unconditionally.

Second, she will lose her navy, because she can not be left with arms to renew this war.

Third, she will be compelled to pay for the wanton destruction of cities and villages and for her devastation of lands and homes.

Fourth, she will be compelled to return every dollar exacted as tribute and the value of every article which she took from people of municipalities in conquered territory and for every murder or enslavement committed by her contrary to the laws of modern warfare.

Fifth, she will be compelled to pay for every merchant ship and property therein sunk contrary to the recognized rules of warfare, and make allowance for the families of those whom she has murdered contrary to such laws.

Sixth, she will be compelled to surrender those military beasts who have perpetrated these crimes against helpless men, women, and babes.

Seventh, she will be forced to witness the dethronement of her Hohenzollern dynasty.

Eighth, she will be compelled to surrender important strategic positions to the allies until all agreements have been fulfilled.

Ninth, she would probably see the collapse of the great structure built up by the Iron Chancellor Bismarck. Bavaria, at least, would probably become an independent nation.

And right here I might ask if there is a single one of those terms that ought not in justice to be imposed? Has not this military autocracy earned, and more than earned, this mild penalty, when viewed in the light of the awful crime it has committed against the world in making this war, the monstrous purposes it had in view, and what punishment it would have inflicted on its enemies had it been victorious?

Now, what does the German Government expect to gain by the acceptance of the principles laid down by the President in his January 8 address and in his subsequent utterances? And this is a most important fact for the Senate to consider. Remember that these are all the German Government has agreed to accept, either in principle or in detail.

First, it expects to save the Hohenzollern dynasty and with it the military autocracy of Germany, the root from which it may again grow the deadly Upas tree of German militarism. I know many of those in this Chamber say we have nothing to do with the question of who shall govern or how the German people shall be governed. Mr. President, if that is none of our business, then this war is none of our business. Whatever may have been the particular cause which forced us into this conflict, once being in it, we accepted its full issue and full responsibility, and that issue was a world issue. In the words of our President it was a war "to make the world safe for democracy," and the world will never be safe for democracy nor safe for any unmilitary nation as long as the present governmental system of Germany, with its standard of force and brutality, is allowed to continue.

Therefore, Mr. President, we declare that it is our business as to what kind of a government shall be continued in Germany, whether it shall be a military government or a peacefully inclined government.

I was most gratified when the President, in his speech of September 27, declared:

> We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the Governments of the central empires, because we have dealt with them already and have seen them deal with other Governments that were parties to this struggle at Brest-Litovsk, and Bucharest. They have convinced us that they are without honor and do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principle but force and their own interest. We can not come to terms with them. They have made it impossible.

And, again, in his Baltimore speech, when he says:

> There is, therefore, but one response from us—force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make right the law of the world and cast every selfish domination down in the dust.

I am still hoping that the President has not backed down one inch from that position. Of course, he knows, as we all know, that the spokesman of the German Government is Kaiser made. The meeting which accepted the terms referred to in the last reply of the German Government was a meeting of the petty sovereigns of the different States composing the Empire, not one of them elected by the people and every one of them representing the military idea of force and plunder.

I have heard it rumored that pressure has been made upon our President to recede from this position. It has even been stated to me that an American ambassador to one of our allies has written to the President suggesting that it would be necessary for him sooner or later to recede from that position; that in the end he would have to deal with the present German Government which forced this war, as the German people would not repudiate their self-deified rulers, and even urged the President to consider peace proposals by negotiation.

Second, the German Government, by accepting as a basis for peace the President's said speech, hopes to retain Alsace and Lorraine by according to those Provinces certain autonomous rights. The President declared in his address of January 8 as follows:

> All French territory should be free and the invaded portions restored and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly 50 years, should be righted in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

But the President does not say how this wrong shall be righted. I have not the fear, as some have, that the President will ever accept anything less than the absolute return to France of those Provinces, torn from her by force, and the repayment of the indemnity exacted at that time. How else could these wrong be fully righted? But this return is not declared definitely, and, of course, if we enter into any discussion with the central powers, they will claim that their proposed autonomy for these Provinces will meet the President's demand.

Third, the German Government expects by accepting these proposals to avoid any and all other responsibility for its wrongs and atrocities. And, Mr. President, this fear of retributive justice is by far the most important reason for accepting the President's suggestions at this time. The German Government, in the face of a sure defeat, sees its haven of refuge in the President's mild proposals. It sees in those proposals not one word of reparation for wrongs, not one word about indemnities for atrocities committed. You will note the rather cunning inquiry or supposition contained in this last reply of the German Government, in which they say:

> The German Government believes that the Governments of the powers associated with the Government of the United States also take the position taken by President Wilson in his address.

That means that they take no further position; that they make no further demands.

Now, as a matter of fact, the German Government well knows that these addresses of the President of the United States do not comprehend the limit of the demand by other powers. Lloyd George and preceding British premiers, as well as Clemenceau, have declared again and again that no peace will be considered until the Central Powers are ready to make reparation. And, Mr. President, if either the United States or France or Great Britain concludes a peace without righting these wrongs they will have wronged and deeply wronged the brave soldiers who have died for world justice as well as those who have been murdered through hate.

The moment the allies near German territory an awful fear comes over the people. "Save us from invasion" is their wild cry. And why? Because, Mr. President, they say, "The invaders will come with their hearts filled with the atrocities and brutalities committed by our armies against them. They will burn our cities as we have burned theirs. They will maltreat and murder German prisoners as we have maltreated and murdered their prisoners. They will drive the bayonet through the tender bodies of our babes as our soldiers have done in Belgium and as our allies have done in Roumania and Serbia. Surrender or do anything that will save us from this retributive justice."

Mr. President, this is a battle to the death between the doctrinaires of force and the advocates of right. Both can not survive, one or the other must fall. If the autocratic militarism of the Central Powers is ever to be defeated, now is the opportune moment. For it might never again be possible to so unite the weak against the strong, the unprepared against the prepared.

At this critical moment there can be but one safe reply to the plea of this military autocracy for a respite—that reply is, Unconditional surrender. There can be but one place to discuss and formulate terms of peace—that place is Berlin.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when the Senate met this morning I asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce a resolution (S. Res. 314). That resolution was read, and I have no intention of asking that any disposition be made of it until the Senate shall again convene. The resolution was prepared with some care, although I introduced it with a view that it might not entirely represent the existing situation, and, therefore, might be aptly subject to amendment. The purpose which I had in mind was to clarify, if possible, what seems to be a misunderstanding in some quarters, both in Congress and among the people, of the character and extent of the President's frequently announced program of peace.

I have noted, Mr. President, with some regret, both in the discussions here and in the comments of the press, what seems to me to be a distinct note of distrust either of the President's courage or of his purposes; a feeling that unless the Senate and perhaps the press generally, to say nothing of the vast body of the people, shall announce their views regarding the pending diplomatic situation, the President will commit the Nation to a policy which does not represent the public opinion of the country, and which will also prove to be a distinct disappointment to our allies. I am sorry to observe the existence of such a feeling, for I do not believe that there is any occasion for it, and because, unfortunately, it is too apt to justify the impression that political considerations have much to do with the discussion.

I have no right, Mr. President, to speak for the President of the United States or for anyone except myself on this occasion, and, therefore, by way of preliminary, I wish to emphasize the fact that this resolution is an attempted embodiment of my own view of the President's attitude on the terms of peace. If I am correct about it, then there is nothing in any position taken by the President, either in the formulation of a program of peace or in his comments upon it, that need give anyone but Germany and her allies any serious cause of apprehension.

The President of the United States, by the fortunes of war, has become the spokesman of all the world, except the central empires. As one writer aptly expresses it, he has advanced to leadership through the anguish of the Nation, and right well, Mr. President, has he discharged the duties of that lofty and most exalted position. He has spoken many times since America entered this war, and what he has said on all occasions has been apt, has expressed the sentiment not only of America, but of the allies, and has received the almost unanimous approval of the public sentiment of the people of all the allied nations. He has never spoken impulsively nor without due consideration of the tremendous import which every word uttered by such a man must convey. I, therefore, assume, Mr. President, because I believe it to be a fact, that when he speaks, he speaks not only for but with the allies; that when he speaks, he voices the conclusions to which all the allies have previously given their assent; and that he has never committed himself to any line of policy since this war began, unless and until that line of policy has been communicated to our associates in this war and has received their approbation.

Mr. President, I base that statement upon the unbroken tide of applause and approval which has greeted every utterance of the President since the 1st day of January, 1918. I refer to that date because every utterance of his regarding a program of peace has been made since then.

If I am correct, Mr. President, in my assumption, then it must follow that the celebrated 14 items or bases of a permanent and lasting peace promulgated by him before the Congress on the 8th day of January last, and his subsequent references to that subject, are the collective thought and expression of every nation engaged in this war on the side of the entente allies; that it is not only the American idea of peace but the allied idea of peace; that it is American, because we are in this war with other nations; that it is allied, because a common spokesman announces a common sentiment.

Mr. President, we should also remember in our consideration of the President's attitude and of his recent actions that he knows world conditions and everything relating to this war far better than we do. It is his duty to be informed, as it is the duty of his associates to see that he is informed. He, therefore, speaks from an abundance of information to which we can not at present lay claim; and, while he may say some things which do not at first meet with our entire approval, we may be sure that they are not impulsive or careless utterances, for they are the utterances of a man at present charged with great responsibility. If this were not so, more than one note of disapprobation would have reached us from Great Britain, from France, from Italy, or perhaps from all these nations combined; yet I do not recall, Mr. President, the utterance or announcement of any such discordant view.

On the 6th day of October an incident occurred which placed upon the shoulders of the President the most imposing duty and the most far-reaching responsibility which, in my judgment, was ever borne by mortal man. I have reference to the note of the German chancellor which, communicated by the representative of the Swiss Government, informed the President of a request by the German Government that he take in hand the restoration of peace, acquaint all the belligerent States of this request, and invite them to send plenipotentiaries for the purpose of opening negotiations. The German Government also informed the President of its acceptance of the program set forth by him in his message to the Congress on January 8 and in his later pronouncements, especially his speech of September 27, as a basis for peace negotiations. There is a vast difference, Mr. President, between the acceptance of pronouncements as a basis for peace and the acceptance of those pronouncements as a basis for negotiations leading to peace.

But the German Government went further, and, "with a view of avoiding further bloodshed," it requested "the immediate conclusion of an armistice on land and water and in the air." Let me note here, Mr. President, that it is Germany, and Germany alone, which has requested or suggested an armistice. The President has suggested no armistice; and, of course, neither he nor the allies have ever requested one.

This note addressed to the President of the United States by the head of the German Government could not, in my judgment, be ignored. Some seem to think that the President should have treated it as he treated the Austrian request of a few days previous, and that there is some inconsistency between his terse rejection of the Austrian note and the manner of his inquiry regarding this one; but, Mr. President, there is no parallel. Austria, in a most involved communication, seemed to request a conference which would be unbinding upon anyone and whose purpose would be to discuss terms of peace.

The President very properly pointed to the terms which had been clearly announced more than once and declined all further reference to the subject. This, however, asks for an armistice pending negotiations of peace based upon the President's own request.

Now, bearing in mind, Mr. President, what I believe to be the fact, that this communication was sent to our associates in this war, as Prince Maximilian requested, and bearing in mind the necessity of mutual action, not only with regard to the details of the progress of the war but particularly with regard to the immensely more important subject of peace, it was communicated to the allies either through their ministers here or through our ministers at their respective capitals, and no reply was made to it until a complete and satisfactory understanding regarding the character of that reply had been arrived at.

The President on the 27th day of September, I think, in laying down what may be called supplemental terms of peace also took occasion to use this language. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] put it in the RECORD the other day, but it is appropriate that I should again read it:

> We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the Governments of the central empires, because we have dealt with them already and have seen them deal with other Governments that were parties to this struggle at Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest.
> They have convinced us that they are without honor and do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principle but force and their own interest. We can not come to terms with them. They have made it impossible.

No weightier words ever fell from the lips of our Chief Executive. But he continues:

> The German people must by this time be fully aware that we can not accept the word of those who forced this war upon us. We do not think the same thoughts or speak the same language of agreement.

Having therefore a suggestion from the German Government, a government which the President had a few days before declared to be wholly untrustworthy and treacherous, what reply could the President make except it were an inquiry regarding the character of the government making the request and also regarding the suggested armistice? It was the most natural thing, therefore, and I think the most shrewdly diplomatic course that could possibly have been taken that the President answered as follows:

> Before making reply to the request of the Imperial German Government, and in order that that reply shall be as candid and straightforward as the momentous interests involved require, the President of the United States deems it necessary to assure himself of the exact meaning of the note of the imperial chancellor. Does the imperial chancellor mean that the Imperial German Government accepts the terms laid down by the President in his address to the Congress of the United States on the 8th of January last and in subsequent address and that its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon the practical details of their application?

This was made necessary in my opinion because the note itself, as I have already said, asked the President to request and invite all the belligerent States to send plenipotentiaries for the purpose of opening negotiations and for using the President's propositions as a basis for such negotiations. But in view of the fact that the German chancellor had also suggested an armistice the President continues:

> The President feels bound to say with regard to the suggestion of an armistice that he would not feel at liberty to propose a cessation of arms to the governments with which the Government of the United States is associated against the central powers so long as the armies of those powers are upon their soil.

This is unmistakable.

> The good faith of any discussion would manifestly depend upon the consent of the central powers immediately to withdraw their forces everywhere from invaded territory.

The President also feels that he is justified in asking whether the imperial chancellor is speaking merely for the constituted authorities of the empire who have so far conducted the war. He deems the answers to these questions vital from every point of view.

Mr. President, I think there is but one historical instance where the asking of questions was so fraught with momentous consequences as this. I refer, of course, to the celebrated queries propounded by Mr. Lincoln to Mr. Douglas during their celebrated debate two years before the Civil War. Mr. Lincoln during that debate was questioned by Mr. Douglas and with characteristic candor he answered every one of them plainly, and then propounded four of his own. I will read the second and most important of them:

Can the people of a United States Territory, in any lawful way, against the wish of any citizen of the United States, exclude slavery from its limits prior to the formation of a State constitution?

It is said that Mr. Lincoln's friends attempted to dissuade him from asking that question as well as the others, fearing that as a consequence he would be defeated in the senatorial race then pending. Mr. Lincoln's reply was that he was after larger results than the senatorship, that his adversary might answer those questions so as to succeed himself in the Senate, but if he did so he would destroy forever his chances of being President of the United States, and if he answered them for the latter purpose then he was doomed in the existing race for Senator. So, Mr. President, it resulted. Mr. Douglas saved himself in the senatorial race but wrecked himself and his party in the far greater and more important presidential campaign of 1860.

Mr. President, an answer has come to the queries to which I have just referred. It will be noticed with what hot haste it was announced that upon the receipt of the President's queries a gathering of kings was ordered in Berlin. They came from the four quarters of Germany at the behest of the Kaiser himself to answer two simple questions propounded by a plain President of a democratic Republic, hitherto regarded with supreme contempt by their majesties and whose armies were declared to be of little power or consequence. But these kings in their asembled capacity or otherwise did not answer the President's query. That proceeded from the German Government, and attention has already been called to the fact that the word "Imperial" no longer appears in official German communications. It did not appear in the note of Prince Max. It does not appear in this. The German Government itself declares:

The German Government has accepted the terms laid down by President Wilson in his address of January 8 and in his subsequent addresses on the foundation of a permanent peace of justice. Consequently its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon practical details of the application of these terms.

This, Mr. President, commits Germany, not the Kaiser. It has committed Germany to the President's peace program. Whatever the immediate result of this note may be, it spells for all time the defeat of a German peace; for there can be no German peace without a repudiation of this note, and there can be no repudiation of the note without domestic disaster to Germany herself.

But that is not the President's greatest triumph. It says:

The German Government believes that the governments of the powers associated with the Government of the United States also take the position taken by President Wilson in his address. The German Government, in accordance with the Austro-Hungarian Government, for the purpose of bringing about an armistice, declares itself ready to comply with the propositions of the President in regard to evacuation.

The German Government suggests that the President may occasion the meeting of a mixed commission for making the necessary arrangements concerning the evacuation. The present German Government, which has undertaken the responsibility for this step toward peace, has been formed by conferences and in agreement with the great majority of the reichstag. The chancellor, supported in all of his actions by the will of this majority, speaks in the name of the German Government and of the German people.

Berlin, October 12, 1918.

(Signed) SOLF,
State Secretary of Foreign Office.

In all the history of the Hohenzollerns, Mr. President, no such document as this was even sent from their capital to a foreign country. Only during the dark days for them of 1848 was such language tolerated anywhere. In answering this question, therefore, the President has driven his diplomatic dagger straight into the heart of the Hohenzollern dynasty. It is the beginning of the end for them, because he has forced that Government, whatever it may be, out into the open, in so far as to make it declare that it has consulted with the representatives of the German people and speaks in its name, and no reference to the Kaiser exists here in any particular.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from Colorado if he has complete faith in the description of the German Government of its own status?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it might and probably is open to serious doubt; but, assuming the authenticity of this note, the voice to the world is a voice which German people have also heard. And in this age of democracy, at a time when the issue is a deadly one between autocracy and democracy, the sincerity of the German Government in making this declaration is in my mind secondary to the vast importance of the declaration itself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not intend to pursue the interview, but merely to remark that the Senator from Colorado is more optimistic than I am.

Mr. THOMAS. I am seldom accused of optimism, on the contrary I am sometimes the source of great depression to my friends because of the somewhat darker and more somber view that I take. In this instance, if I am optimistic I am decidedly glad to know that for once in the world I am taking a brighter view of things than perhaps is the common one of my friends on the other side.

Mr. President, the weakest part of this note as regards its last phrase lies in its coupling of the German Government with the German people. The President has declared that he has no confidence in and can have none and will not treat with the German Government if that Government is still under the control in part of the junker forces of Prussia. If it still represents, as I am inclined to think it does represent, the reactionary forces of the German Empire then the question of the President has been answered, but not in such a way as to permit him to accept the good faith of that Government and consider any question of negotiation at all.

Moreover, Mr. President, the German Government, whatever it may be, does not in this note comply with the unquestioned and positive suggestion of the President, which declares that no armistice can be considered until the evacuation is an accomplished fact. On the contrary, for the purpose of bringing about an armistice it declares itself ready to comply with the proposition of the President in regard to evacuation, the German Government suggesting that the President make known the meeting of a mixed commission for making the necessary arrangements concerning the evacuation. That is no answer. The President says virtually, "Get off the soil of the allies before you can expect me to submit a question of an armistice to the allied powers." That is a condition precedent which Germany does not meet, and not having met it betrays the fact and is not ready to accept any suggestion covering completely the position and the attitude occupied by the President and by the allies with regard to the fundamental conditions of a suspension of hostilities.

Mr. President, here is a dispatch of October 12, published in yesterday's papers:

LONDON, October 12.

The ministers of the allied Governments, says the Express, have discussed the German peace overtures and agreed upon a line of common action. The British, French, and Italian ministers first conferred and reached a decision, after which the British and French cabinets confirmed the conclusions.

Does anyone doubt, if that be so, but that the President is fully informed as to what those conclusions are? Does anyone question but that those conclusions and his own are identical; and can anyone therefore doubt that the action to be taken very soon by the President of the United States with regard to this note will be eminently satisfactory to all the allies and therefore to ourselves? Mr. President, I know in my inmost heart that the man at the head of the affairs of this great Government is as much concerned in the making of such a peace as will be permanent, such a peace as will accord with victory and the supremacy of democratic institutions, as any man in the country in or out of this Chamber. Nay, more, Mr. President, the responsibility being his, his concern in that regard is infinitely greater. He needs support, encouragement, confidence to-day more than a President of the United States ever needed these influences from every man, woman, and child in these United States. I think that he has them. I believe that he deserves them. I am sure that when his reply comes he will vindicate them.

I was asked this morning by an eminent Senator why, in the resolution which I offered, no reference was made to Turkey. I think the answer is obvious. We are not at war with Turkey. Turkey is not at war with us. Turkey is not included except inferentially in the letter sent to the President and published yesterday morning. The Austrian Government doubtless is, although the name of that Government does not appear in the note. The allies will deal with Turkey. The voice of the United States when that time comes may be potential—it certainly will have it influence—but I do not conceive it proper to make any mention in a resolution like this of any country with which we are not actually engaged in war. We have to deal with the two central empires, and those only. Our allies have to deal with the central empires, Bulgaria, and Turkey. A common peace, Mr. President, may and should include them all, but the terms of peace between Turkey and the nations with which she is at war must be dictated and determined by those nations alone, our good offices being extended, of course, whenever they may be requested.

I have no question, Mr. President, but that the many telegrams and the many addresses to which we have listened since the 6th day of October correctly voice the sentiment of the American people. This war, the greatest and most destructive and most causeless of all the wars of history, has levied its bloody toll upon every nation engaged in it. Ours, the greatest Nation in the world, with unlimited resources, has, since its entry into the great tragedy, given most freely of its men and of its means. Its only purpose has been and is to vindicate its own institutions, maintain its own honor, and do its part in the salvation of the human race and the preservation of its civilization.

To surrender now to Germany, even indirectly or partially, would probably prove a tragedy, because it might prove to be nothing but a truce. We do not want any more wars that will come to plague our posterity if we can avoid it. That they will come in spite of all we can do I verily believe, because human nature is the same throughout the centuries, but that they may be minimized and made as rare as possible will be worth all the blood and all the treasure that we have poured out and will continue to pour out in our own cause and that of our allies.

Of this I feel sure that the President is as earnestly convinced as any man can be; I know that in his declaration as a basis for peace he has kept in mind the terms of the allies, which, tersely stated, consist of reparation, restitution, and indemnity. There is nothing in his own utterances upon the subject which do otherwise than supplement the utterances of our allies. Peace must come with the complete subjugation of Germany, and that will come, Mr. President, by refusing to treat with any Government representing indirectly the influences which made this war possible. To do less would be to do injustice to ourselves and a graver injustice to posterity. The price which has been paid and which is being paid, that free institutions may prevail and individuals and individual nations live without oppression, must continue until that end is reached, whatever the cost.

This sentiment, Mr. President, was well expressed in a little verse written by a soldier who paid for his devotion to liberty the penalty of his life upon the succeeding day:

In Flanders fields the poppies grow,
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place; while in the sky
The larks, still bravely singing, fly
Unheard amid the guns.

We are the dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunsets glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe.
To you from falling hands we throw
The torch. Be yours to bear it high.
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies blow
In Flanders fields.

We shall break faith, Mr. President, neither with our soldier dead, with our allies, nor with the great principles for the vindication of which we entered this war.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I was unable to be present during all the debate this morning. I have secured a copy of some of the speeches that have been made, and I wish to read from the speech of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. He speaks with great emphasis and with great clearness. While I do not always agree with him, I am very glad to find that I fully indorse the entire speech which he made this morning. I am going to comment upon that speech, and I wish to say now that I deem myself fortunate to be considered as one of his friends. He is Missouri's gifted and brilliant son. I repeat, while I have not always agreed with him—indeed, have very frequently disagreed with him—his views command not only the respect of the Senate but the respect of all other thinking people. Reading from his speech of this morning, on page 153 of the manuscript, he says:

I have not been a worshiper of the President, for I worship no man; but I honor the President; I have always honored him. I respect him as a man and I highly honor him as the Chief Executive of this great Nation; but I have never been a truckler, a cringer, or one who goes at his heels. However, in this hour I stand here to say that Congress can make no greater mistake, the Senate can make no more tragic blunder, than to give the country to understand that Woodrow Wilson proposes to fritter away the fruits of this war. I do not believe it; I can find nothing in my heart and nothing in his conduct to warrant such a thought.

Mr. President, "apples of gold in pictures of silver." I would that I had the power and the gift of expression to say as succinctly and as clearly what Missouri's eloquent son said this morning.

If a stranger should have walked into the Senate galleries, Mr. President, during the proceedings this morning, or during our last session, and he should without any previous information on the subject have heard only the debate here, he would imagine that Woodrow Wilson has done all those things which the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] some weeks ago said that Mr. Buchanan did. If a stranger, with no previous information upon these questions, should sit in the Senate gallery that stranger would be led to believe that the President of the United States was now on the very verge of committing the most colossal blunder of all human history. That stranger, if he possessed no information upon the subject and judged only from and by the debate, would be led to believe that all the strategic advantages which our victorious and valorous Army has achieved and all the advantages which the soldiers of the allies have achieved were about to be frittered away by some thoughtless, heedless, careless man who is now Chief Executive of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senate has a great function to perform. In speaking the other day I said I was glad to see the Senate express opinions. I think the truth is that we do not express opinions enough on these great questions. But how can we assist the Chief Executive in the prosecution of this war by these dolorous utterances, by these tones so like lamentations, by these forebodings of disaster, by these anticipations of betrayal, as it almost were, charged up against the Chief Executive? When did the Chief Executive of this Nation betray a trust? Where do you get any information or any suggestion that he is about to be weak-handed in this great hour of victory? One Senator this morning said that right now in the hour of victory the fruits were about to be dashed from the lips of the allies.

Mr. President, I am not venturing to assume the rather dubious rôle of a prophet, but I know enough about the affairs of men, and I believe I know enough about the affairs of governments, to realize that when the answer of Woodrow Wilson is made it will ring out like a silver bell when struck by a steel hammer at midnight, and all of this rumor, and all of the lamentations, and all of the mournful things that we hear on the other side of the Chamber will be dissolved and dispelled, even as the mist and fog are dispelled by the bright sunlight that shines in the great southwest.

Mr. President, if Senators objected to the 14 terms laid down in the speech of the President to both Houses of Congress on January 8, why have they been so ominously silent until this very grave hour? If there was a mistake made when the President laid down his 14 principles, why did not then the Senate object? Why did it wait until this hour, the critical hour, I was about to say the most critical hour, in the history of the world, for I think I am not overstating the case when I say this is the most critical hour in the history of the world? Since Von Kluck, in 1914, began to drive his army, with irresistible force and deadly precision, straight against the heart of France, the situation has been perilous. From that very hour until a couple of months ago all civilization was in peril. Who was the steady President at that time? The same Woodrow Wilson. What was it that induced Congress to declare war? It was nothing less than the message of the President of the United States. Would the Sixty-fifth Congress have ever declared war had it not been for the message of the President delivered to both Houses of Congress on the 2d of April, 1917? Only the President could have shown Congress its duty.

Having induced this Congress to declare war, having led the people correctly, having by his commanding ability placed himself in the position where he is now not only the spokesman of our country but the spokesman of all of the allies as well, what has come over the spirit of the dreams of people and especially of Senators who now claim to see about to be played by the Chief Executive a betrayal of the world's civilization?

Mr. President, Senator after Senator has arisen and declared that the 14 terms were not sufficiently specific. I have no quarrel with any man who misinterprets or misunderstands a question. Some things seem plain to me that other Senators do not understand, and I confess that events and circumstances and deductions that other Senators make I do not see at all, but let us recur for a moment to the eighth subdivision of the terms laid down by the President in his speech of January 8 to both Houses of Congress:

8. All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Loraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly 50 years, should be righted, in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

"The wrong done France." What was the wrong done France? The tearing away of Alsace and Lorraine, those two gems, those two Provinces from France that belonged to her.

Again, Mr. President, what little reputation I have as a prophet, if indeed I have any, I am willing to stake here and now that when finally peace comes Alsace and Lorraine will belong not to Germany but will be restored to France, to which nation they justly belong.

Senators have expressed the fear that Belgium may not be restored. I wish to say that my view of the President's speech of January 8 is that Belgium must be restored and that compensation will be made to the Belgian people. How could Belgium be restored if proper and adequate compensation were not made to the Belgian people? Would the evacuation of Belgium be sufficient? Does anybody who indulges in the luxury of reflection pretend to say that a mere evacuation would be a restoration?

Not at all. Cities and towns destroyed should be rebuilt; and I believe—and I may have faith larger than that of other men—that under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson they will be rebuilt and the devastated portions will be restored, so far as human energy and German money can be made to restore them.

A note of fear has been sounded that an armistice might be granted. I am not a military man. The only place I ever drew a sword was at a raffle [laughter], and I know nothing about military affairs; but I do know that armistices are not made by presidents or kings. Here in this Chamber are men who have served in the Army. They know that an armistice is made by the generals in the field.

An armistice, if there be one, will be granted upon the suggestion of Marshal Foch, that brilliant, that resilient, that wonderful genius who has driven the Germans back; if an armistice is granted to the German brute it will be upon the suggestion of Marshal Haig, that sturdy Englishman who has stood as Wellington stood with the immortal squares at Waterloo; if an armistice is granted to the Germans it will be made after the request of Gen. Pershing. No President has ever taken the field. It was suggested, indeed, when St. Clair met with disaster in the Indian fighting in the West that if Washington had left the Capital and gone into the field the disaster would not have come; but I do not recall that any President—and the historians of the Senate will correct me if I am wrong—ever left his place to go into the field. I presume if Woodrow Wilson would go into the field he might have the power to ask, and, following precedent, might ask for or grant an armistice, if he saw fit; but I wish again to assure the Senate—and I am speaking for myself alone—that if an armistice is had it will be upon the suggestion and request of the generals who are in the field facing the shot and shell and who know whereof they speak.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does the Senator not mean that it will be with the consent of Marshal Foch and not at the request of Marshal Foch? Surely the Senator does not mean that the marshal of France is going to ask for an armistice.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for the interruption; he has corrected me, and I am very glad he has done so. What I meant to say was that if an armistice is granted, if an armistice is had, if the President directly or indirectly consents to one, it will, in my judgment, be because Marshal Foch and Marshal Haig and Gen. Pershing have suggested to him that, in their judgment, it would be proper to grant one. I thank the Senator for his correction.

Mr. President, it seems to me at this time that we ought not to prejudge the President. The distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in very ornate and correct language portrayed the great burden that is now upon the Chief Executive. I think that any man, whatever his ambitions may have been and whatever his aspirations for the Presidency may have been, ought to be thankful to his star that he is not the President at this hour, and ought to hope that if he ever becomes President no such burden will be laid upon him as is laid upon this man Woodrow Wilson. Like the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I have not been the President's spokesman or his confidential friend. I have differed from him when I thought I was right in differing from him, and I shall continue to do so whenever my conscience and my judgment tell me I ought to do so; but I do believe it is not the best service we can render to our country by venturing continually and with tiresome reiteration to repeat that we fear that the President is about to weaken his grasp, and that strategic advantages which our valorous armies have won are about to be frittered away by some ill-considered course of action on his part. I do not know what will be the next move either in the military or the diplomatic world, but I believe that no thinking man, no just man, now believes that the President of the United States is going to say, either by written or spoken word, anything that will weaken the present happy and fortunate condition of our troops—fortunate and happy in so far as victory is concerned and in so far as their leadership is concerned. I do not believe that any man to-day believes that the President contemplates taking any action that would in any way chill the ardor or weaken the spirit of our Army in the field or our people at home whose sons are being sent to glorious sacrifice and whose money is being generously poured out into our common Treasury to pay the expenses of this great war.

Mr. President, another note which has been sounded and upon which the changes have been rung is that should an armistice be had some advantage will be taken of it. I wish to say, further, that it is a very happy thing for the people of the United States that I am not President, and I hope no such unhappiness will ever come to them, but I recognize a wise man when I see him, and I think President Wilson is wiser than I am. I would attempt, if I were President, unfortunately for the country, to leave a trail of blood and fire from the Rhine to Berlin. That might not be the best thing for the world. I do not think I am any more revengeful than any other man, but I might say a life for a life and a ship for a ship; I might say things that would not contribute to success and victory, to happiness, and to the peace of the world in the future. It is a very happy thing that neither I nor any other Member of the Senate to-day is President of the United States. It is a very fortunate circumstance for the peace of the world and for the success of our arms that the man who has a chin like the Plymouth Rock is President of the United States; it is a very fortunate circumstance that a man is President whom neither abuse, sarcasm, ridicule, speeches, oratory, nor anything else can move, except the sense of what he believes to be right and just.

The President in his letter of inquiry to the German Government suggested that no armistice could be had while the armies of the Teutonic powers were on invaded territory. Therefore some fearsome souls say that Germany might not be required to abandon and evacuate Russia because by the treaty of Brest-Litovsk Russia is no longer one of the allies. The President says, in paragraph 6 of his speech of January 8:

> The evacuation of all Russian territory—

All Russian territory.

Senators seem to fear that the treaty of Bucharest might have the effect of taking Roumania out of the category or domain of an ally. Surely, if the President can not be trusted to see to it that Germany must evacuate all portions of all countries she has stolen and pillaged and ravished he can not be trusted to do anything.

As to Turkey, if I had my way, the Ottoman Turk, who has been a pest to civilization for more than a thousand years, would be put to the sword for his long list of crimes. It will be borne in mind, as has been stated, that we are not at war with Turkey. The Turks are shooting our soldiers, however, and, although we are not legally at war with Turkey, we may be technically at war with her; but the President, in paragraph 12 of his speech of January 8, said:

> 12. The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty. But the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development. And the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guaranties.

So Senators may give their perturbed spirits rest. Turkish power in Europe will be broken.

Mr. President, if the stranger I mentioned a few moments ago, having no previous information upon the subject, should sit in the Senate gallery, he would think that he was looking on the Senate of 1861 to 1865, which was in opposition to Abraham Lincoln. I wish to say—and I have the books here to prove it—that during a part of the War of 1861 to 1865 there was a time when there was only one Senator of the United States who had the slightest confidence in Abraham Lincoln. He was wiser than they were; they were going to win the war with their mouths, and were always indulging in evil forebodings as to what baleful thing Lincoln was about. I am sure that if Gen. Grant had failed to capture Vicksburg—and the only friend Gen. Grant had in June, 1863, was Lincoln—not only would Grant have been removed, but President Lincoln would have been impeached and a dictatorship would have been set up to run the Government for the remainder of the war. That is history.

Why, if a stranger, without any previous information, had walked into the gallery this morning and listened to the lamentations of these modern Jeremiahs, the stranger would think that he was in the Continental Congress, with the galleries open, and Conway and his cabal and Gates and his adherents were hamstringing, abusing, and making the pathway hard for George Washington. Washington won in spite of the Continental Congress, Madison won in spite of the Blue Lighters, and Polk won in spite of the Little Americans.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Was there not this difference between that time and this time in both Houses of Congress, namely, that in the Civil War there were at times Members of both Houses who were in reality against the President, who did not support him at all in the war, whereas at the present time there is not a single Senator to-day who is not for the most earnest and aggressive prosecution of this war?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as to whether or not Senators have been supporting the President, I leave that to the RECORD; whether the Senators who voted for the war supported the President or not I do not know; I leave that for other men to decide; whether those who voted against the draft supported the President or not I leave for somebody else to decide. but surely for some reason—I know not what—no candid man will deny that this atmosphere in the Senate, especially on the Republican side, is supercharged with hostility toward the President at this hour.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, what I was asking was, Is not every Member of this body heart and soul for the prosecution of this war?

Mr. ASHURST. I am very glad I do not have to answer for the heart and soul of every Member of the Senate. It is a pretty good-sized task to answer for the heart and soul of myself. I hardly know how to answer the distinguished Senator. I am not going to be partisan enough to deny that a large number of Republican Senators have earnestly and honestly and ably supported the President in this war. No one who has a tinge of fairness would deny that statement, of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, my point was that, while there may have been some Democrats and some Republicans who were slow about getting into the war, nevertheless since we have been in the war there is not one among us on either side who is not most ardently in favor of prosecuting the war.

Mr. ASHURST. Well, now, it has just been suggested to me that some of President Lincoln's critics took the same position with reference to President Lincoln. Senators say they are willing to support the President in his conduct of the war, but they employ captious criticism as to the method in which he conducts the war. I hope that these speeches this morning—these dolorous speeches—were not made for the purpose of securing any partisan advantage in the coming elections. I do not believe that they were made for that purpose; but I should like to know for what purpose they were made. Were they made for the purpose of assisting the President, whose burden now is certainly very great? Were they made to assist him? If not, for what purpose were they made?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. First let me finish this sentence. In such a stupendous hour, when the scales are trembling, when we are all looking and seeking for the truth, and possibly the President not seeking for it more than some Senators themselves, I hardly think it contributes to a correct solution to charge the President with the crime of being about to become weak-kneed and yielding up the advantages that our armies have achieved in the field.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona will undoubtedly know that the morning papers of to-day throughout the whole country are—every one of them—expressing the same sentiment that Senators have expressed here. They are all good, strong supporters of the Government and of the President in the prosecution of this war; but undoubtedly they have felt that their voice ought to be heard. They express the American heart and sentiment. Then, why should not the American representatives express the same sentiment? They are supposed to represent the American people. Can there be any harm in saying to the President we do not want any kind of a compromise, even though we may feel that he will not comprise; that there may be no cessation of hostilities, even though we do not believe that there is any great danger of such a cessation; and that there shall be no talk of peace unless there is first unconditional surrender? That means that we are with him, the same as the press is with him.

I am one of those—if the Senator from Arizona will allow me—who stand straight with the President on his 14 propositions. I might possibly, in the first instance, have some doubt as to what the third proposition meant, but I am certain the President did not intend to convey the idea that he would be in favor of free trade with this country. I know he did not mean anything of that kind; and I do not agree with my colleagues who think that he meant just what they have said that third proposition does mean; but I think that we are entitled to a little something beyond that which is in the 14 articles; and, if I say that I want something more, that is not saying that I do not agree with everything that is contained within those 14 articles.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is right in the statement which he has just made. The Senator is very calm and very clear headed. Suppose he were President—and the Republican Party could do a vast deal worse than to nominate the distinguished Senator from North Dakota for President—suppose that he were President, and that he had 8 or 10 months previously laid down certain terms to a nation with which we were at war, and had supplemented that with other terms, saying "these terms must be met before we will think of a cessation of hostilities"; suppose then a message purporting to be regular, however irregularly it might come, as this wireless message has come—suppose such a message should come from the Government with which we should be at war, saying "we are ready to meet all of your terms." What would the Senator do? Will the Senator answer that question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated that a short time ago; but if the Senator from Arizona wants a direct answer to that question, I will say that I would say to such a nation, "Nine months ago you refused those terms, and because of your refusal you have caused the loss of the lives of millions of men; you have destroyed hundreds of cities and villages; you have permitted a vast number of atrocities; and while you are pleading for peace you are committing atrocities upon American ships and upon American seamen. So I now, in addition to my 14 articles, will demand of you reparation for the wrongs that you have subsequently committed."

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from North Dakota justifies my inference that he would not make a bad candidate for the Presidency, and I think I would say the same thing which he has just suggested. But who is there here who will dare say that the President of the United States will not say just that same thing? Who is there here who dares say the President is not as wise as the Senator from North Dakota and that the President will not say that very thing?

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope he will.

Mr. ASHURST. My complaint is that we have anticipated what the President is going to say; we have proceeded upon the hypothesis that we can not trust him to say the correct thing.

I will now ask permission, as a part of my remarks, that the Secretary read an article in the Sunday New York Times by Mr. Charles H. Grasty. It is not very long, and I should like to have the Senate listen to the article, headlines and all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WISH WILSON'S NOTE HAD REBUKED ENEMY—EUROPE IN WHITE HEAT OVER GERMAN ATROCITIES, BUT COOLER MINDS APPROVE REPLY.

(By Charles H. Grasty.)

PARIS, October 11.

It is remarked that while the President's reply to Berlin has commanded formal approval from the press and public of Europe there seems to be a lack of enthusiasm in some quarters. It is true, perhaps, that the present European mood would have been better suited if the President's reply had contained a note of severe reprobation of Germany's crimes.

Europe is worked up to a white heat of indignation by the wanton destruction of the Hun in northern France. This deviltry, added to all that has happened before, and coming at the moment of a prayer for an armistice, caused a wave of disgust and indignation to sweep over France.

Those who are looking for practical results rather than the venting of these very natural human emotions hold, however, that the President's reply is of precisely the right temper. They say all moral forces still lie at the bottom of the matter. The President has reserved them and they will go into the scale later at maximum weight. Any expression of horror, any tone of vindictiveness would have dissipated in some degree the moral advantage which the entente now has over Germany.

"The President's idea of cold justice saves the situation in its entirety," said a prominent American. "Every wrong Germany has done since August, 1914, is on record, and will count in the final reckoning. If Wilson's note had borne the color of vengeance or expressed the slightest emotion it would have played Germany's game. The controversy once launched in these tones and terms might eventually lead to what would be distorted into an appearance of crimination and recrimination, out of which the militarists could draw new material for fooling the German people.

"Nothing more fortunate for Germany could happen than to have the whole world alight with passion just now. It is reason and justice she has to fear. In the President's reply one seemed to hear the click of handcuffs on the wrist of the German militarist felons."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am going shortly to conclude. Other Senators are anxious to claim the floor, and I do not want to weary the Senate. I wish merely, however, to say that one of the reasons why Woodrow Wilson, and not some other man, is President is because Woodrow Wilson can read and speak without color of vengeance. The fact that I am unable at times to speak on these matters without a tone of vengeance is what has retarded me and what retards all of us. That is the reason that some of us are not President, likely; and it is happy for the country that at this hour of great peril there is a man at the helm who can talk without color of vengeance and who can write without color of vengeance, but who, when he does write and does speak, you can hear, as this paper says, the "click of handcuffs on the wrists of the German militarist felons."

Now, Mr. President, I have no fear; in fact, as a modest, unpretending Senator, I will assure the Senate that when the President does speak and does act on the latest German expression or pronouncement, it will be a speech or an action which will not in any way relax the iron grasp which our soldiers and the soldiers of our allies have in Flanders and in France; when he does speak or act it will be such speech or action as will not in any way discourage the spirit of our people, our soldiers, or our allies. On the contrary, it will be such speech or such action as will tend, rather, to encourage and stimulate them to higher and, if it were possible, to more valorous endeavor.

I will again read from the eloquent speech of Missouri's brilliant Senator at page 160 of the manuscript:

I tell you, sirs, that when the conditions of peace are written, the hand of Woodrow Wilson will not be, it can not be, subscribed to any treaty that does not compel Germany to tread the wine press and to pay back to the world, as far as she can in her own suffering, for the agonies that she has wrought and for the desolation that she has brought upon the earth.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from the New York World of yesterday, entitled "Is this what men are dying for?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the New York World, Oct. 13, 1918.]

IS THIS WHAT MEN ARE DYING FOR?

What is back of some of the Republican criticism of President Wilson's diplomacy and some of the Republican opposition to his peace program is frankly and shamelessly revealed by the American Economist, the organ of the American Protective Tariff League.

Replying to the World's questions—"In what way will the election of a Republican Congress hasten the winning of the war? In what way will it assure a more satisfactory peace?"—the American Economist tells the American people that they are not fighting for liberty and democracy and civilization, but for money and markets. We quote its exact language:

"In the great issue of 1918 far more is involved than the release of nations from the tyranny of Germany. True, that is the rallying ground—the reason why the allies and the boys from America are fighting so desperately.

"But back of all the shouts for liberty and freedom is the bare, cold fact that this is an economic war, a war for national supremacy and security."

Continuing, the Economist says:

"A conclusive and satisfactory peace in 1898 needed that undivided support of the American people. A conclusive and satisfactory peace in 1918 would likewise need the undivided support of the people, provided nothing but liberty and justice were involved.

"But the present war is now an economic war."

Hence President Wilson must be beaten in the fall election because he has declared in favor of "the removal of all economic barriers between nations"—meaning that there must be no special and secret trade agreements. "The proposed Democratic peace program also contemplates a 'league of nations,' and that must be blocked by "a protectionist Congress."

The American Economist may not seem important in itself, but it speaks for the American Protective Tariff League, and, unfortunately, the American Protective Tariff League is the Republican organization in all economic matters. Every Republican tariff schedule has been dictated by the protected manufacturers who constitute this league and fill the campaign chests of the Republican treasury.

Thus the Economist gives us the first authentic definition of an old-guard peace—the kind of peace for which the Republican organization is battling in the congressional elections. Individual support of the President might be all right if "nothing but liberty and justice were involved," but reactionary Republicanism is not concerned about liberty and justice. This is "an economic war," and an economic war is one which pays dividends to big business.

There are hundreds of thousands of Republican voters in the American Army. There are hundreds of thousands of Republican fathers whose sons are fighting in France. There are thousands of Republican mothers whose heroic boys have already given the last full measure of devotion.

We wonder what they think of this cold-blooded, sordid, mercenary proposition that the American Economist puts forth in pleading for a Republican protectionist Congress? We wonder what they think of the claim that their sons have not been fighting for human freedom, have not been fighting for the liberty of mankind, but have battled merely for economic gain, for dirty dollars to be stuffed into the swollen pockets of steel and wool and cotton? How many of those patriotic Republican men and women would like to stand beside the graves that dot the fields of France and be told that these dead did not die for justice and civilization, but for Schedule K?

Yet is there the slightest reason to doubt that the American Economist speaks with authority as to the policy that a reactionary Republican Congress will pursue toward peace? Is there the slightest reason to doubt that a Republican majority under the present leadership of the party means that if there is any possible way to bring it about, the blood of 6,000,000 dead soldiers is to be capitalized for the profit of protected industry?

If so, we trust that there is at least one Republican in the House or Senate who will have the courage to stand up and protest in the name of Abraham Lincoln against such a revolting prostitution of humanity's tears and blood.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in these momentous times I believe it is the privilege of every Senator to express his views and, if he may think he can correctly do so, to make known as well the views of his constituents on the vital questions of the times which are burning in the heart of every true American citizen. That I shall undertake to do on the question extensively discussed here to-day. I know my views and think I know those of my constituents. I have an Associated Press dispatch of a few days ago, clipped from a morning paper of this city. I will read it.

HELENA, MONT., October 7.

The Montana Council of Defense to-day sent a telegram to President Wilson declaring it to be the sense of the council that no negotiated peace be made with Germany, and that the only terms granted her be unconditional surrender.

The body mentioned in that dispatch, the Montana Council of Defense, is an official body, officially entrusted with the conduct of war activities in and for and on behalf of the State of Montana, and it speaks with official authority. I am in hearty accord with the sentiments set forth in the dispatch which I have just read.

I have a telegram from two organizations of my home town, Hamilton, Mont., which I read:

HAMILTON, MONT., October 9, 1918.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Washington, D. C.:

Local division of American Defense Society and Hamilton Chamber of Commerce urge you use your influence against consideration of peace terms unless enemy first lay down arms unconditionally and withdraw from all territory of allies occupied by them.

AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY,
By O. C. WAMSLEY, Chairman.
HAMILTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By J. S. MCGONAGLE, President.

I am in hearty accord with the sentiments set forth in that telegram.

There was published a few days ago in the Ravalli Republican, a weekly newspaper published in my home town, an item which I will read. It relates to a meeting which was held in the opera house in that town and which was addressed by a returned private soldier who had seen service with our armies in Europe. It is as follows:

Although not a near-orator, Private Mike O'Rourke attentively held the large audience at the Grand Theater with an account of his experiences in the front-line trenches. He was emphatic in his denunciation of the Huns, as he told of the almost unbelievable things he saw in France.

"Do you know what a Hun is? I'll tell you what he is; he is a dirty brute," said O'Rourke. Whenever he denounced the Germans the applause was almost deafening, showing that the war spirit is growing more intense at home.

I am in accord with the sentiment expressed in that article. The sentiment bluntly expressed by that humble private, who has bared his breast to the fire of our enemies and exposed his life on the battle field in defense of his country, is identical with my sentiment.

I have received a resolution of the Missoula County American Defense Society, of Missoula, Mont., which I will read:

Whereas the Austro-Hungarian Government has made a peace proposal to the United States and her allies, and the Missoula County American Defense Society is desirous of expressing its views with reference to the same: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Missoula County American Defense Society that the war be prosecuted until Germany and her allies make a complete and unconditional surrender on German soil, and that, when this is accomplished, the United States and her allies dictate the terms of peace which Germany and her allies must accept.

I am in hearty accord with the principle expressed in that resolution. I at least believe we should exact and should have an unconditional surrender by our enemies, no matter where such surrender may take place. I believe, too, we and those associated with us should name the terms of peace.

I clipped from a Montana paper the other day an item relating to an expression of sentiment by the ministers of the city of Butte, in the State of Montana. It is as follows:

BUTTE, October 7.

The Butte Ministerial Association, comprising all Protestant churches in the city, to-day wired President Wilson urging against peace at this time. Rev. Guy Talbot, of Los Angeles, addressed the meeting on the moral aims of the war.

The association took the position that peace now would not accomplish morally what the complete defeat of Germany would accomplish.

I agree with the sentiment expressed in all the articles and communications which I have read. They are in thorough accord with my sentiments. I do not want anyone in my home town or in my State or anywhere else to have any doubt about my sentiments or my attitude on the question which has engrossed the attention of the Senate to-day. Neither do I want any doubt to exist about the sentiment of the people of my State; about the attitude of Montana in regard to the question which has been under discussion in the Senate, to-day.

The people of Montana have "gone over the top" in all war activities. They have gone beyond the limit in subscriptions to liberty-loan bonds, war savings stamps, the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Young Men's Hebrew Association, the Knights of Columbus, and all manner of war activities; and, also, as well in enlisted men in our Army and Navy. They have passed the limit in everything pertaining to the prosecution of the war. In war matters I think I can safely speak for the sentiment of the people of Montana. I believe I know their sentiment on this subject and I believe it my duty to express it as I understand it.

I believe the people of the State of Montana are absolutely and unqualifiedly opposed to any armistice in the conduct of the war under any condition, and that they are opposed to an ending of the war under any circumstances other than by unconditional surrender of our enemies. At any rate, whether they are or not, I am absolutely and unqualifiedly opposed to any armistice with our enemies under any circumstances. I am opposed to any method of ending the war other than upon the one term of unconditional surrender by our enemies. I do not know whether or not an armistice is in contemplation. I do not know whether or not there is any probability or possibility of an armistice. That has been much discussed on the floor of the Senate to-day. I have no knowledge on the subject but, whether or not an armistice of any kind be in contemplation, I am absolutely and unqualifiedly opposed to it. If no armistice is in contemplation, if none is thought of, if there is no danger of any armistice, it does no harm for me or any other man to say he is absolutely opposed to it. If it is in contemplation, if even thought of, if there is any possibility of it, then I for one want to register here and now my opposition to an armistice under any circumstances.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. OWEN. Does not the Senator think that that is the opinion really of every Senator in this body?

Mr. MYERS. That what is the opinion of every Senator?

Mr. OWEN. Is there any dissenting voice about the opposition to an armistice? Is it not unanimous in the Senate that we should have an unconditional surrender? Is not that the sentiment?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know. I do not think every Senator who has spoken to-day has stated in plain words that he is opposed to any armistice, and that he is not in favor of ending the war except by unconditional surrender of our enemies. However, regardless of what others may think or may have said or not said, I want to make it plain that I am absolutely opposed to the thought of an armistice.

Mr. OWEN. The purpose of the Senator's declaration is to establish that sentiment which he is expressing. I have heard no opposition to the view which the Senator is expressing as his own, and I merely wished to emphasize his view by pointing out that I had heard of no Senator reaching a contrary view. I think it is practically the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I hope there is no Senator who would favor an armistice under any circumstances. I am opposed to any proposition of an armistice. My attitude in regard to the termination of the war comprises but one term. My attitude as to the term or terms upon which hostilities should cease is not expressed in the plural number. My proposal for the termination of hostilities comprises only one requirement, one condition, and that is unconditional surrender. I favor the unconditional surrender of our enemies and say: Let the terms of settlement be dictated by the United States and the entente allies after the surrender, and let them be made such as the United States and the entente allies may see fit to impose. I am for peace by dictation and not by negotiation. That expresses my attitude in regard to the prosecution of the war and its termination.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Do not the words of the President, in which he says in substance, "I can not present to the allies any suggestion of an armistice while your armies are upon their soil," indicate that he would present the question of an armistice when the German armies were not upon their soil, even though those armies had not been disbanded? That seems to be the fear that is in the hearts of a great many of our people.

Mr. MYERS. I do not know whether they indicate or do not indicate that the President would suggest an armistice to the entente allies if the allied territory be evacuated by the troops of our enemies. They do not necessarily imply that he would. That is not a necessary inference. I do not know whether he has such a thought in his mind or not. I can not state. I can only speak for myself. I can only say what I have in mind. I am opposed to any thought of any armistice, on or off of allied territory, on allied territory, or on German territory or on any other territory. I am opposed to any thought of any armistice anywhere.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator exactly expresses the feeling of the American people.

Mr. MYERS. I feel complimented to hear the Senator say so. Frankly, I believe, myself, I do. I voted for our declaration of war. I voted for the entrance of this country into the European War. I have voted for every measure for a vigorous prosecution of the war. I have voted for every measure to raise men or money for the prosecution of the war. I intend to continue to favor and support a vigorous prosecution of the war by every means in my power until there be an unconditional surrender of our enemies. That comprises my idea of the proper ending of this war, and I have no thought of anything else being a proper ending.

My belief is that we should have an unconditional surrender or that our enemies should submit to annihilation of their armed forces. If unwilling to surrender unconditionally, annihilation of their armed forces would not be unjust. They should expect nothing else. They deserve nothing else. The Germans not only annihilated but exterminated the lives of about 200 innocent men, women, and children, American citizens, when they sank the Lusitania, and the Germans celebrated that infamous act by wine and song and speechmaking and drunken orgies. They gloated over it and boasted of it. If they were now compelled to face unconditional surrender or annihilation of their armed forces, it would be nothing but just punishment and retribution.

Unless they are willing to surrender unconditionally, I favor a termination of the war such as Gen. Jackson put to the Seminole rebellion. When the Seminole Indians refused to surrender unconditionally he burned their towns and villages and camps and pursued them into the swamps and surrounded them and practically annihilated them. A mere handful of a remnant survived. The Seminole Indians were cultured gentlemen and Christian philosophers beside the Germans and the punishment the Seminole Indians had administered to them by Gen. Jackson would be, in my opinion, a hundredfold more fitting to the German armies.

The audacity of our enemies adds to their culpability and criminality and the fate they richly deserve. In my opinion, every proposition that any of our enemies has made for the consideration of peace or of an armistice has been characterized by falsehood, trickery, and deception. A short time ago, a member of the parliamentary body of Austria made a speech in connection with a resolution upon the subject of peace terms, and he started his remarks by saying "whereas it is well known that Austria from the beginning of the war has been fighting only a defensive warfare," and with that false premise he went on with his lying remarks. That is a sample of every move that has been made by our enemies to secure peace or an armistice. The audacity of such a statement is amazing to my mind.

We all know that Austria, under the instigation of Germany, plunged the world into this maelstrom of blood and destruction by declaring war on an humble and weak nation adjoining, Serbia, for the killing of an Austrian prince, and that after Serbia had made every effort to placate the Austrian Government and to make reparation for the act of a lunatic. That is the sentiment of audacity and brazen effrontery that has characterized every move that our enemies have made since they have tired of fighting and feel that it is better to seek cover. Their hearts are false, their motives are false, their words are false, I put no faith in them.

Even the propaganda that was conducted in this country before our entry into the war, by von Bernstorff, von Rentelen, von Papen, Dernburg and all the other nefarious agents of the German Government, for the purpose of poisoning the minds of our people, was characterized by falsehood, deception, trickery, and audacity, and they are continuing their tactics in an effort to seek cover from a just punishment for their infamous crimes and outrages.

Speaking of brazen audacity, I read in the newspapers that there is a good deal of talk in Germany, Austria, and Turkey about seeking an honorable peace with their opponents. Those countries would be incapable of making an honorable peace because there is no honor in them. You might as well talk about a man without learning making a learned argument. Germany has no honor, and is incapable of making an honorable peace. In the last few days there has been talk in the German Reichstag about a peace without humiliation for the fatherland. It is, to my mind, the height of audacity, after the wholesale destruction and the unspeakable infamies Germany has heaped on the people of the world for her statesmen to talk about a peace without humiliation to the fatherland. It shows the spirit with which they are approaching negotiations for peace.

I am opposed to having any negotiations at all with the Germans. The only negotiations I would have with them are the negotiations of shot and shell, grape and canister. I think that the most fitting response to their overtures for peace would be slaughtering more Huns and piling up the bodies of dead Germans on the battle field. The audacity of our enemies makes my feelings strong for unconditional surrender. I have read something in the newspapers about a peace which would be "tantamount" to unconditional surrender. I do not want anything "tantamount" to unconditional surrender. I do not want the tantamount part of it at all. Nothing but unconditional surrender, in my opinion, would be just. Germany willfully, deliberately, maliciously, cruelly brought on this war for criminal purposes of the vilest kind, after 40 years of preparation, without discussing terms with her victims. Armed to the teeth, she leaped upon an innocent, unsuspecting, unprepared world without consultation about terms. Let her end it without consultation about terms, I say.

I believe the people of the United States will be keenly disappointed and greatly chagrined if the war ends in any other way than by unconditional surrender; at least, I believe a tremendous majority of the loyal people of this country would so feel if this war should end in any other way. Of course, the I. W. W.'s, the anarchists, the American Bolshiviki, want peace right away. I suppose they all want an armistice. I have no doubt that Eugene V. Debbs wants an armistice, that Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman want an armistice, that the 100 I. W. W.'s who were sent to the penitentiary about a month ago by a Federal court in Chicago want an armistice right away; but what they want I am opposed to. Whatever they may favor I think it wise for loyal people to oppose.

There has been a good deal of talk about whether or not Germany is sincere in seeking an armistice. A great many people express the opinion that she is not sincere. I think Germany is absolutely sincere in seeking to escape just punishment for her crimes and infamies. I think Prince Maximilian is absolutely sincere in seeking not only an armistice but peace right away, a cessation of hostilities either temporary or permanent. I think Germany is appealing to this country to save her from the just punishment which she knows to be due her. I think Prince Maximilian is absolutely sincere. I think that his motive in turning to us in despair is to try to save the German people from the just punishment that they richly merit. I think his motive the same no matter whom he may represent. I do not care whom Prince Maximilian represents. It does not make any difference to me whether he represents the war lords of Germany or the people of Germany. I do not differentiate between the war lords of Germany and the people of Germany. They are all of one and the same kind. They all belong to the same bloodthirsty race of people who are dominated by worship of force, lust for conquest, and thirst for world dominion. There never was a government in the world that had its entire populace more solidly back of it than the Government of Germany when it entered this war.

In my judgment, the people of Germany were just as eager for a war of conquest as was the German Kaiser. They wanted a war of conquest, spoliation, brutality. It is their way. I do not believe there has been a French or a Belgian woman who has had her breasts cut out by a German brute; I do not believe there has been a young woman outraged by a German soldier in France or in Belgium, in the presence of her helpless father, tied hand and foot; I do not believe there has been a mother outraged in France or Belgium, in the presence of her helpless husband, tied hand and foot; I do not believe there has been a well poisoned in France or Belgium, an orchard destroyed, a church or cathedral destroyed, an art gallery ruined; I do not believed there has been a city or town bombed or burned, a home demolished, a house wrecked; I do not believe there has been an infant disemboweled in its mother's arms; I do not believe an infant has been seized from its mother's arms and its brains dashed out on the floor in her presence; I do not believe there has been a priest carried off into captivity; I do not believe there has been a woman carried off into worse than slavery by those scoundrels but what it has the approval of the German people. At least, I have heard of no disapproval by them or any of them. Those things were not done by the German Kaiser. I suppose it will be admitted that they were done by people. They were certainly not done by cattle, horses, sheep, or mules. They were perpetrated by people. Were they perpetrated by Italian people, Scotch people, or Greek people? No; they were perpetrated by Germans. The German soldier is a part of the German people. Therefore, I say I do not care whom Prince Maximilian may represent. It is the same to me whether he represents the German Imperial Government or a new Government—the present Government, as he calls it—or the people of Germany. I am opposed, absolutely opposed, to any armistice with the Germans under any circumstances.

In my opinion, if an armistice were instituted it is very doubtful if fighting would ever be resumed.

If an armistice were had at which there was a peace conference, a series of negotiations about the ending of the war, I doubt exceedingly if the fighting would ever be resumed. War is like a great body in motion. It moves largely of its own momentum. It takes a great fervor, a spirit of enthusiasm, a hearty sentiment of the people to keep a war going, and if we had an armistice for several weeks or months I believe the war fervor of the people on both sides would cool and there would be a decrease of the war spirit, the will to win or die, and in that event, I would fear very much that we would have a peace by bargain, parley, negotiation; a compromise peace; a peace in which our enemies would have a voice. To that I am opposed. Whether we shall have negotiations over a peace table for peace or not; whether we shall settle terms through an armistice or after unconditional surrender, I am absolutely opposed to permitting the representatives of Germany, Austro-Hungary, or Turkey to sit at a conference table. I believe when it comes to considering the terms of peace Germany, Austria, and Turkey should be bound hand and foot, bucked and gagged, and left outside the conference room, and only representatives of the United States and the entente allies should be permitted to sit at the table; that they should decide what the terms of peace are to be, and after they decide they should go outside and tell the Germans, Austrians, and Turks what their fate is to be, what the terms of peace are to be.

What those terms ought to be I am not wholly prepared to say. It is not my place to say. It may be that as a part of those terms the German Kaiser should be executed or imprisoned or exiled for life. It may be that as a part of them the German Empire should be dismembered and partitioned. It may be that the German Government ought to be required to pay many billions of dollars for the damage, ruin, spoliation, and infamy that the Germans have inflicted on France and Belgium. It may be that they should be compelled to restore Alsace and Lorraine to France. I think they should. It may be that they should be required to pay back with interest the $1,000,000,000 which they extorted by robbery from France nearly 50 years ago. It may be that they should, and I think they should, be required to pay to the United States damages for every merchant ship belonging to the United States which they have sunk with its cargo and crew and passengers.

It may be that they should be required to pay indemnity for the loss of every American life that went out of existence when the Lusitania was sunk. I am convinced of that. I am not prepared now to say that all those terms should be imposed upon the Germans, but I do think some of them should be imposed. I feel quite sure that they should be compelled to give Alsace-Lorraine back to France and that they should be required to pay many billions of dollars of indemnity to France and Belgium for the ruin and spoliation and infamy that they have inflicted upon those countries. I believe that Germany should be required adequately to reimburse the United States for the lives of our citizens which were destroyed on the high seas while they were traveling on peaceful merchant ships, such as the Lusitania, unarmed and not carrying munitions of war. I am sure that some of those terms should be imposed; but whatever terms may be imposed I am absolutely opposed to letting the Germans, Austrians, Hungarians, or Turks have anything whatever to say about it. If we should allow representatives of those Governments at the peace table, to my mind it would be a good deal like allowing a hardened criminal, a murderer or a burglar, to go into the jury room with the jury and deliberate with the jury, as a part of the jury, as to what his fate should be. If a man should outrage the women of a family, burn the house, wound the head of the house, steal everything he could carry away, and destroy all else, I would as leave think he should with his blood-red hands sit down to dinner and talk it over with the wounded husband and father as to whether he should have an honorable peace and a settlement without humiliation to him or not as to think of admitting Germans, Austrians, and Turks to participate in a peace conference with representatives of this country and of the entente allies.

My opinion is that the way to avoid such a travesty on justice is to insist on unconditional surrender, the United States and the allies to fix the terms of peace, and let our enemies know what they are after they have been fixed.

I clipped from the Washington Morning Post the other day an excerpt from an editorial. I will read it. It says:

Let us consider how the average German individual is compelled to act in the terrible situation that surrounds him. He has given his all for four years and is now an emaciated, poverty-stricken, prematurely aged person, mourning the loss of the male members of his family. He has been fed full of promises which have proved to be false from the beginning. He can not now depend upon the word of any human being, from the Kaiser down to his nearest neigabor. The world seems to him to be full of liars and enemies. He obtains the truth only by adopting the opposite of anything that is told him by his Government. He ascertains that the allies are making sure progress toward German soil, their power constantly and rapidly growing, and their purpose inflexibly fixed upon the annihilation of the empire unless it surrenders.

This German from the depths of his soul cries for peace. Give us peace! That is the cry that goes up from all Germany to the Emperor. "Give us peace!"

If that is the condition of the German people they have wantonly brought it upon themselves, and if they want peace let them demand of their rulers an unconditional surrender, just as Gen. Lee surrendered to Gen. Grant, just as Lord Cornwallis surrendered to George Washington. There is nothing unfair about that. Cornwallis did not ask for any terms of peace when he made his surrender; Gen. Lee did not ask for any terms of peace when he made his surrender; and surely the men who fought for the Confederacy were entitled to more consideration than are the people who are fighting us; yes, a thousand times more. The Confederates fought for a principle. They fought over a question about which there was wide room for different opinions, the question of the right of secession. There was nothing in the Federal Constitution on the subject, nothing saying that a State could or could not secede; it was an open question; there were equally honest views on each side; and the Confederates fought for their honest view of that question. It is well, of course, that it was settled forever, and as it was settled, by the arbitrament of the sword; but it was an honorable fight; yet Gen. Lee's veterans surrendered without any armistice, without any terms, except unconditional surrender; and I say let our enemies do the same. If an honorable foe can do that, an infamous one should be made to do so.

Only Saturday last, I received news of the death on the battle field in France of John McConnell, a manly young man of my home town. I knew him when he was a mere boy. I saw him last spring when he reported here in the uniform of his country, and was on his way to France to fight under the flag of his country and to die for our rights. His parents are respected citizens of my home town. There have been other young men of my county who have given their lives to our cause; two of them went down on the ill-fated Tuscania, sunk by a German submarine. There have been others from my county who have given their lives in this war, as there have been from other parts of the country. Young men from all sections have died for us and for liberty and right in this cruel war. Of course, they were just as dear to their parents as were the young men of my community dear to their parents. When I think of these young lives being sacrificed in this awful maelstrom of destruction which the greatest band of criminals which the world has ever known has plunged upon the defenseless and unsuspecting people of the world, I think that the criminals ought be made to pay well for it, and that unconditional surrender is the only just condition of ending the war. I would have seared into the heart of every German soldier the words "unconditional surrender." I would have every German who has perpetrated an infamy and outrage against men, women, children, and decency in France or Belgium constantly haunted by the specter "unconditional surrender." I would have that before them until they knew that that was the only possible ending of this war. Then, if they should not want to end it in that way, let them prepare to fight until the last man in their ranks should perish. I wish that everyone here and everyone in our country might always remember the insolent words of the German Kaiser when the United States protested against the sinking of the Lusitania. He used words somewhat to this effect in regard to one of our protests:

The United States Government must not go too far in this matter; it must not undertake to humiliate the fatherland.

When I think of those insolent words, I think there is nothing befitting them except unconditional surrender by the infamous scoundrel who uttered them. I recall the statement made to Ambassador Gerard on one occasion by the German Kaiser, when, in effect, he said to him, so Mr. Gerard says:

If the United States does not watch out, after this war is over, she shall hear from Germany, and have something to settle with Germany.

I believe now is the time for the United States to settle whatever she may have to settle with Germany; and I believe the settlement should be nothing less than unconditional surrender by Germany. Let it all be settled now. Leave nothing to the hereafter.

I wish that everybody in this country would read Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis's book on German Atrocities. I have not read it in full, but I have read some choice excerpts from it, and when I read those excerpts and think of those scoundrels over there, now whining and begging for peace like whipped curs, and looking to us for a possible escape from just punishment for the infamies which they have heaped upon the world, upon humanity, and upon decency, it seems to me there is only one fit reply to all of their appeals, and that is "unconditional surrender."

My prediction is that if there be any ending of the war except by unconditional surrender and fitting terms imposed upon the German people, in a very short time after the ending of the war they will be boasting and bragging about the diplomatic victory which they obtained over the entente allies and the United States; that the German Government will be telling its people that not an iota of fighting took place on German soil; that not a particle of blood was shed on German soil; that not a German structure was destroyed by fire or shot or shell; that "we kept them at bay; we kept them off our territory, and finally we made them give in and come to terms before they could get into our territory or exact any reparation for the damage we had done to them." I believe that after such an end of hostilities, that after any termination other than by unconditional surrender, the German Government and the German people, too—yes, the people—would begin immediate preparation for the next war, which would be fought before many years. They would proclaim a victory; and the rulers would tell their people that they would achieve a greater victory in the next war. I want this war ended so there never can be another such. I want it so ended that there will not be another war for centuries to come. I abhor war, but I want to see this one, awful as it is, fought to such a close that Germany, the bandit of the world, at any rate will want no more war for all time.

My idea is that the only way to prevent another monstrous outrage, such as Germany has inflicted upon the world and humanity and decency, is absolutely to crush the monster; to crush the beast of Berlin, and to render him absolutely helpless; to put the Germans under mortgage, paying indemnities and damages for the next hundred years. That is my honest and sincere feeling about the war and its prosecution to a successful end, the only kind of end that it ought to have.

I believe in using to the end "force, more force; force without stint or limit."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I rise primarily for the purpose of asking unanimous consent of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD an editorial written by Mr. George Morris, in the Memphis News-Scimitar of October 10, 1918, on the subject of "Do not be blinded to German outrages by the cry of 'kamerad.'"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The article referred to is as follows:

DO NOT BE BLINDED TO GERMAN OUTRAGES BY THE CRY OF "KAMERAD."

"The excesses committed by the Hun during the intoxication of success find a parallel in his vandalism that comes of a blinding rage induced by reverses and disaster.

"There can be no excuse for the wholesale destruction he is leaving in the wake of retreating footsteps.

"Somehow the German mind has never anticipated the day of retribution that must eventually overtake him, unless the law of compensation shall cease to function.

"He has relied upon the very simple performance of throwing down his gun, throwing up his hands and crying "kamerad" as a refuge from the wrath of an outraged civilization.

"He lays great stress upon the mercy of those to whom he was merciless in the days when they were defenseless.

"The day is coming shortly when the words of a German must be measured by German deeds, and his protestations must be weighed alongside his conduct.

"The German is going to exert himself to the utmost before he is willing to accept the decree of peace which the allies will impose. That means that the campaign of 1919 will mark the titanic struggle, and the decisive phase if not the end of the war.

"There are many issues that can be settled around the council table after the guns are silenced. But there are issues that guns and bayonets alone can settle.

"The diplomats will determine the distribution of territory and the rights of colonies to decree their future national affiliation. They will figure with pencil and paper the intrinsic value of property destroyed, cities that have been razed, and lands that have been laid in waste.

"But there are issues that the soldiers of the allied armies alone can determine, and scores that they alone can settle. These are the things that are giving concern to the German people, and they are the things that the Kaiser and the militarists care least about.

"The Kaiser and his chancellor are going to want to discuss the things that are of little moment to the German soldier."

"The German is the author and the sole exponent of frightfulness upon land and sea. He began it to win the war when he was advancing over prostrate people, and he found it so congenial to his nature that he does not withhold the torch and the bomb when there is no demand from military necessity and no strategy to be served.

"The places that escaped the application of his torch in his advance are not spared in his retreat.

"Wherever the German boot has trod there is a path of wreck and ruin and outrage.

"There is nothing comparable to the suffering he has inflicted upon the civil population, and no torture known to the mind of a demon that he has failed to visit upon the unfortunate soldiers that have fallen into his hands.

"The German people have encouraged the soldier for his excesses, and applauded him for his crimes. He has been stimulated in his outrages by the ringing approval of his people.

"The unfortunate women of Belgium tell pitiful tales of their humiliation, and thousands of witnesses, through a merciful Providence, were spared by death from a living hell.

"It was the same in France, Serbia, Russia, Poland, Roumania, and the submarine warfare added a climax to the lust for useless destruction of human life.

"The execution of Edith Cavell, the English nurse, the execution of Capt. Fryatt, who was said to have destroyed a submarine, and the sinking of the Lusitania are not proper subjects for diplomatic determination.

"The air raids upon London and Paris, with the wholesale killing of women and children, defenseless and unoffending, is one of the darkest blots upon the pages of German history. How the Germans must have reveled in the news that during a raid on Palm Sunday his bomb went straight to the mark and claimed as its victims the women and children who knelt at the altar in prayer.

"These are incidents that are bright in the minds of those who have sworn to avenge them. There is no likelihood that they will be forgotten when the German begins to whimper like a whipped cur.

"Cowardice will gain contempt, but not sympathy. When a dog runs amuck and bites women and children people do not accept the excuse that it had a right to act differently during dog days, but they cut off its head and send it to a chemist to find out what was the matter with the dog.

"It is no defense for a burglar to say that he would not have committed murder except for the necessity to get away with the loot. He forfeited the right to the plea of self-defense. He had no right on another man's premises, and he had no right to have another man's goods in his possession.

"There is a debt that Germany owes to civilization. It is a debt conceived in blood, and it must be paid in blood. For more than four years the German has lived by the sword, and it is an ancient law that he that lives by the sword must die by the sword.

"Germany has inflicted too much suffering upon humanity, too much sorrow, and too many heartaches to be permitted to escape the penalty by exclaiming 'kamarad.'"

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this editorial expresses the views that I have upon the present situation and I indorse it absolutely. I am absolutely opposed to any kind of an armistice with Germany, and I am opposed to the ending of this war except upon conditions of absolute surrender by Germany and Austria to the allied armies. Mr. President, I wish to say also that I do not think that the criticism which has been visited upon the President of the United States and upon the note he wrote to Germany a few days ago is either just or fair. Senators will remember that when we went into this war it was practically lost to the allies. It was the entrance of the United States into the war that turned the tide and made victory possible to the allied arms. If the United States had not gone into the war at the critical time in April, 1917, there might have been a very unhappy ending to this war for all the nations that are now allied together against Germany. Under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson war was declared by the United States and has been prosecuted step by step, approved not only by the people of the United States but by the liberty-loving peoples of all the world. Every step that the President has taken in this war has been approved by both sides of this Chamber and by all political parties. If the President has made any mistakes in conducting this war, where is the man who has said so or will say so? Inferentially it is argued that he made a mistake in writing this last note to Germany. Is there a Senator here who will say that he has made such a mistake? Indirectly they will suggest that; but is there one here who will say it? The President has made no answer as yet; he has merely asked the German Government and the German people a question or two that, to my mind, have brought about great good.

Certainly we now know that the same military classes in Germany that have been conducting the war all the time for Germany are still conducting it. There can not be any doubt about that. It is also made absolutely certain by this note that the Hohenzollerns are still in control of Germany. Then we have the admission by this last declaration from Germany, the absolute admission, that she is willing to give up all of the stolen territory and all of the stolen advantages and loot that she has obtained up to this date out of the war; that she is willing to give them all back, thereby admitting that she is an outlaw and a robber.

With that kind of admission in the hands of the President, he is now at liberty to answer the German request for an armistice, or for his good offices in securing an armistice. Unless I am greatly mistaken, when that answer comes—and may be it will come within the hour—when it comes it will be 100 per cent American. It will be American in its every detail and will reflect the undoubted sentiments of the American people to-day for a continuation of the war and no armistice. There will be no mistaking its language and no mistaking its effect. It will be in line with what he has done in every step in this war, making it a success from start to finish.

He has been the great leader not only in this country but of the allied countries of the world fighting Germany. He is the one great central figure of this war. Surely it does not seem to me that with this record of efficiency; this record of wise leadership; this record of undiluted, red-blooded Americanism; this record of war organization; this record which has spelled success on every battle front; this record which has brought us in the very arms of abundant success; this record which has brought us the confidence of our allies and the admiration of the world that anyone in this Chamber or outside of it ought to criticize him directly or indirectly for any step thus far taken in dealing with the common enemy.

Mr. President, I for one have absolute confidence in him; I for one believe that when he answers the note it will demand an absolute and unconditional surrender upon the part of Germany to the allied forces, and that no armistice will be given until that absolute surrender comes.

Mr. President, there is but one possible answer for Germany. There never was a nation so deceptive as Germany. At the very moment she was asking us to intervene for an armistice, and stating to us that she would withdraw from subjugated territory—at the very moment she was sending that kind of message to us—the Kaiser was having his brother-in-law elected King of Finland, a part of the subjugated territory from which he was then promising to withdraw. Could any conduct be more perfidious? It is impossible to conceive, under circumstances like that, that there could be but one answer, and that answer will be, in the words of our President, "Force! Force to the uttermost," and a continuation of this war until there shall be a peace dictated by America and her allies.

I confidently await the note of our great President which will embody and carry out the sentiments of the American people, sentiments that are entertained by more than 99 per cent of the American people, sentiments that will guarantee that there will be no cessation of hostilities, that there will be no attempt to fix peace terms until victory, and until a victory full and complete and permanent, is secured for the allied arms. The President will never stand for anything less than such a victory by force of arms, a victory dictated by allied armies, a victory commensurate with the sacred cause for which we went into this war, a victory which will bring a just and enduring peace and make all peoples subjugated by Germany free forever, and I devoutly hope will destroy for all time the iron militarism of Germany herself.

SUBSCRIPTION TO WAR WORK.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think it is practically the unanimous sentiment of the Senate that we can rely with confidence upon the President sustaining the view of the American people and the view of the Senate itself; that he represents that view; that he stands for a peace which shall be permanent and which can only be permanent with the destruction of the military autocracies which have brought this war on.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a joint resolution authorizing the national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign. Some time ago we passed a resolution permitting the national banks to subscribe to the Red Cross. The joint resolution for which I desire consideration provides that they may subscribe to the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, the Hebrew Charities, and certain others, all of which are associated as one organization for this purpose.

There is a great demand for it. The joint resolution embraces only a few lines; it was reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency a day or two ago. It would take only a minute to dispose of it; I do not suppose that there is a single Senator who would have the slightest objection to it, and I should be happy if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] would permit it to be disposed of, because it is so late now that we can hardly hope to get any action on the other and more important bill of which he is in charge.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it will not displace the retirement bill, I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. OWEN. I ask, without displacing the unfinished business, that the joint resolution to which I have referred may be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, subject only to the consideration of the joint resolution for which consideration is asked by the Senator from Oklahoma. Without objection, the Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 179) authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign, as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That it shall be lawful for any national banking association to contribute to the united war-work campaign in the same manner and under the same conditions as they are authorized to contribute to the American National Red Cross by section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing national banks to subscribe to the American National Red Cross," approved May 22, 1918.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PEACE PROPOSALS OF CENTRAL POWERS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to have two telegrams which I received to-day placed in the RECORD as indicating the sentiment which I believe to obtain in Florida as well as elsewhere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the telegrams will be printed in the RECORD.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

TAMPA FLA., October 13, 1918.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.:

Our citizens respect the great judgment of President, but opposed to anything but unconditional surrender of Germany. Mayor wired President to-day.

LOUIS A. BIZE.

TAMPA, FLA., October 14, 1918.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Sentiment here unanimous that to permit withdrawal of German armies from conquered territory and then to talk about it afterwards would be a German victory. Nothing but unconditional surrender and dictated terms will satisfy the people of Florida or of the United States, so far as that is concerned. Trust you will stand for that.

PETER O. KNIGHT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, Mr. President, in this connection, that I have had these telegrams inserted in the RECORD, not because I feel that there is the slightest foundation now, or that there ever has been, for the apprehension which may be inferred or implied from these telegrams. I can well understand how the people of Tampa, whence they come—and they are illustrative of others coming from Florida—feel as they do about this matter, because they have been called upon not only to make numerous sacrifices in various ways, but they have suffered other losses, for some 30 of the brave boys of that city went down on the steamship of that name—the Tampa—which was assisting in convoying troop ships on the other side.

I will say, further, Mr. President, that the discussion to-day, especially from the other side of the aisle, seems to proceed along the line of assuming that the President has made propositions to Germany, and that there is danger that some of those propositions may compromise this country in some way or other. There is absolutely no foundation for that sort of assumption in anything that has been said or done. I feel this way: The roads from the battle lines to Berlin, according to last accounts, were in very good order; Ludendorff and Hindenburg and the Kaiser know the route, and about the best thing that can be done is to start to travel.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I wish to add only a very little to this discussion, which from the beginning has seemed inopportune to me. The President of the United States of America is the foremost figure in the world to-day. The war-weary world looks with hopeful eyes to the United States and to the director, the Commander in Chief of our armies, and the American people look with absolute confidence to Washington and to the President to carry on these negotiations successfully and in the interest and honor of the American people. I do not think the time has come yet when the Senate ought to express any opinion as to whether the President should do this or should not do that, but he should be left a free hand, in which event I think the matter will be settled as it ought to be settled, as justice demands that it shall be settled, and as the American people expect it to be settled.

I move that all the resolutions that have been offered here to-day be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee for such action as it may be thought wise to take there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to.

NOMINATION OF OFFICERS OF NATIONAL ARMY.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am going to ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, solely for the purpose of making a request for unanimous consent for the consideration of another bill. It is very short, and I trust Senators will listen to the reading of it. It is the bill (S. 4990) to repeal a proviso of paragraph 3, section 1, of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and further amending said act, and reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following proviso in the third paragraph of the first section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917 (Public, No. 12, 65th Cong.), namely, "And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," be, and the same is hereby, in all things repealed, and the following language, as an amendment to said section of said act, be substituted for the language repealed: "And provided further, That all commissioned officers shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

I desire to say that the bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I will say further, in explanation of it, that when the war came on in 1917 it was absolutely necessary to have a great number of officers, and they had to be appointed very quickly. It may be that a mistake may have been made in leaving it entirely to the heads of the departments, as the act referred to did leave it. Since that time there has been a splendid officers' personnel organization created in the departments, and there can be no difficulty or trouble about it. I believe that the Senate will agree with the committee that the bill is one that should be passed, and I therefore ask that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator, as the Chair understands, asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McKELLAR. That request was made, and I understood it was granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Tennessee to ask unanimous consent to take up the bill to which he has referred?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I supposed that there would be no objection to it, and I thought it might as well be disposed of. I want to go out of the city within the next day or two, and I was in hopes that there would be no objection to the bill. I trust, unless the Senator has some vital objection, that he will not interpose to prevent its consideration.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am ashamed to say that I was not present at the meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs when this bill was reported, and I am therefore compelled to ask the Senator if my understanding of it is correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very glad indeed to answer any question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand that this bill will result in laying before the Senate the nomination of every officer to be named in the United States Army from now on and the promotion of every officer?

Mr. McKELLAR. It will be just exactly the same in the National Army as it is now in the Regular Army. The Senator understands that all appointments to the Regular Army and all promotions in the Regular Army are now required to come before the Senate, but those in the National Army and the appointments of a great many officers in various departments have not had to come before the Senate because of the provision in the act of 1917. The bill for which I ask consideration merely puts them all on the same footing and requires all such nominations to come to the Senate.

I will say to the Senator that I think there is no motive in the world back of the bill except the good of the service. Certain abuses have arisen in reference to the appointment of officers, and it is believed that no harm can come by requiring the approval of the Senate, in the good old constitutional way, to the nomination of officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I would not offer an objection at this time if the bill were confined to appointments in the Staff Corps; but, as I understand, the bill will throw before the Senate the name of every boy who graduates from an officers' training school and has been judged by a board of examining officers to be fit to hold a commission in the line of the Army, in the Infantry, Field Artillery, machine-gun organizations, and perhaps one or two other branches, like the Engineers, Quartermasters, and the Tank Corps.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that that is exactly the requirement the bill makes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That will result in the carrying out of the program for expanding the Army in placing before the Committee on Military Affairs eventually an aggregate of 160,000 names, which I think is absurd upon its face.

I recognize some of the criticisms and regard them seriously that have been directed from time to time during the last 18 months toward the appointment of officers in the Staff Corps of the Army in the several branches of the service from civil life without going to officers' training schools, and I would gladly join in erecting by legislation some check upon that indiscriminate appointment of men from civil life to the Staff Corps. But I submit that it is utterly impossible for the Military Committee or the Senate as a body to pass judgment intelligently and with any advantage to the service upon the thousands and thousands of names of men graduated from officers' training schools after going through a severe course, and who have been passed upon by a board of officers at each of those training schools. I submit that it is utterly impossible for the Military Committee or the Senate to pass upon those names with any degree of intelligent discrimination or with any advantage to the service, and from time to time it will inevitably delay the appointing and commissioning of those officers. Nothing should be allowed to delay them after they once pass through the officers' training schools.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to remind the Senator that even now we have become accustomed, and I may perhaps say it is necessary, to consider and confirm military nominees en bloc, instead of going through the names carefully as they deserve, because we have not the time. I was not present at the meeting when this bill was considered, but I share the view of the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In view of the seriousnsess with which this proposal is presented, I feel constrained to object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made and the bill goes over. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It may be that an important matter will reach the Senate in a short time which I should like to introduce into the RECORD and which possibly should be read to the Senate. Meanwhile we ought to have a very brief executive session, after which we can open the doors for a legislative session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate and will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4637) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this bill was laid before the Senate as the unfinished business at 2 o'clock, and I intended to let it go over until Thursday, but it seems to me it might very properly be discussed for a few moments.

The question of the retirement of civil-service employees of the Government has been one that has been argued for about 20 years. I think the first bill was introduced about 20 years ago. Up to this time there have been two general plans. One was a plan by which the Government would pay the entire cost of the retirement of superannuated employees and the other was that the employees should pay the entire cost. There have been advocates of both plans, and the result has been that there never has been any getting together on either one of those plans.

I may say that when I became chairman of the committee I called the advocates of both plans before our committee and had them submit their several propositions. I then called on the Government first from the Bureau of Efficiency to give us the exact figures as to how much it would cost to retire superannuated employees. After many delays and after a great deal of work as to the cost of retiring superannuated employees who had reached the ages of 65 and 68 years, 65 years for railway-mail clerks, rural letter carriers, and city letter carriers, and 68 years for all other employees, at a rate of pay of $600 for those who had been in the service 30 years or more, $540 for those who had been in the service between 25 and 30 years, $480 for those who had been in the service between 20 and 25 years, and $420 for those who had been in the service more than 15 years and less than 20 years, it was found that the retirement pay would cost 5 per cent of all the salaries of the employees.

Representatives of various organizations of the employees were brought before the committee and that was explained, and they were asked if they would submit to paying one-half of the cost. After a full consideration they declined to pay one-half, but came back with a proposition that they would bear 2 per cent of it if the Government would bear the other 3 per cent. To this proposition I answered that I would not introduce a bill unless they would each agree to pay one-half.

It was then suggested by some of the experts that by reducing the age of retirement to 62 years and 65 years instead of 65 years and 68 years, with another change about casualty retirements, the cost would be reduced to 5 per cent. The Government experts went into it very fully and the figures are in the report of the committee on file. They reported that it could be done for 5 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Five per cent of what?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of all the salaries paid the employees.

Mr. POMERENE. Who was the expert?

Mr. McKELLAR. Dr. Maddrill, of the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator if Mr. Brown was before the committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Brown was before the committee, and selected Dr. Maddrill for the purpose of making the calculation. The representatives of all the associations except the post-office associations agreed and were willing to bear the one-half of 5 per cent, or 2½ per cent. I declined to introduce the bill until there was an agreement of all the associations. Later on the post-office employees came in, and by their representative said they would agree to pay one-half.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. It was at that point that this bill was introduced providing for retirement at 65 years of the rural letter carriers, the railway mail clerks, and city letter carriers and 68 years for other employees. Those figures were introduced and at the same time the rate of compensation was agreed on, and the bill was introduced which has been reported by the committee. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I notice section 11 provides that any employee may leave the service and withdraw all the money he put in and 4 per cent thereof.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator believe that the 2½ per cent provided for, the Government to pay one-half, and so forth, is going to establish finally any considerable amount toward the amount that will have to be paid in the various agencies, and that it will come anywhere near supporting the net result, one-half?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will examine the figures on pages 6 and 7 of the report he will find that the Government experts of the Bureau of Efficiency state that it will. We find another thing. We find that 2½ per cent will produce $9,000,000 a year. I will say to the Senator that this was urged against the measure—that in war time we want to expend money for a different purpose, and that is a very vital proposition.

The answer to that proposition is this, and I hope Senators will listen to it: The amount paid out during the first year to the 7,500 superannuated employees will be a little less than $2,000,000, while the amount collected the first year under this system from the employees through 2½ per cent will be $9,000,000. The second year it will be a little less than two and a half million dollars paid out and $9,000,000 collected. So it will go until finally it will equalize itself and cost the Government 2½ per cent and the employees 2½ per cent. In other words, they will have a fund there, and instead of being a cost for the Government at first it will be a very large overplus—$6,900,000. The first year there will be collected from the employees more than is paid out, but when it finally reaches the maximum it will equalize itself and cost 5 per cent of the employees' salaries.

Mr. WARREN. I wish the Senator to understand that I favor and have for many years favored some legislation along the lines proposed. I am not quite certain that the figures the Senator has just given will bear the test of experience; but passing that matter for the time, I will observe than on page 8, lines 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, the transfer of appropriations, I shall offer an amendment to strike out those lines when we come to the consideration of amendments to the bill, not that I wish to avoid in any way appropriating for it, but the idea of appropriating from the appropriated fund some indeterminate amount, whatever may be necessary for all time hereafter, is entirely against good legislation. I think instead of that we should appropriate what is necessary for the first year, and then expect to have reports and estimates made based thereon every year, as we do for the other wants of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am inclined to think that it is a most excellent suggestion the Senator has made, and if the Senator will prepare an amendment along that line I think it is most likely that I will accept it.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that it would require striking out the five lines I indicated on page 8.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator has been discussing the financial requirements of the bill for the next year or two, and I gathered from his statement that it was in his mind that it would be no financial burden upon the Government at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly; not for 10 years.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am a little unable to understand the foundation for that. If the Senator means that there will not be withdrawn from the purposes of the Government any fund during the next 10 years, it is true that a fund may be accumulated by contributions of the employees in excess of the amount required to pay the current portion of the amounts which will be incurred by the Government, but will not the amount contributed by the employees necessarily remain in the Treasury in a separate fund?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And of course not available for current expenses of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. It will be available for any governmental purpose if paid out. It will be in the Treasury. For instance, take the year 1920. The receipts in the form of Government employees' salaries will be $9,000,000; disbursements upon withdrawals prior to pension age, $400,000; pensions and guaranteed returns to pensioners, $1,732,000; and there will be an excess of $6,900,000 the first year. In other words, that much will not be paid out.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That may be perfectly true; but I will ask the Senator of what avail will that be to the Government in this time of financial need?

Mr. McKELLAR. It means that there will be paid into the General Treasury by employees the sum of $9,000,000, and there will be paid out on account of annuities to those who have gone out under the law $1,732,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But does not the Senator understand that that $9,000,000, or whatever sum it may be, will have to remain in the Treasury as a separate fund and can not be actually used by the Government?

Mr. McKELLAR. The act specifically requires that it shall be used by the Government and that the Government shall pay 4 per cent upon it. Instead of not being required to be used it is directed to be used by the very terms of the act. There can be no question about the Government using the money, and there can be no question for at least the first 10 years that the amount paid in will exceed the amount paid out.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should not understand, then, that this money is to be kept in a separate fund and kept out of use?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. It is kept in a separate fund on the books of the Treasury, and in that sense it is separate. In other words, it is a separate account of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, so far as the burden on the Treasury is concerned at this time, the Treasury would get $9,000,000 from the employees, and out of the $9,000,000 would pay 4½ per cent, or whatever rate of interest is mentioned, and the liabilities under the act.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Which the Senator estimates as probably about $2,000,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. A little less than $2,000,000 the first year. Then there will be an increase each year. The second year it will be $1,972,000, the third year $2,154,000, the fourth year $2,400,000, the fifth year $2,589,000, and the sixth year $2,778,000, and so on.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, for the present emergency the Government would really be borrowing from its employees about $9,000,000 at 4½ per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is about what it would be.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Ohio rose first. I will yield to the Senator from Colorado later.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand there will be about 7,500 of these employees retired now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. How many would become retirable under the bill during the succeeding year?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not those figures with me, but will put them in the RECORD later.

Mr. POMERENE. At any rate the number who will be retired next year will be very much smaller than the number who will be retired when the act goes into effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, not in proportion, because——

Mr. POMERENE. Then, I understand your sole saving would be from the fact that you do not pay out on the salary account to the 7,500 employees who are now receiving a salary.

Mr. McKELLAR. That brings me to another phase of this bill which I should like very much to comment on.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask another question in this connection, for I should like to hear what the Senator has to say upon the point? I confess I do not like the plan very much. I went into that pretty thoroughly some time ago. I think it should be eventually made self-sustaining. Does the Senator in his estimate classify the railway employees as Government employees?

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. POMERENE. Or the telephone and telegraph employees?

Mr. McKELLAR No; they are not in the civil service. Only civil-service employees are included.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very glad to know that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to explain to the Senate about that, and what I am going to say now is purely an estimate. It is estimated that there are 7,500 of these superannuated employees and that 4,000 are absolutely useless to the Government. Many of those old people hobble to the buildings, but are absolutely incapable of doing any work whatever. The proof before our committee showed that those are men and women who have been longest in service. They are absolutely incapable of doing any work for the Government. Ordinarily, they are getting the highest rate of pay, and virtually they are being pensioned now at the highest rate of pay. It is estimated that 4,000 of them are absolutely doing no service to the Government at all, and that probably the salary of each one would amount to about $1,500. There is $6,000,000 that are being paid out toward these 4,000 superannuated employees for which the Government gets no return at all, and there are 3,500 left from whom the Government gets only a partial return; and that will probably make nearly as great a saving as the amount the Government will ever have to pay out. In other words, the bill not only provides for the benefit of employees but it will benefit the Government by increased efficiency and in saving the large salaries now paid to superannuated employees. I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator referred to the fact that there are some 4,000 of these employees who are doing no service for the Government at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. I suppose the Senator is aware that there are many thousands who are not superannuated who are also doing no service at all?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am afraid that is so, but I do not propose to grant them an annuity in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Not now; this is the first step.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, sir; I do not think so. I think this is a very just measure for the benefit of both the Government and the employees, and I do not think it will mean that.

Mr. THOMAS. I will make the prediction that before the act is five years old we will be granting special pensions under it, just as we are granting special pensions now to soldiers.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that the United States and Turkey are the only civilized nations in the world, if you can call Turkey a civilized nation——

Mr. ASHURST. We will not do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arizona says we will not do that. I say the United States and Turkey are the only civilized nations in the world that do not have retirement pay for superannuated employees.

Mr. THOMAS. I presume parallels could be drawn between the United States and some other nations with regard to the absence of some other legislation, but my purpose in rising was rather to make an inquiry regarding section 11, which provides that if an employee becomes separated from the service before he becomes superannuated he will receive back from this fund all that he paid in with 4 per cent compounded.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS. I take it, therefore, that if the employee begins now to make his payments and continues them for 24 years—I believe 25 years is the minimum for a pension——

Mr. McKELLAR. Fifteen years.

Mr. THOMAS. Fifteen years—well, for 14 years, or in the other case for 24 years, he will get, as a return from his advances, interest compounded during that whole period, which will be paid by the United States Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Two and one-half per cent that he pays in annually.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator think that he should receive that with compound interest?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am rather inclined to think that he should.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe that the measure that has been worked out here is a fair one. I will say that it is in exact line with the bill that was formerly introduced by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], which was prepared largely by Dr. Beach, one of the most expert accountants and one of the best informed men concerning this legislation that it has ever been my good fortune to know. He is employed in one of the departments here and is really a gifted man. This bill is not my work, except in pointing out its details; it is the same bill that has been prepared and introduced time and time again by others, with the exception that the half-and-half plan was put into it by me or forced into it by me. The employees very stoutly opposed it almost from the beginning, and they only agreed to it when they were informed that nothing more than a half-and-half plan would be introduced and fathered by me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in reply to what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has said, it seems to me that a sufficient answer is to say that if a man who is within the retirement age when he serves 15 years, retires when he has served 14 years, he will by that time have paid about 35 per cent, and if he receives that 35 per cent back, it is as against 100 per cent which he would receive if he remained in the service one more year.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true, and I thank the Senator for the interruption. It does seem to me that the bill is fair and just and equitable. I shall be glad to answer any question that any Senator may wish to ask about it, so far as I am able.

I will say about this kind of legislation, that a pension system is now in existence in nearly every up-to-date corporation in this country, but probably none of them have a half-and-half system or a share-and-share system. Nearly every one of the great railroads in the country—the Pennsylvania, the New York Central, the Southern, and various other railroads of the country—have retirement systems for their superannuated employees. Nearly all of the other great corporations of the country have also retirement provisions by which the corporations themselves pay the retirement annuities. Massachusetts, I believe, is the only State that has adopted this system. Massachusetts has such a system, and many of the cities of the country have adopted similar systems. They all work well, and they have all been found to be fair and just.

As I have heretofore stated, the United States is the only Nation, with the exception of Turkey, that has not yet adopted some kind of a retirement system. Great Britain adopted such a system away back before the reign of Queen Victoria in the early part of the nineteenth century.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps it has been answered; I may have been out at the time; but, though it may have been answered, I merely wish to inquire about what would be the direct cost to the Government, not the indirect cost and without regard to the benefits accruing by reason of increased efficiency, and all that sort of thing, but the actual outlay to the Government?

Mr. McKELLAR. In the present status it would amount to about $9,000,000 a year, so far as it can be estimated, and it would amount to about that much brought in from the employees.

I wish now to call attention to another thing. Both political parties have adopted the enactment of this legislation in their platforms.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean by that to say that they have adopted this particular plan?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; but they have adopted planks in favor of retirement legislation.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I read from the Republican platform of 1912, as follows:

> We favor legislation to make possible the equitable retirement of disabled and superannuated members of the civil service in order that a higher standard of efficiency may be maintained.

The Democratic platform adopted at St. Louis in 1916 contained a provision on this subject, as follows:

> An equitable retirement law providing for the retirement of superannuated and disabled employees of the civil service, to the end that a higher standard of efficiency may be maintained.

Those are the two provisions in the platforms of the two great political parties. It seems to me that this is an equitable, fair, and just system, and I can not imagine one that could be any more equitable. It is a half-and-half proposition, and it is safeguarded by careful preparation by Government experts. It is certainly fair to the Government, because we had a Government expert to furnish us all the figures; and it is reasonably fair to the employees, because all the employees' associations are committed to it and are in favor of it.

I will say that Mr. KEATING and I called on the President and asked him about it. He did not commit himself absolutely to this bill, but said he would give it consideration; that he was in favor of a just and fair and equitable retirement measure. The only objection that he raised to it was that it might constitute a burden on the Treasury during the war; but when assured that it will not constitute a burden on the Treasury during the war, as the figures show conclusively, then I am sure that the President's only objection to it has been met.

Mr. President, I think that is about all I care to say in regard to the measure, and unless some Senator is dissatisfied with it, I do not see any reason why we can not pass the measure at this time, if the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] were here, but he said that he had to go out of the Chamber and did not know whether he would be back in time or not, so I am afraid I am committed to postponement until he returns.

Mr. WARREN. The bill has not yet been read, and I assume the Senator desires to have it read.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the various civil-service associations to which he has referred have finally and definitely assented to this plan of raising by assessment one-half of the necessary funds?

Mr. McKELLAR. Every one of them has done so; and there is a provision in the bill directing all of the departments to deduct the 2½ per cent from the salaries of the clerks. It is in the bill and becomes a part of the law from the passage of the bill, that the deduction shall be made from the salaries. I do not know what the purpose of the Senate is. If it is to continue in session I should be glad to have the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If there be no amendment the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I certainly hope this bill is not going to be pressed through at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say that I have stated to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the bill would not be voted on this afternoon; and I, of course, do not care to have the bill pressed to its final passage; but I understand there is a communication now about to be read to the Senate, and I will——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator proceeds along that line, I want to say, in connection with the pending matter, that I wish he would not press it except when there is a comparatively full Senate, for I should myself like to be heard a little bit upon the lines of not establishing a civil pension list for Government employees until the Government is ready to establish a general superannuation pension for school-teachers and misled preachers and carpenters and blacksmiths and other people, who receive a great deal less pay, and deserve a great deal more credit, than do Federal employees. So I hope the matter will not be pressed at any time when I am out of the Chamber, for I have a few innocuous observations to submit on it, as John Allen used to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce the parliamentary status of the bill. The bill is in the Senate and is still open to amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he is going to proceed, for, if so, I should like to offer an amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether, at this stage of the proceedings, he would not be willing to have the bill temporarily laid aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will not be necessary to lay the bill aside. The Senator can take the floor in his own right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the bill laid aside, so that we may have an adjournment immediately afterwards.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I will yield with the understanding that the bill will not be displaced by any other business and will be restored as soon as this matter is disposed of.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to have the motion of record, that I offer to amend the bill by striking out, on page 8, lines 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, and the word "act," on the next line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wyoming is pending. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANSWER TO GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senate, when it adjourns to-day is to adjourn until Thursday next, it has seemed to a number of Senators appropriate that the answer which the President of the United States has directed the Secretary of State to send to the German Government, and which has just reached the Senate, be read to the Senate, and in that way enter the RECORD. With the consent of the Senate I will now read the answer which has been dispatched to Germany through neutral sources to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized to read the President's reply.

Mr. HITCHCOCK read as follows:

"The unqualified acceptance by the present German Government and by a large majority of the German Reichstag of the terms laid down by the President of the United States of America in his address to the Congress of the United States on the 8th of January, 1918, and in his subsequent addresses justifies the President in making a frank and direct statement of his decision with regard to the communications of the German Government of the 8th and 12th of October, 1918.

"It must be clearly understood that the process of evacuation and the conditions of an armistice are matters which must be left to the judgment and advice of the military advisers of the Government of the United States and the allied Governments, and the President feels it is his duty to say that no arrangements can be accepted by the Government of the United States which does not provide absolutely satisfactory safeguards and guaranties of the maintenance of the present military supremacy of the armies of the United States and of the allies in the field. He feels confident that he can safely assume that this will also be the judgment and decision of the allied Governments.

"The President feels that it is also his duty to add that neither the Government of the United States nor, he is quite sure, the governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent will consent to consider an armistice so long as the armed forces of Germany continue the illegal and inhumane practices which they still persist in. At the very time that the German Government approaches the Government of the United States with proposals of peace its submarines are engaged in sinking passenger ships at sea, and not the ships alone, but the very boats in which their passengers and crews seek to make their way to safety; and in their present enforced withdrawal from Flanders and France the German armies are pursuing a course of wanton destruction which has always been regarded as in direct violation of the rules and practices of civilized warfare. Cities and villages, if not destroyed, are being stripped of all they contain not only, but often of their very inhabitants. The nations associated against Germany can not be expected to agree to a cessation of arms while acts of inhumanity, spoliation, and desolation are being continued, which they justly look upon with horror and with burning hearts.

"It is necessary also, in order that there may be no possibility of misunderstanding, that the President should very solemnly call the attention of the Government of Germany to the language and plain intent of one of the terms of peace which the German Government has now accepted. It is contained in the address of the President delivered at Mount Vernon on the 4th of July last. It is as follows:

"'The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world or, if it can not presently be destroyed, at least its reduction to virtual impotency.'

"The power which has hitherto controlled the German nation is of the sort here described. It is within the choice of the German people to alter it. The President's words just quoted naturally constitute a condition precedent to peace if peace is to come by the action of the German people themselves. The President feels bound to say that the whole process of peace will, in his judgment, depend upon the definiteness and the satisfactory character of the guaranties which can be given in this fundamental manner. It is indispensable that the Governments associated against Germany should know beyond a peradventure with whom they are dealing.

"The President will make a separate reply to the Royal and Imperial Government of Austria-Hungary.

"LANSING."

[Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, October 17, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 14, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, above all, through all, in all, our life, our strength, our faith, our hope, our inspiration, a potent factor therefore in the affairs of men, come now, we beseech Thee, with all Thy holy influence to guide us in this most critical period of the world's history.

The crash of elements, pestilence, war and destruction is abroad in the world.

The air is full of the whisperings of peace, the father of our most sincere desires; but peace can never come until the enemies of humanity shall be brought to unconditional surrender. Then negotiations may be taken up by the entente powers and a peace secured which shall adjust the affairs of men to liberty, justice, truth, righteousness; to the glory and honor of Thy holy name, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the preparation for and the prosecution of the war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to address the House and also to extend my remarks in the RECORD to set forth what the Navy has accomplished and is accomplishing and what legislation has been passed by Congress in reference to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, the record made by the United States Navy in this war has not only justified the pride of the American people, but has challenged the admiration of the world. Called upon to perform tremendous tasks, some of them seeming almost impossible, in not one instance has it failed. Whenever any call has come and we asked, "When will you be ready?" as did the British admiral when the first destroyers arrived in European waters, the answer has been, "We are ready now." Ready to face any emergency, ready to cope with any problem with that supreme courage and unfailing efficiency that is the tradition of the service.

The readiness of the Navy for action when the war call came was no surprise to us who were familiar with its workings, the plans that had been made and the measures that had been taken to prepare for any eventuality. We knew that the organization was sound from keel to topmast, that the men at the helm were worthy of every trust. We knew they had been bending their energies to prepare every branch of the Navy for active service.

The broad basis of naval preparedness was laid in the epoch-making naval appropriation bill of August 29, 1916. That bill not only made the largest appropriation on record up to that time, more than $312,000,000, but it set forth the first consistent, continuing building program ever adopted by Congress, providing for the building, within three years, of no less than 157 war vessels, including every type from battle cruisers to submarines. It furthermore provided for an increase in the Navy to 87,000, whenever, in his judgment, the President should deem such increase necessary; and provided also for the creation of a great Naval Reserve Force and the mustering into the Federal service of Naval Militia in case of war or national emergency. It proved what it was designed to be—a preparedness measure of the highest importance.

Congress in that measure adopted the recommendations Secretary Daniels had made and urged in his annual report of December, 1915, which embodied the best thought and conclusion of the experts of the Navy. The department set to work at once to put its provisions into effect. Contracts were let for battleships, cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. Navy yards increased their force and began enlargements. Munition plants were set to work and stocks of shells and powder were accumulated. When the break with Germany came the machinery of the Navy was in operation, and the plans made long before were soon put into effect.

When the President directed that American merchant vessels be armed to protect them from attack by submarines, his orders were carried into effect without a day's delay. Guns were placed on the first vessel armed, the Campana, on March 12, 1917, and in a few weeks scores of ships were armed and furnished gun crews. This was a task no navy had contemplated before the war, for they believed the days of piracy, of sinking ships without warning had vanished long ago, never to return. There were not enough free guns of the proper calibers in existence to arm all vessels. Every available gun was pressed into service, some were even taken from the secondary batteries of battleships and cruisers, to be replaced later when they could be manufactured, and soon every merchantman that applied was given armed protection.

Expert gunners were required for this service and hundreds of the crack marksmen of the warships were detailed for the armed guards on merchantmen. Thousands of gunners had to be trained to take their places and to provide for the hundreds of new ships put into service. The rapid training of gunners and the record made by these armed guards are among the notable achievements of this war. When war was declared the Navy was ready for action. It was so well prepared that when the fleet was mobilized Admiral Mayo is quoted as saying, "I scarcely had to give an order."

The submarine being the immediate menace, the first duty was to combat it by every means in our power. While it was realized that the Germans might at any time send their U boats across the Atlantic to threaten commerce on our own coasts, our naval authorities did not hesitate in their decision not to wait for the submarines, but to "go after" them. A flotilla of destroyers was immediately organized and equipped for foreign service. Little more than a fortnight after war was declared the first contingent sailed, arriving at Queenstown May 4, 1917. Since that time our forces abroad have been constantly increased, until there are now in service in European waters more than 250 naval vessels, including every type, from battleships to submarine chasers, and under Vice Admiral Sims's command is a force of nearly 50,000 officers and men—as many as were in the entire Navy a few years ago.

There are now 600,000 officers and men in the naval service, including marines—more than were in all the navies in the world when the European war began. Before the break with Germany, in January, 1917, the Navy had a total of 56,000 officers and men, and the Marine Corps fewer than 12,000. In the weeks following recruiting was active, and when the President, in March, issued the order for the increase to the full authorized strength recruits poured in, so that when a state of war was declared April 6, 1917, there were 64,680 enlisted men and 4,366 officers in the regular Navy, totaling 69,046, and 13,266 enlisted men and 426 officers in the Marine Corps, totaling 13,692. Some 10,000 men had been enrolled in the Naval Reserve force, which a few months before had comprised only a few hundreds. The Naval Reserves were called into service; the Naval Militia, 10,000 officers and men, were mustered in as National Naval Volunteers; and the Coast Guard, with its 5,000, came under the operation of the Navy for the period of the war, as provided by law. This gave us a total force of approximately 100,000 upon our entrance into the war.

The growth of the Navy has been remarkably rapid, the strength of the various branches of the service now being as follows:

	Enlisted men.	Officers.	Total.
Regular Navy	218,322	9,411	227,733
Naval Reserve Force	270,424	19,619	290,043
Marine Corps	66,105	2,271	68,376
Coast Guard	6,106	665	6,771
Total officers and men	560,957	31,966	592,923

There are to-day 1,800 vessels in full commission, ten times as many as were in service two years ago, nearly six times as many as were on the naval lists. When war was imminent, ships that were in reserve were quickly manned and placed in full commission. Hundreds of merchant vessels, yachts, fishing vessels, motor boats, and other available craft were acquired and converted into the various types of auxiliary and patrol vessels required, work was rushed on ships under construction, and contracts were given for practically all the naval vessels American yards could build. The interned German vessels, whose machinery had been badly damaged by their crews in the hope of preventing their use, were repaired and within a few months all were in service, the larger vessels being converted into troop transports, officered and manned by the Navy.

Destroyers having proved the most effective type of vessel for combating the submarine, orders were given early in the war for the construction of all which the shipyards, with their then existing facilities, could build. But there was a demand for many more, and broad plans were made for the enlargement of yards and the erection of new shipbuilding and engine plants. The act of October 6, 1917, authorized the expenditure of $350,000,000 for the building of additional destroyers and the increase of facilities. Contracts were given at once, new shipways erected, and at Squantum, Mass., there was erected the largest plant in the world devoted exclusively to the building of destroyers. Little more than half a year after work was begun on this plant the keels of five destroyers were laid there in a single day. The first was launched on July 18, and will be delivered completed within a year from the time the contract was given to convert the swampy land of Squantum Point into a shipbuilding plant.

New records have been made in construction. Formerly 20 months to 2 years was the period required to complete a destroyer. Now some are being completed in half that time, and less. At the Mare Island Navy Yard the Ward was launched 17½ days after her keel was laid, and she was commissioned in 70 days. Fourteen destroyers were launched on July 4 last. We are now building more destroyers than were in any two navies when the European war began; and when we consider that a large part of the facilities for building them had to be created in the past year, the record in construction reflects great credit upon naval constructors and shipbuilders alike.

Hundreds of submarine chasers have been completed and put into service and numerous auxiliary and patrol craft built. Vessels of all types, from battleships to submarines, have been completed and put into commission. Hundreds of others of every type are under construction or contract, and our building program is the largest ever undertaken by any navy. The naval appropriation act passed last June directed the completion at the earliest time practicable of all the vessels authorized in the three-year building program embodied in the act of August 29, 1916, and the Secretary of the Navy has assured us that these will be built "as soon as is humanly possible."

The provision of engines and machinery for the enormous number of new vessels has been a tremendous undertaking. Especially has this been the case in providing engines for the new destroyers, which have a speed of 35 knots and require greatly increased power and twice the number of boilers as the older type. New engine and forging plants had to be erected, in addition to utilizing all the available producing capacity of the plants which could build engines and machinery of this type. Some idea of the amount of machinery required for our naval vessels can be given by the fact that the average expenditures of the Bureau of Steam Engineering have increased to nearly three-quarters of a million dollars a day.

The United States Navy now operates the largest radio system in existence. Within the past year stations of the highest power have been completed at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii; Cavite, P. I.; and Annapolis, Md. The completion of the new station at Annapolis recently was signalized by the sending direct of messages to Rome, Paris, and London. Messages are flashed from the Atlantic coast to Pearl Harbor, and from there to Cavite or Japan. Previous to our entrance into the war the number of naval rodio installations afloat and ashore numbered about 500. It is now between 4,000 and 5,000, all the shore stations being under control of the Navy, which also furnishes equipment and operators for cargo vessels and transports, as well as naval vessels.

Upon the declaration of war the control of all radio was placed under the Navy. Commercial stations were taken over. Those that were unnecessary were closed, and those which could be utilized to advantage were made a part of the vast system which has been built up covering a large part of the globe. Thousands of operators were required for service at stations and on ships, and special schools for their training were established, the largest, that at Harvard University, having provision for some 4,000 students.

The work of the Bureau of Ordnance has increased almost 2,000 per cent in the past year and a half. For the two or three years previous to the war its average expenditures were about $30,000,000 a year. For the fiscal year 1918 they amounted to practically $600,000,000, twenty times the ordinary expenditures in time of peace. And this is a fair measure of the work done in providing guns, projectiles, powder, torpedoes, depth charges, mines, and armor plate for naval vessels, arming merchantmen for protection against attack by submarines, and the various other tasks imposed upon this branch of the service. As early as 1915 the bureau had drafted its plans in preparation for war, if it should come, and before the declaration of war had accumulated considerable reserves of munitions. The bureau operates many ordnance plants and factories, some of which are owned by the Government, others have been requisitioned or are operated under contract, and in addition vast quantities of material have been purchased under contract. The Naval Gun Factory, at Washington, has almost doubled its output and now employs nearly 9,000 men. Fifteen acres of adjoining land have been purchased and six large buildings are nearing completion thereon, which will greatly increase the capacity of the plant. Considerable enlargements are being made in the Navy powder factory at Indianhead, Md., which employs 1,100 men and covers a square mile. The facilities and output of the torpedo station at Newport, R. I., have been materially increased.

An automatic mine-loading plant, with a capacity of more than 1,000 mines a day, has been created. Numerous ammunition depots have been established, which prepare powder charges, load and fuse shells, handle high explosives, and ship ammunition to vessels. A large projectile factory has been erected at Charleston, W. Va., and has been in operation for several months. The designs for the armor-plate factory to be erected at that point have been entirely completed, and much of the machinery is now on order. A large tract of land along the Potomac River has been acquired and a new proving ground is being established. Some of the most important accomplishments of the Ordnance Bureau can not be told at present, without disclosing important naval operations, nor can numerous inventions that have been developed and utilized be discussed in detail. But we may mention the new Navy 16-inch gun, the most powerful Navy gun under construction or designed for use at sea, so far as is known, which was successfully completed and tested last April. A new type of howitzer shooting a heavy depth charge fitted to detonate below the water or in contact with the submarine is one of the devices developed which is aiding in exterminating the German U-boats. Depth charges, which have proved so effective against the submarine, have been produced in quantities. A new type of mine, which is considered one of the safest to handle and which, if it breaks loose from its fastening and drifts, is rendered harmless, and yet is one of the most effective weapons of the kind in existence, has been invented and many thousands manufactured.

To house and train the immense increase in personnel, existing training stations were greatly enlarged and a number of new ones erected. Two years ago the Navy had training facilities for about 6,000 men. The camps already constructed provide winter accommodations for 145,000, and those being built or authorized will provide for 53,000 more. The total cost of these training camps will be about $57,000,000. Great Lakes is now the largest training station in the world, with accommodations for some 50,000, and further enlargements are under way. The acquisition of the old Jamestown Exposition site and Pine Beach properties has enabled the Navy to establish at Hampton Roads, Va., a naval operating base, which includes an extensive training station, aviation base, and will comprise docks and wharves for the accommodation of the largest vessels, warehouses and storage facilities for fuel and all kinds of fleet supplies, and will provide what the Navy had long needed, an operating base for the fleet.

Our navy yards have been greatly enlarged, and have not only carried on the immense amount of work required for the upkeep of the fleet and the conversion of vessels taken over, but are building naval vessels of practically every type. The number of employees at navy yards has been more than doubled. Many new machine shops, foundries, and warehouses have been erected, and new shipways built. Dry docks are being built which will accommodate the largest ships afloat. The new dry dock at Norfolk is nearing completion and is expected to be in service within the next few months, practically a year ahead of contract. The dry dock at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, in the construction of which many difficulties were encountered, is expected to be completed early in the coming year. Scores of warehouses for the storage of supplies and munitions have been erected, including the largest of the kind in existence, at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

Every care has been taken to safeguard the health of the men in the Navy, both ashore and aboard ship. Six thousand additional beds have been provided to meet the immediate needs of war conditions and about 6,000 more are being provided for under present construction or contracts. In addition extensive hospital facilities have been acquired abroad to accommodate the large force in foreign service. The Medical Corps, which formerly numbered about 300 commissioned officers, now consist of 3,000, an increase of ten times its former personnel. The Dental Corps has grown from 30 officers to 500 members. Ample medical supplies have been accumulated and there has been no lack of medical attendance or supplies either in this country or abroad. Every possible precaution for the prevention, as well as the control, of diseases has been taken, and early in the war a special division of sanitation was created, to which experts of the Public Health Service were detailed to insure the best sanitary conditions at every point where sailors or marines were stationed.

When war was declared, April 6, 1917, the Navy passed from a peace to a war basis without an hour's delay. The submarine being the immediate menace and to combat it the first duty, it was decided to send as many destroyers as possible across the sea for service in the war zone. A flotilla of destroyers was immediately organized and equipped for foreign service, and the first contingent sailed a little more than a fortnight after war was declared, arriving at Queenstown May 4. Since that time our naval forces in European waters have been continually augmented until now we have more than 250 vessels, including all types from battleships to submarine chasers, and a force of more than 45,000 officers and men under command of Vice Admiral Sims. British and French naval authorities have paid the highest tributes to their energy, enterprise and effectiveness in convoying troop and supply ships and merchant vessels, in patroling vast sea areas, and in destroying submarines. Just how many U-boats they have destroyed can not now be announced, but it is known that they have accounted for a very material number of them. Only a few days ago American submarine chasers took part in the destruction of the Austrian naval base at Durazzo, screened larger ships under a hot enemy fire, sank one submarine and damaged and probably destroyed another; and this was in the Adriatic, in an area in which few people realized that our Navy was operating.

From the far North, along the coasts of England and France and Portugal, in the Mediterranean and Adriatic our forces are constantly at work. They sometimes call it the "silent Navy," for cloak of secrecy must necessarily cover many of its operations, but whenever and wherever its services are required it is heard from, and always acquits itself with the credit that courage and efficiency demand, upholding the traditions of the service.

The greatest task intrusted to the Navy, and what has well been called "the biggest transportation job in history," is the transportation of our armies overseas, and the way in which it has been accomplished is without a parallel. For a year and a half a continuous stream of transports has poured across the seas to France. Despite the constant menace of submarines and the difficulties of navigation under war conditions, not a single American troop ship under the convoy of our naval vessels has been sunk on the way to France, and not one soldier aboard them has been lost through enemy action. In this tremendous task the British Navy has given us the most valuable assistance, placing at our disposal a large amount of tonnage and carrying hundreds of thousands of American troops. Without their assistance we could not have placed on the fighting front anything like as many men as are there now, and they deserve our warmest gratitude. The French and Italians have also given material aid. All the allied navies have worked together with the same purpose and aim, each aiding the other in every possible way. There are now nearly 2,000,000 American soldiers either in France or on the way, and the total loss of life due to enemy submarine activity has been less than 300 men.

The administration of the Navy Department has been characterized by signal efficiency in every bureau and division. Long before we entered the war deadwood and red tape had been cut out and the department put on a thorough working basis. The machinery was so well organized that when the heavy demands of the war emergency came all that was needed was to expand the personnel and equipment. The Navy has promptly met every demand made upon it, it has responded without delay to every call, and no necessity has been found for any change in its organization. It has successfully met the severe tests, and this is the highest possible tribute to its efficiency and the ability of its officials.

Two years ago, just before the final passage of the naval act of August 29, 1916, the largest ever passed up to that time, I had the pleasure of reviewing before this House the progress of the Navy. I pointed out that during the 16 years from 1898 to 1913 the total tonnage authorized amounted to only 1,116,018 tons, while in the years 1914–1916, 1,014,666 tons had been authorized. During the McKinley-Roosevelt administration, from March 4, 1901, to March 4, 1905, the total cost of vessels authorized amounted to $107,006,642; during the Roosevelt administration, from March 4, 1905, to March 4, 1909, the total amounted to $83,192,938; under the Taft administration, from March 4, 1909, to March 4, 1913, $127,747,113. During the first three years of the Wilson administration the total cost of vessels authorized amounted to $655,289,806. Though the authorized strength of the Navy was only 51,500, until the present administration it had never been recruited up to its full strength. In fact on March 4, 1913, the Navy was 5,312 men short of its authorized strength. The efforts of Secretary Daniels and his aids to popularize the naval service, to provide greater opportunities for the enlisted men, bore such good fruit that over 6,000 men were added to the enlisted strength and the Navy was kept fully recruited.

The improvements in organization and administration, and the liberal appropriations made by Congress laid the basis for that preparedness which was so strikingly apparent when the Navy was called into action. The wisdom of Secretary Daniels's policy of expanding our shipyards, of having the Navy not only build ships but manufacture in its own shops munitions and many other things needed by the Navy was immediately vindicated when war came. It is not difficut to picture the plight in which we would have found ourselves if the policy of closing and dismantling a number of our navy yards and depending almost entirely upon private firms and shipyards had prevailed. Our navy yards have proved a very present help in time of need. Well manned and well equipped, they have, by increasing their working forces and buildings and machinery, been able to care for the enormous amount of repair work to keep in shipshape the vastly increased fleet, and their shipways and shops have proved a very substantial addition to the shipbuilding facilities we sorely needed.

The retention of competent men by reenlistment, the careful training of the personnel, gave us a body of trained seamen that formed a valuable basis for the immense Navy of to-day. Sir Eric Geddes, the first lord of the British Admiralty, on his arrival a few days ago, remarked:

> The dauntless determination which the United States has displayed in creating a huge trained body of seamen out of landsmen is one of the most striking accomplishments of the war. Had it not been effectively done one would have thought it impossible, and words fail me to express our admiration of this feat, undertaken and accomplished by your Navy Department, of which Mr. Secretary Daniels is the civil chief.

This was made possible only by the excellent system of training that had been built up in previous years and the plan of intensive instruction which was made to put into effect in the emergency of war.

Recently when I was abroad in England, France, and Italy there was one unbroken and unanimous expression of wonder and appreciation of the magnitude and the rapidity of the achievements of the United States in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, and everyone was unstinted in his commendation and praise.

Feeding and clothing the half million men in the Navy has been a task of huge proportions well performed. Despite the many difficulties of securing supplies and materials, the high standard has been maintained, and we have sustained our reputation of having "the best fed, best clad Navy in the world." The volume of purchases by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts has grown from a prewar sum of $27,000,000 per annum to over half a billion dollars a year. By the use of the widest information in regard to supplies and materials, keeping in close touch with the sources of production, broadening competitive bidding, and using war-time powers, profiteering has been prevented and Navy purchasing put on a scientific basis.

The Navy ration has been maintained steadily at its usual high standard. Importunities to lower the Navy's specifications for food provisions and to adopt substitutes have been resisted, and there is no variation whatever in either quality or quantity and variety of ration. It is as it existed before the war.

While the average cost of the rations increased about 13 per cent over the cost last year, it has been shown by the Department of Labor that there was an 18 per cent rise in average wholesale prices, so that had the cost of the ration kept pace with the increase in the cost of provisions, the total cost to the Government would have been about a million and a half dollars more than it actually was—this means a daily saving of $4,500.

Reports received from commanding officers of our transports, bearing troops for France, amply attest the fact that the men have been well satisfied with the food furnished them. As an instance of this the following is quoted from a report made by the officer in charge of the transport Mercury:

> The food supplied the troops during the voyage has been well cooked, most excellent in quality, the variety has been well maintained, and it has been ample in quantity. No man has been turned away no matter how many times he appeared for reissue of food at any meal.

Recently on a transport 11,000 troops were served dinner in the remarkably short period of one hour and seven minutes.

Anticipation of the requirements of material resulted in great advantage to the Navy. Thus, in regard to cloth alone, the Navy will not have to enter the market again until May, 1919. This purchase, amounting to $17,000,000, resulted in yardage sufficient to manufacture a million blouses, 800,000 pairs of trousers, and 350,000 overcoats.

Competitive bidding has prevailed and the widest publicity is sought in connection with all purchasing. By maintaining a rigidly supervised list of qualified bidders great progress has been made in eliminating the middle man while contingent-fee attorneys and brokers have been exposed.

A successful means of readjusting prices downward has been effected by the Navy supplying raw material to the manufacturers who had the facilities for fabricating but who were not able to obtain the raw article.

The commandeering power was most successfully used in the fall of 1917 when the tin market was mounting rapidly. By taking over cargoes and apportioning among a few concerns an instance is shown where the Navy secured tin at 64 cents a pound when the market was 80. The soundness of this policy is found in a letter written to the Secretary of the Navy by the chairman of the Price Fixing Committee, in which he states—

> Manufacturers waste time in attempting to extort unfair prices from the Navy, as it seems to keep itself exceptionally well informed and uses the commandeering privileges to secure fair prices.

To facilitate the shipment of supplies and materials for the Navy a division of inland transportation was formed with the result that little trouble was experienced in the war-program traffic.

Of great interest to the dependents of our men are the allotments made by the personnel of the Navy. During the fiscal year there were paid 849,000 allotments amounting to over $19,000,000.

It is worthy of prominent note that the Navy subscribed to a sum of over $18,500,000 in the third liberty loan, and that every navy yard in the country gave subscriptions from more than 80 per cent of its employees, and reports are that its subscription to the fourth loan will exceed the third.

Activities of the disbursing division have resulted in the actual saving to the Navy of $11,000,000. This control has been exercised without friction, ways being found to prevent the Government's money from being wasted without interfering with the work.

Recently, in company with 12 other members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I made a visit overseas, going into Scotland, England, Ireland, France, and Italy, where we had opportunity to visit and make inspection of some of the activities of the English Navy and of many of the activities of the United States Navy abroad.

I do not deem it appropriate or advisable because of war conditions to speak in detail of these activities in the war zone in more specific detail than I have set out herein. However, I do deem it appropriate to say that we found the operations of the United States Navy overseas in a most satisfactory condition. We were especially pleased to learn from our own officers, as well as the officers of the English, French, and Italian Navies, that the cooperation between the several navies was most complete, cordial, and harmonious; indeed, they all spoke of it as the one naval service of the three countries and not as three separate naval services. We were also well pleased with the intelligent and efficient management and with the zeal, energy, and devotion of our officers.

No statement can be made at this time in detail of the magnitude of the naval operations overseas. This much, however, I feel justified in saying: That the magnitude of naval operations overseas, on the water and in the air, reflects credit upon the American people and commands the respect and the admiration of our allies. When the war is over and the full history of the magnitude of our naval operations abroad may be given in detail, it will be a source of pride and honor to the American people; and the fidelity, intelligence, patriotism, and devotion of our naval officers and enlisted men, embracing as a part of the Navy the Marine Corps officers and men, will form a bright page in the world's history and will receive throughout future ages the commendation and plaudits of all who admire courage and intelligence and love patriotism and fidelity.

The Marines on land and the Navy men on sea and in the air in the various lines of work and duty to which they have been detailed deserve, and I believe heartily receive, the unanimous commendation of the American people. Well done, faithful officers and men.

In order that the Congress and the country might have full and detailed information concerning the operations of the Navy and the Marine Corps, I have had prepared by the chiefs of the several bureaus a statement showing the work and the operations of the Navy in connection with this war, and I attach them hereto as a part of my remarks:

OFFICE OF NAVAL OPERATIONS.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF NAVAL AVIATION.

Previous to the declaration of war the Navy had maintained but one air station. This was a small but complete and active station at Pensacola, Fla., which was used for instruction and experimental work. The personnel of aviation at this time consisted of about 30 line officers of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, who were trained as aviators, and 300 men. The aircraft in use consisted of a variety of American and foreign types which had been purchased by the department. Owing to the limited facilities and small appropriations, the results of these activities were not very extensive.

The Naval Reserve Flying Corps was established by law in 1916, but it was not until February, 1917, that a definite interpretation was placed on this law and that enrollments in the Naval Reserve Flying Corps actually began. The officers who received training in aviation had been regarded as having been detailed for special duty in connection with aviation. The law passed by Congress in 1916 authorizing the Naval Reserve included not only a reserve to be attached to the fleet but the Naval Reserve Flying Corps. Accordingly when war was declared steps were taken to enroll and train a large number of men for ultimate qualification as pilots. In addition, facilities were provided for the training of a large number of men specialized in the various functions pertaining to aviation, and at the present time schools are in operation for the training of pilots, mechanics, gas-engine experts, communication officers, etc.

On October 2, 1918, the total strength of naval aviation was approximately 40,383 officers and men. Of this number, 16,621 are now abroad and actively engaged in operations against the enemy. This increase in the aviation personnel of the Navy since the beginning of the war has called for an enormous expansion of training facilities. When the training program was first put into operation there was but one ground school. This school provided at that time training facilities for about 300 men. At the present time this number has been increased to 1,200, and, in addition, schools have been established in the Central West and near the Pacific coast. For the training of dirigible pilots a school was established in Ohio, and the department is now contemplating the establishment of an additional school.

It was evident to naval authorities that one of the most important ways of assisting the allies was to engage immediately in the antisubmarine warfare. In order to bring the United States to the point where the most good could be accomplished with the facilities immediately available various methods of combating the submarine were carefully considered. As a result, it was decided to establish coastal patrol stations, both in this country and abroad.

Construction on stations in the United States was started immediately, and to-day practically the entire eastern Atlantic coast is being patrolled by naval aircraft, and the Navy Department is prepared to extend these operations along the Gulf and Pacific coasts. In addition to seaplane-patrol stations, dirigible and kite-balloon stations have been put into operation, and, in order to attain the greatest possible efficiency and cruising radius for seaplanes, rest and supply stations are being located at the most advantageous points.

The increase in the number of stations abroad has been fully as great. The month following the declaration of war 5 naval aviators and 100 enlisted men were sent abroad, and these forces were the first forces of the United States to land in France for service against the enemy. The bodies of three of these men are now buried in France and two others were killed in seaplane accidents. Since the arrival of this first expedition abroad, stations have been established not only in France but in England, Ireland, and Italy as well. In order to appreciate more fully the magnitude of this achievement, it may be said that it has been necessary to ship from the United States practically all the material for these stations, which includes hangars, machinery, and, in a word, everything that will eventully be used at these points.

During the month of September, 1918, aircraft engaged in patrol flights in the United States covered a total distance of 404,775 miles. Aircraft engaged in training flights covered a total of 1,317,460 miles during the same period. It is not considered advisable to give out actual figures regarding the operations at foreign stations. The work abroad has gone forward steadily and the results obtained are becoming more and more important. A recent announcement by the Navy Department to the effect that American naval aircraft successfully attacked and destroyed a German submarine is only one illustration of the work that is being done over there. The stations, in addition to carrying out active antisubmarine patrols, have been engaged in assisting vessels of the fleet in convoying troop and merchant ships.

On April 27, 1918, an American dirigible abroad made a continuous flight for 25 hours and 43 minutes, during the course of which three convoys were escorted for 13 hours and 50 minutes in a zone which was mined and patrolled. In recognition of this accomplishment the French minister of the marine officially complimented the American forces saying that "such an ascension of 25 hours and 43 minutes, which constitutes by its duration a remarkable performance, gives us proof of the most excellent qualities of endurance, of energy, of sang-froid, and of technical ability of the American forces."

In addition to the activities mentioned above the Navy Department decided to organize an expedition to destroy enemy submarine and naval bases. The personnel and material of this expedition was organized in the United States and later sent abroad. On August 15, 1918, it was announced that operations had been started by bombing and destroying enemy bases in Belgium. The scope of the activities of the expedition have since been increased and the original forces augmented from time to time.

When war was declared on April 6, 1917, 93 heavier-than-air seaplanes had previously been delivered to the Navy and about 135 were on order. Of the number that had previously been delivered, only 21 were in use, the remainder having been worn out or lost. These seaplanes were of the N–9 and R–6 types, which are now considered as training seaplanes.

After eliminating types which had been tried and found unsuitable, the department fixed upon two sizes for war purposes which had been perfected in the United States in anticipation of the development of a high-powered engine. The engine developed is the Liberty. The flying boat which at the present time is strongly favored is an American conception and it has not been necessary to copy foreign patterns to insure our fliers being supplied with the best. With this development of the heavier-than-air craft came the development of dirigibles and kite balloons.

With the development of suitable planes and engines the Navy was able to select the type of aircraft which was best suited for its service and to frame a large and definite building program. As a result there are now over 500 seaplanes in use at naval air stations in the United States and up to date over 400 seaplanes have been sent abroad. Other aircraft at stations, both in this country and abroad, includes dirigibles and kite balloons. There has been no undue delay in supplying seaplanes, and the delivery of service seaplanes is approximately one month ahead of the scheduled time.

The demand for aircraft necessitated an enormous increase of production facilities, and, as a part of this extension, the Navy Department undertook to build and equip a naval aircraft factory at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. Within 90 days from the date the land had been assigned, the factory was erected and the keel of the first flying boat was laid down. In August, 1918, this factory was producing 50 per cent more seaplanes than it had been two months previous. In addition, at least five plants are at present devoted to Navy work and a large proportion of the output of several other factories has been assigned to the Navy.

The delivery of seaplanes for training purposes has been sufficient to more than meet the requirements. The training of personnel and providing of stations and equipment to carry out this training has expanded sufficiently so that the present output of pilots, observers, mechanicians, and men trained in special branches is keeping abreast or ahead of requirements.

The confidential nature of the work prevents any definite statement being made as to future operations. However, it may be said that the Navy Department recently established several air stations in Canada. These stations have been supplied with personnel and material from the United States, and the Navy Department is at present engaged in training personnel for the Canadian Government, which personnel will eventually take over the operation of the stations. In addition, the governments of our allies have requested the Navy Department to take over more stations abroad, and not only are they desired to continue present operations, but also to increase the field of their activities.

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

Just before the entrance of the United States in the war, or in January of last year, the Navy had a total of 56,000 officers and men of all kinds. To-day there are 520,000 officers and men, which include Reserves and Coast Guard—all volunteers. This number does not include the personnel of the Marine Corps.

Commissioned and enlisted personnel on January of last year were assigned by this bureau to a total of 176 vessels in commission. There are to-day 1,800 vessels in full commission, with complete complements of officers and men and with excess personnel on each ship to provide for training. The vessels commissioned include battleships, submarines, cruisers, destroyers, transports, hospital ships, patrol vessels, mine layers, mine sweepers, submarine chasers, converted yachts, gunboats, fuel and supply ships, cargo carriers, etc.

Just prior to the beginning of the war the Bureau of Navigation, which has charge of the recruiting, education, and training of all officers and men and their assignment to the fighting vessels of the Navy, started a carefully considered system of intensive training to provide for the great need for efficient personnel during the war. An estimate of war needs was accurately drawn up and schools for special ratings were immediately started. At the same time the training stations, which could accommodate but 6,000 men, were enlarged and additional training depots erected, until now they can accommodate over 100,000 men in training.

The assistance of universities and schools throughout the country was obtained in order to train men for special ratings along technical lines in which these educational institutions excelled, but the schools established at the training stations covered the great majority of the ratings necessary for the fighting work of the fleet. At the training stations there are schools for practically all the trades, including courses for divers, electricians, radio men, carpenters, machinists, blacksmiths, coppersmiths, bakers, cooks, stewards, Hospital Corps men, fuel-oil men, winch men, camoufleurs, musicians, yeomen, gunners, signalmen, steel and concrete construction men, water tenders, firemen, quartermasters, helmsmen, gyro-compass men, lookouts, armed-guard crews, submarine crews, motor-boat men, hydroplane specialists, torpedo men, aviators, aviator mechanics of all classes, etc.

Training was also started in the battle fleet, and, under the able direction of the commander in chief, Admiral Mayo, every vessel of the Navy, at home and abroad, is now an active training unit for both officers and men in addition to carrying out its main mission of immediate readiness for battle. Trained destroyer, submarine, and patrol boat officers and men from the war zone are being constantly brought back as nucleus crews to man many of the new vessels being put into commission, and the battleships and other vessels of the fleet are turning out specially trained crews for new battleships and other vessels of the fleet and are providing the armed guards for every vessel that visits the war zone.

It is because of the strict adherence to the carefully prepared plans of the bureau in regard to providing trained personnel for the enormous expansion of the Navy from 56,000 to 520,000 that the Navy has been able to satisfactorily meet every call for manning new vessels and for providing the necessary skilled officers and men for all the detailed work of aviation, mining, bombing, and other operations abroad.

The reports from the commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet and from all commanders of forces abroad show that the various units composing the Navy have reached a higher state of battle efficiency than ever before. Further, the system of providing and training personnel is now operating on the assumption that the war will last for several years, and every detail of the needs for 18 months to come has been carefully considered and prepared for.

In the transport service alone, which includes all the convoy and escort system, and which, under Rear Admiral Gleaves, has produced such remarkable results in safely delivering enormous numbers of troops and quantities of supplies on the other side, there are to-day more officers and men than there were in the entire Navy just prior to the beginning of the war. The same statement applies equally to the forces actually operating in the war zone on the other side.

It is proper to state that the successful operation of all activities assigned to the Navy during the war is directly due to the system of training of officers and men, in which this country has excelled for many years past.

The measure of the efficiency of the Navy is the efficiency of its personnel.

BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS.

At the beginning of the war the enlisted strength of the Navy was approximately 60,000 men; since that time the Navy has increased by leaps and bounds until to-day, a year and a half since war was declared on Germany, we have an enlisted strength of approximately half a million. The work of feeding and clothing the greatly increased Navy proceeded with orderly precision and all of the men have been satisfactorily outfitted with clothing adequate for their needs in every respect. All of the clothing provided for the men has been up to the usual high Navy standard, the inspections never having for a moment been relaxed in any degree.

The Navy ration since the war has been maintained at its usual high standard and this factor has greatly contributed to the excellent physical condition which characterizes the health of the Navy to-day. Although constant importunities have been made to lower the Navy's specifications for provisions and to adopt food substitutes, all such importunities were successfully resisted and there is no variation in the quality, quantity, and variety of the Navy ration as it existed before the war.

Great pressure has been brought to bear on the Navy to lower the specifications for beef and to accept carcass beef of a minimum weight of 475 pounds, which is 100 pounds less than that required under the Navy specifications. The first request to lower the specifications was accompanied by a statement to the effect that there was a threatened shortage in the immediate future of beef of Navy specification weight and as a result the Federal Trade Commission was requested to investigate the entire beef situation. Upon receipt of the report of the Federal Trade Commission and after an exchange of views with the Food Administration the following resolution with reference to beef for the Navy was adopted by the Food Purchase Board:

"It is requested that the Food Administration preempt for and allot to the Army, Navy, and fighting forces of our allies a sufficient quantity of beef weighing 575 pounds up to 850 pounds to fill their demands.

"If there be not enough beef of these weights procurable, then the Food Administration is requested to allot, after giving notice to the War Department and the Navy Department, lighter beef of proper quality sufficient to meet such deficiency, keeping the weights of the allotted beef as near as possible to the minimum mentioned above—this lighter-weight beef to be distributed pro rata between the Army, the Navy, and the allied fighting forces on the basis of their total demands.

"During such time, however, as a shortage of heavyweight beef may exist, the Food Administration is requested to take the necessary steps to prevent any such heavyweight beef from being diverted to the civilian populations either within the United States or abroad.

"The quality of all allotted beef to be passed upon by the inspectors for the Army and Navy in accordance with specifications and instructions issued to them by their respective departments."

While the average cost of the ration increased about 13 per cent over the cost last year, statistics from the official bulletin issued by the Department of Labor indicate that there was a rise in the average wholesale prices of provisions of 18 per cent; so that, had the cost of the ration kept pace with the increase in the cost of provisions the total cost to the Government would have been about a million and a half dollars more than it actually was—this meaning a saving of about $4,500 a day.

As stated by the Secretary of the Navy, "the success of the transfer of the Army troops will depend to a large extent on the conduct of the commissary service on each vessel." Keeping this fact in mind, plans were made well in advance of the initial trip of the transports bearing troops for France and complete and satisfactory arrangements for the subsistence of the troops en route were made. The reports received from the commanding officers of the troops on board the transports amply attest the fact that the troops are well satisfied with the food furnished them, the following having been received from the commanding officer of the troops en route on the transport Mercury:

"The food supplied the troops during the voyage has been well cooked, most excellent in quality, the variety has been well maintained, and it has been ample in quantity. No man has been turned away, no matter how many times he appeared for reissue of food at any meal."

On one transport recently 11,000 troops were served dinner in the remarkably short period of one hour and seven minutes.

PURCHASE DIVISION.

The volume of purchasing done in Supplies and Accounts has grown from a prewar sum of $27,000,000 per annum to over half a billion per annum. Although the general fundamental principles of Navy peacetime purchasing, definite standards of quality, adequate inspection, etc., have been maintained, it has been necessary by reason of changed conditions in industry to make use of a war-time power of fixing fair and just prices on the basis of cost of production plus a reasonable profit in connection with the purchase of many commodities. Competition which in time of peace assured reasonable prices became inadequate in time of war. In addition, the changed conditions have made necessary the use of the war-time power to compel performance. The developments of the year in the observance of these fundamentals and the new experience gathered in the use of war-time powers have added greatly to the store of purchasing knowledge. The records already were so complete as to warrant the statement that "Navy purchasing has been a science."

Personnel: The purchasing staff of the Navy has increased over 1,400 per cent during the year. From a prewar force of 28 officers, clerks, stenographers, and civilian experts, the purchasing force of the Navy has increased to a present total of 402. It is interesting to note in this connection that practically the entire purchasing staff of to-day was untrained, without previous purchasing experience in the Navy.

Major phases of purchasing: The story of the Navy purchasing system may be briefly summarized under five heads:

(a) The building up of an organization for specializing in various lines of commodities, thus forming a basis for coordinating all governmental purchasing.
(b) Developments in competitive bidding.
(c) War-time means of securing material.
(d) Determination of "fair and just" prices.
(e) Stock upkeep in war.

Studies in material: With purchases amounting to more than a million and one-half dollars a day, the need for an organization of specialists was early seen. For each important industry, the purchasing organization has had its specialist who has been charged with a thorough knowledge of the facts in each industry, labor supply, raw materials, fuel power, finances, together with the capacity of the industry for production. Anticipation of the requirements of this material by these specialists has resulted to the advantage of the Navy.

The value of a specialized study of the Nation's capacity for production may be seen in the following typical case in connection with textiles:

In August last, 10,000,000 yards of duck and 6,500,000 yards of denim were purchased prior to the taking over by the Army of the Nation's entire production until March, 1919. Five million yards of 11-ounce, 18-ounce, and 30-ounce cloth were bought, being the largest purchases of uniform cloth ever contemplated by the Navy and requiring an expenditure of $17,000,000. To make the cloth 15,000,000 pounds of grease wool was used, which resulted in a yardage sufficient for the manufacture of 1,000,000 blouses, 800,000 pairs of trousers, and 350,000 overcoats. By thus anticipating requirements, it will be unnecessary for the Navy to enter the market again for cloth until May, 1919. By adding 2,000,000 yards of 11-ounce, 400,000 yards of 18-ounce, and 600,000 yards of 30-ounce material, Navy contracts were out of the way of the Army before its expanded program was adopted.

Material sections: Special groups (steel and iron, chemicals and explosives, nonferrous metals, textiles, lumber, provisions, etc.) are maintained in the purchasing organization. These groups have been built around men expert in their particular specialty. Other groups are added from time to time as the war demands for any material assume special importance in purchasing operations. As a result of the extension of a policy of organization along material lines to other war agencies of the Government, it has been possible to make all Navy purchases through a Navy organization without conflict.

Developments in competitive bidding: The Navy system of obtaining material by competitive bidding had been thoroughly developed before the war, and was well known to industry. There have been no important changes in principle nor in practice other than those of gradual and orderly expansion. The pressure of war demand has in no way modified the principle that Navy business must not only be right but must look right. The widest possible publicity is sought in connection with all purchasing activities.

A campaign has been conducted with great success with a view to eliminating all middle men from bidding on Navy supplies by maintaining a rigidly supervised list of qualified bidders and by making it attractive to manufacturers to bid direct. Contingent-fee attorneys and brokers have been mercilessly exposed, and the facts in each case have been presented to the Department of Justice for action. A year ago the percentage of brokers bidding for Navy business was between 6 and 7 per cent. To-day this percentage has been cut down to between 1 and 2 per cent. On occasions when satisfactory bids have not been received at the public opening by reason of scarcity of material or unwillingness of manufacturers to bid in the face of rising prices, special appeals have been made in the form of individual letters, pointing out the urgent necessity for the material and the responsibility of the manufacturer in contributing to the supply of war needs. Upon each application of this method the necessary supply of the needed commodity has been obtained at satisfactory prices.

War-time means of securing material: Often by reason of an insufficient supply of raw material or an unwillingness on the part of manufacturers to furnish material at prices which the Navy ought to pay, it has been necessary to exercise the power vested by law to place mandatory orders at prices determined by the Navy after intensive investigation of the cost of production. This procedure has been necessary both to obtain the finished product and to control raw materials when prices were unduly inflated by reason of wide competition on the part of manufacturers who sought to supply the finished product. Price discussions have been held with the representatives of the leading industries and have resulted in securing many classes of supplies at reasonable prices, in addition to establishing close relations between the Navy and industry. In addition to the peace-time method of competition, it has been possible for the Navy to further assure fair prices by reason of its vigorous use when needed of the price-fixing powers. In order to protect the Navy until such time as the competition order of industry is fully restored it would seem imperative that they should be extended beyond the limits at which they are now fixed.

Fair prices to the Navy: In every exercise of the purchasing function the Navy has sought tirelessly to assure fair prices. To this end every means open to it have been actively employed. A few concrete examples of this policy will serve to show the practical results obtained and to further justify the elaborate and detailed study of commodity markets maintained by the Navy since the beginning of the war. In certain instances, after a thorough request for bids had resulted unsatisfactorily, it was found necessary to allocate Government needs among the industry in order that actual production might be assured and at the same time that fair and just prices should be obtained. This practice has been widely followed in the steel industry and has been most successfully applied by the Navy in connection with its purchases of certain classes of food products. Where allocation has failed it has been necessary to commandeer available supplies in order to meet immediate needs. In June, for illustration, in cooperation with the Army, a joint order to commandeer white and kidney beans became necessary. As a result of the order 42,000,000 pounds of beans were secured in California. Many contracts were in force for the sale of the beans which were commandeered, title to pass upon the docking of the vessel at a United States port. In order to protect the Navy's interests and to avoid the obvious increases in cost which would result from the injection of intermediate owners, commandeering orders were entered against the cargoes by wireless, and a fair price, based upon the cost of the product to importers, was fixed. By this means a large supply of the necessary staple was obtained at a great saving to the Army and the Navy, and all parties with equitable rights in the transaction were fully protected.

A successful means of readjusting prices downward has been effected by supplying raw material to the manufacturers. In July, 1917, 3,000,000 pounds of wool were purchased, and the effect upon the market of the price at which wool was offered by the Navy to its cloth contractors was surprising. Although there was no established price control at that time, the action of the Navy helped to stabilize the whole wool situation. Manufacturers state that this wool made it possible for them to obtain satisfactory prices on raw material, and as a result reductions were made in the price to the Navy of finished wool products. In this instance the Navy's small holding of wool prevented the price on contractor's options from exceeding the price set by the Navy on its own supply. A further purchase of 25,000 bales of Australian wool was made under favorable conditions by arrangement with the British Government, and a complete set of samples was made available for the inspection and selection by successful low bidders on manufactured cloth. As a result a direct saving has been effected to the extent of about $1,500,000 and has assured the production of material with which to clothe the fleet. Another instance where the Navy has successfully supplied raw material and so obtained finished products at low prices is seen in the case of high explosives. In a period of unusual demand concerns who had the facilities for fabricating but which were not able to obtain the raw materials at reasonable prices were furnished the raw material by the Navy, which made it possible to secure reasonable prices upon the finished product.

In order to obtain low prices and to avoid a duplication of effort there has been a recent tendency to have one department obtain certain classes of material for the entire war program. At the request of the War Department the Navy now handles the distribution of mercury for the use of explosives, paints, and pharmaceuticals, and by reason of similar request controls all arrangements for inspection, payment, and distribution of imported Indian mica. This practice extends also to the purchase of hemp and kapok by the Navy purchasing organization in the Philippine Islands.

In order to make the fullest use of stored material a permanent naval board of appraisal and condemnation has been established at New York, with authority to take possession of articles needed by the Navy. The board has made inventories of goods of interest to the Navy stored in warehouses and held by banks or forwarding agents for export, in the case of 238 warehouses, 49 banks, and 553 forwarding agents and 223 exporters. By thus making use of finished products instead of placing new orders and by taking material at a fixed price a substantial saving to the Nation has resulted.

The commandeering power was most successfully used in the fall of 1917, when the tin market was mounting rapidly. Upon advices from the collector of customs that a ship with a cargo of 250 tons of pig tin consigned to three owners was about to dock, the 13 tons required by the Navy were commandeered and apportioned among the three concerns. The tin was paid for at 64 cents per pound, the approximate value before the market began to rise. Further arrangements were made to restrain all tin of Navy specification warehoused in New York, and 2,000 tons were placed under seal. As a result of this action, several hundred additional tons were placed at the disposal of the Navy by a dealer at 64 cents per pound, the market at that time being 80 cents. In connection with this operation, the following statement was made a part of the report of the Senate Investigating Committee on Operation of Government Departments:

"The action of the Navy in commandeering tin which was hoarded in the possession of importers and dealers and thereby held from the market when an acute shortage prevailed was commendable."

By reason of the use of mandatory and commandeering orders, the determination of a just and reasonable price was of first importance—the power to fix a price, implying the responsibility to fix it when quoted prices were not fair. The Navy has earned a reputation for insisting upon fair prices to apply to its purchases, and this principle has become recognized as the only substantial foundation for the Government war-time purchasing. The concrete acknowledgment of the soundness of this policy is found in a letter from the chairman of the price-fixing committee to the Secretary of the Navy, in which he states:

"Manufacturers waste their time to attempt to extort unfair prices from the Navy, as it seems to keep itself exceptionally well informed, and uses, as it should, its mandatory orders and commandeering privileges to secure fair prices."

INLAND TRAFFIC DIVISION.

The congestion on the railroads which was generally prevalent at the time war was declared became more serious; and efforts and methods that had previously been used to secure necessary transportation and expeditious movement for Navy and Marine Corps traffic were unavailing.

In the territory north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers and east of the Indiana-Illinois State line, where were located at least 90 per cent of the industries engaged in the manufacture of war material, the carriers were unable to furnish transportation required for all traffic; and the problem was, and still is, to distribute the transportation properly and fairly and first to those interests directly involved in the prosecution of the war.

For the purpose of protecting Navy interests, a section known as "rush delivery" was created in the Purchase Division of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, which accomplished results that were far-reaching, particularly at a time when the Navy was endeavoring to place in commission for effective operation against the submarine the greatest possible number of destroyers and submarine chasers.

The shortage of freight equipment was very acute. Where, during normal times, a few days were consumed in handling freight between point of origin and destination weeks were now required. Contractors found it impossible to secure cars in the required number and were unable to move with reasonable promptness those that they did secure except with the assistance of the Navy.

Toward the end of 1917 the volume of traffic to be handled increased enormously; adverse rail conditions continued; congestion and delays increased; and, mainly due to the unusually severe winter, there resulted the most serious situation known in the history of the railroads.

It was therefore deemed advisable, early in February, 1918, to establish a Division of Inland Transportation in the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, consisting of a limited number of employees assisted and advised by a few executive representatives of the United States Railroad Administration. This division has so well accomplished the purpose for which it was created that there has been but little serious trouble since in moving with reasonable promptness the war program traffic in which the Navy and Marine Corps were, or are, interested. While much of this improved situation is due to the ability of the rail carriers to take care of all the traffic involved to better advantage at this time, yet the direct action by this division and the assistance that it has been able to render the various bureaus has enabled action to be taken and to result with greater dispatch.

Particular assistance was and is being given to subcontractors who have very little ability to obtain prompt results (if at all) except through the efforts of the Navy and Marine Corps; and the very few complaints that have been made for some months plainly indicate the value of the assistance rendered in the speeding up of the war program.

The measures adopted by the Navy in connection with labor transportation to and from navy yards, shipbuilding plants, and other activities in which the Navy was and is interested have been far-reaching in their effect upon a situation that was adverse in its operation against Navy activities. Results were obtained by inducing in some instances the street railway companies to expand their transportation facilities, thus giving satisfactory transportation conditions and abating the conditions that would in time have become intolerable to labor.

All during the period of increased activity occasioned by the outbreak of hostilities, close attention has been given to the necessity of avoiding unreasonable or excessive transportation charges. The same attention has been given to rate applications to and from contemplated storage sites.

ALLOTMENT AND WAR-RISK DIVISION.

Of great interest to thousands of dependents of our men, in the fleet and scattered through our stations at home and abroad, are the allotments made by the personnel of the Navy. In July, 1917, there were paid about 29,000 allotments, amounting to a little over $860,000. In June, 1918, there were paid 128,000 allotments, amounting to about $2,700,000. During the fiscal year there were paid a total of 849,000 allotments, amounting to over $19,000,000.

The third liberty loan to the Navy was handled by Supplies and Accounts, the work being in direct charge of Admiral Cowie, and the Navy officers and men, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard subscribed a sum of over $18,500,000. It is interesting in this connection to note that every navy yard in the United States gave subscriptions from more than 80 per cent of its employees, all but one over 88 per cent of the employees, and all but two over 95 per cent of the employees. One yard had 100 per cent of the entire number of employees therein subscribing, and the average subscription in this yard was $87.50.

Steps are being taken to put the fourth liberty loan "over the top," so far as the Navy is concerned, with an even greater total as regards the amount of money subscribed.

The war-risk insurance act approved October 6, 1917, threw a tremendous volume of work upon the Navy, and this work was handled by Supplies and Accounts, by a special division created for this purpose, working in close harmony with the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department.

Specially trained officers were sent abroad to visit every ship there, and all stations, and to explain to every officer and man, afloat and ashore, the provisos of this act. In addition, they conducted an active selling campaign and saw to it that all requests were sent in in proper form, so that allotments would be paid without delay and without interminable correspondence.

In December, 1917, 11,000 applications were forwarded to the Treasury Department; in January, 41,000; increasing rapidly from month to month, in January 20,300 checks being mailed, to the value of nearly $1,500,000, and in June of this year 100,756 checks, of a total of over $4,150,000.

How great a success the war-risk insurance is proving is shown by an examination of the latest applications for insurance received in comparison with the earlier ones, which show an increase of nearly $1,500 on average applications, figures of which are as follows:

	Average.
1,000 early applications	$7,431
1,000 intermediate applications	7,851
1,000 recent applications	8,972
Grand average	8,085

The total of 276,341 insurance applications in the Navy July 31, 1918, at this average, makes a total amount of $2,234,216,985 insurance in the Navy.

Of the 345,720 family-allotment applications in the Navy July 31, 1918, approximately 100,000 are "live" allotments. The average allotment per man of these is a few cents over $16, making a total of $1,600,000 per month that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department is paying to Navy dependents on these family allotments.

LOGISTICS AND FUEL DIVISION.

The entry of the United States into war made the development and handling of the fuel problem one of increasingly vital importance to the country at large as well as to the Navy. The increased Navy demands for all classes of fuel and the often diminishing supply, due to many surrounding conditions, such as labor, transportation, etc., have made it necessary that the greatest care be exercised in the solution of the problem. A few luminous examples showing the rise in the demands are:

Bituminous coal: For the fiscal year 1917 the Navy's requirements were approximately 1,200,000 gross tons, while in 1918 the requirements were in excess of 4,000,000 tons, 90 per cent of which was delivered at tidewater points.

Anthracite coal: Three times the Navy's prewar requirements were used in 1918.

Fuel oil: There has been a large increase in the consumption of this fuel and, in 1918, 4,600,000 barrels were handled, over 90 per cent being for delivery at the Atlantic seaboard, this being three times the amount of oil stored in 1917.

Gasoline: Again the requirements treble, and 11,000,000 gallons were delivered at the Atlantic seaboard and Gulf ports, with half a million gallons more on the Pacific coast.

Distillate: 400,000 gallons have been used by the Navy during this past year.

The handling of the Navy's fuel requirements made it necessary to resort to placing allotment orders against various leading suppliers throughout the country on a basis of an equitable share in the total production, great care being exercised to have these allotments represent a proper pro rata of the total production of the companies involved, based upon their percentage of output, proximity to the transportation required, convenience of facilities, etc. The question of the price of coal was fixed in August under Executive announcement and has been modified from time to time to correspond to the increased cost of production of the various districts, the average price during the last half of the fiscal year being approximately $3 per gross ton at mines producing Navy coal.

The problem of Navy coal is further complicated by the fact that high-grade coal only has to be used by the Navy to meet the military requirements. This coal has to be furnished from mines accepted for this purpose after careful inspection and tried experience. Great benefit has been secured to all concerned by the establishment of the Tidewater Coal Exchange, which, for example, permits loading assignments to be handled at any pier in the harbor in question. The equalization of coal credits in the exchange, under the rules laid down, takes care of the distribution between the coal suppliers and mines at interest.

To meet the daily current problem of the storage of coal careful and accurate surveys have been made of all the principal ports, and large Navy storage plants have been constructed at various ports along the coast equipped with the latest and most economical handling and loading devices. These storages, when completed, will represent a capacity of approximately 1,500,000 tons; and in a like manner the reserve storage is being developed for oil and gasoline, in order that ships may be rapidly refueled alongside the pier or in stream.

SUPPLY DIVISION.

During the past year 143,000 requisitions from various sources were handled by this division, covering all possible items of naval stores.

Among the special features developed by the war were the special winter clothing, submarine clothing, and flash-proof clothing. There had been no previous need in the Navy for cold-weather clothing as our fleet has usually spent its winters in southern waters. At the outbreak of the war, however, the need developed, and after consulting British experience, specifications were drawn for winter clothing, which was immediately obtained by Supplies and Accounts, and is now in use on all vessels of the fleet, with spare outfits located at all the supply stations ashore. This clothing consists of two heavy woolen undershirts; two pairs heavy woolen socks; one blanket overshirt; one wind-proof suit with hood; mittens; and heavy arctics; and with this outfit a man on watch can stand the coldest winter blasts.

The submarine clothing is another special item which has received special attention; and the special garment now in use, although being modified from time to time, as experience teaches, has been very satisfactory.

The development of the aviation clothing kept pace with the development of our air fleet, and by the fall of 1917, 1,500 outfits were on hand and many more have since been purchased. These outfits are being changed from time to time as experience proves the necessity.

The radical development of special clothing was the adoption of flash-proof clothing, which protects the men at guns from the danger of sparks and fire. A board specially appointed for the purpose inquired extensively into the matter, and this clothing is now being obtained for use aboard all ships needing it.

An important and little-heard-of function of Supplies and Accounts is the salvage of scrap and condemned material. The sale of garbage, for instance, previously discarded, will, it is estimated, result in ultimate returns this year of at least $100,000. With the cooperation of Yards and Docks utilization is being made of former wood waste to produce heat. The saving is conservatively estimated this year at $300,000. More careful attention is being paid to the reworking, repair, and salvaging of all other scrap materials, and the whole question of salvage is being placed on a modern scientific basis. It is not exaggerating to state the ultimate gain this over last year will be at least $500,000. Not only does this represent a direct dollar-and-cent saving, but it goes further, as it saves the production elements all over the country.

The question of storage in the Navy has taken great strides. The tremendous burden thrown upon it in order to take care of the immense amount of stock needed to supply the fleet and shore establishments at the outbreak of the war meant that storage space must keep pace with the increase in stock. Supplies and Accounts and Yards and Docks, working in closest harmony, show results in the following buildings already completed or near completion:

New York Yard: 11-story building, area 712,900 square feet.
Philadelphia: 7-story building, area 307,900 square feet.
Boston: One 8-story storehouse and one 10-story storehouse adjoining, area 900,000 square feet.
Mare Island: 4-story building, area 128,700 square feet.
Charleston: 4-story building, area 96,600 square feet.
Puget Sound: Nine-story building; area, 287,800 square feet.
New London: Four-story building; area, 57,000 square feet.
Hampton Roads: Six-story building; area, 352,423 square feet.
Newport: Four-story building; area, 59,409 squart feet; cost, $147,833.
Washington: Five-story building; area, 137,500 squart feet; cost, $376,751.

In order to relieve the congestion in the navy yard at Brooklyn and also at Norfolk and to permit the industrial activities of those yards to be properly expanded for repairs of the fleet the supply bases at South Brooklyn and at Jamestown will be developed as the two primary issuing and equipping points for the augmented fleet. Inland storage has been located at Phillipsburg, N. J., immediately across the river from Easton, Pa., from which point bulk supplies will be distributed to the issuing yards and bases along the coast.

Under the explicit direction of the Secretary of the Navy, the development of Navy storage has been rapidly made along the following lines: Permanent storage of sufficient amount to meet the needs of the Regular Navy in peace times, together with such temporary storage as may be necessary at this time to meet war conditions, this being in strict compliance with the Secretary's firm stand not to spend a dollar or use a bit of material or any man power unnecessarily during the war.

OVERSEAS DIVISION.

It will be interesting to note that in all the shipments of Navy stores abroad in naval supply ships or ships consigned to the Navy for this purpose only two vessels have suffered damage, one being torpedoed and the other from fire within. The former vessel did not carry a large cargo, and the greater portion of the cargo of the latter vessel was salvaged. It will be seen that the steady flow of naval supplies abroad to our fleet operating there has been practically uninterrupted.

The shipment of seaplanes—more than 403 to date—has been without mishap.

DISBURSING DIVISION.

As of interest to show the rise in expenditures during the last fiscal year, in July, 1917, Supplies and Accounts paid 5,498 vouchers, amounting to $22,250,000; in June, 1918, 13,202 vouchers were paid, amounting to $62,160,000; and a total disbursement during the fiscal year on 121,931 vouchers amounting to $593,251,526.45—in this one, but largest, disbursing office of the Navy.

The largest part of the accounting efforts of the past year has been required in connection with the purchasing of materials in cases where the determination by the Navy itself of cost and proper compensation has been necessary; i. e., in all cases where, for one reason or another, a fixed-price contract could not be entered into or could not be entered into without investigation and where the product contracted for did not fall under general price agreements controlled by the War Industries Board.

The situation as regards wages, cost of materials, and financing of additional plant capacity has, of course, been such as to make it necessary for many manufacturers to ask for cost-plus contracts; on the other hand, the Navy, in order to avoid the necessity of allowing manufacturers a wide margin for contingencies, has found in many cases that its interests required either a cost-plus contract, with a continuous and careful inspection of costs thereunder, or special investigations of bids and estimates whereby a fair fixed-price contract could be entered into or a fair final price awarded under Navy commandeering orders for manufacture.

In order to meet these conditions a force has been organized, which at the end of the fiscal year included 15 officers and 225 junior accountants and clerks in Supplies and Accounts, and 130 officers and about 2,000 junior accountants and clerks in the field, located throughout the country at about 100 major plants and shipbuilding yards and several score of small ship-repair yards and machine shops.

The activities of this organization have resulted in actual concrete savings to the Navy of $11,000,000, without attempting to estimate what further amounts would have been charged to the Navy had the control exercised by this organization been absent.

This control has been exercised, on the whole, with little friction. The accounting organization has been imbued with the idea that a way must always be found to prevent the Government's money from being wasted without interfering with the expeditious prosecution of the work.

The sphere in which the application of this cardinal principle has been most necessary is in the administration of the cost-plus contracts. Supplies and Accounts has been concerned with the inspection of costs under three general forms of these contracts, which, due to the organization of the Navy Department, have been administered in three separate ways: First, the manufacturing contracts, including guns, airplanes, forgings, special devices, and supplies, aggregating $124,000,000; second, shipbuilding contracts; and, third, the ship-repair contracts, under which have been expended $168,000,000 and $25,000,000, respectively. Payments under public works cost-plus contracts have been made by the disbursing officers upon the certificates of the engineers of the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Other financial matters of unusual complexity which have arisen have included adjustments with the Shipping Board, the War Department, the allies, and private parties on account of charter rates, freight rates, and inventories on cargo vessels and troop transports seized, purchased, or built; adjustments of accounts receivable and payable with the British and French missions and other departments of the Government; foreign exchange matters arising in South America, China, Turkey, and Europe; the shipment of money; the organization of accounting systems for the new Navy plants; development of accounting systems for the naval districts and the naval overseas transportation service, and the meeting of the many new problems arising in navy-yard accounting with respect to cost keeping and the interpretation of legislation and decisions affecting yard labor.

As to the manufacturing contracts, of which there are 71 in force at 47 plants, Supplies and Accounts is able to speak with knowledge of all phases of the problems which have arisen, from the preliminary negotiations with the contractors to the final settlement. It can be said that notwithstanding the obvious objections to cost plus the operations under these contracts have been on the whole satisfactory.

The general weakness of the cost-plus contract from the standpoint of the Government is, of course, the tendency toward lack of interest or effectiveness on the part of the manufacturer in keeping costs down.

As a partial offset to this, wherever practicable, the profit under the contract has been made a lump sum instead of a percentage of cost; in such cases there obviously exists a certain incentive on the part of the manufacturer to turn over the work promptly, and thus cheaply, and realize his profit, since dragging out the work or inflating the cost will not increase his profit, but will merely tie up his plant and capital for a longer period.

Other and more universal methods of control over waste have been exercised. The first is the careful drawing of the contract to exclude expenses not properly chargeable to Government product. The chief of these is a considerable group of charges such as advertising, bad debts, discounts, commissions, etc., in general to be described as selling expenses, which, in fact, as the Government takes up more and more of the capacity of the plant, gradually tend to disappear. A further group of charges embraces those which, while some manufacturers customarily include in overhead, are in reality a proper charge to capital account, such as extraordinary repairs to buildings, etc., or a proper charge to profit and loss or surplus account, such as interest, income, and profits taxes, losses on contracts, excessive salaries, etc.

Further than this, a system of control over methods of purchase and prices of material and plant procured by the contractor has been established; tool rates and depreciation accounts have been examined and wage schedules compared with the rates prevailing in the vicinity. All wage schedules have been submitted to the Secretary of the Navy for approval in conformity with the general labor policies of the Government. Though the high cost of labor is sometimes attributed to the wide vogue of the cost-plus contract it is believed that on the whole it can not fairly be so attributed. It is due rather to general conditions and policies in which the form of contract under which labor is employed is but a minor factor. Apart from the wage element in the high cost of labor there is of course to be considered the question as to whether the day's pay represents a full day's work. Careful attention has been given to this feature of cost inspection and each Navy cost inspector has a force of competent and trustworthy men to cover this matter day and night.

In the light of actual experience much attention has been devoted in the past year to perfecting the cost, profit, and compensation provisions of the standard manufacturing cost-plus contract. Few contracts providing for a percentage profit have been executed; wherever practicable the fixed profit form being used. The lump-sum profit is based on a percentage of the estimated cost of production, frequently with a provision that should the cost of production fall below the estimated cost named in the contract the saving will be divided between the contractor and the department. The percentage of such savings allowed to the contractor ranges from 10 to 50 per cent, according to the closeness with which it was possible to figure the estimated cost. Before including the estimated cost in a contract of this kind examinations of the cost estimates of the contractors were usually made by officers of Supplies and Accounts to determine the reasonableness of the estimate.

Examination of the accounting systems of several hundred commercial concerns has disclosed the unmistakeable fact that nowhere in the country has as much care and study been given to the development of a proper cost-accounting system, with all that that means in control, economy, and efficiency, as has been devoted to the navy-yard system.

During the fiscal year 1918 accounting departments were established at the Naval Aircraft Factory, Philadelphia, and Naval Ordnance Plant, South Charleston, W. Va. The industrial accounting system in use at other industrial navy yards in general was installed in these plants.

A comparison, as indicated below, of the amount of the expenditures and the number of employees at the industrial navy yards in the United States between the fiscal years 1917 and 1918 represents the expansion of the activities of these yards due to the war, and is an index of the increased burden placed on the accounting organizations of the yards:

Portsmouth	$3,928,415	$10,369,423
Boston	7,427,914	22,380,532

Charleston	2,983	4,531
Mare Island	4,219	8,005
Puget Sound	2,496	5,499
Total	47,414	79,253

The increase in statistical data in connection with naval expenditures has been extremely heavy. This increase has been due to the establishment of accounts for new stations and vessels; additional number of supply and disbursing officers rendering returns; and the increased number and value of expenditures for the naval service. During the year approximately 400 additional accounts for stations ashore and 20,000 for vessels have been established.

From March until July 1, 1918, approximately 1,400 contracts were examined and briefed, 1,393 cost schedules prepared, and at the end of the fiscal year there were 913 open contracts on the books. During this period the amount of material thus consigned and accounted for was $42,500,000.

It has been necessary for the Navy to determine freight rates for the transportation on naval vessels of cargo for the allies, other Government departments, and private parties, made necessary by the ocean tonnage situation. The Shipping Board has cooperated in this matter as well as in the matter of making settlements with the owners of the requisitioned vessels for the value of consumable and nonconsumable stores on vessels assigned to the Navy.

Early in the fiscal year the foreign exchange situation in South America made it necessary to obtain authority from the Treasury Department to negotiate and account for bills of exchange at the commercial rate in order not to work a hardship on the officers and men of the Navy by paying them at the mint value, which had been the former practice.

In Great Britain and France the establishment of depositories by the Treasury Department in London and Paris has provided a satisfactory method of taking care of disbursing requirements overseas.

In response to the suggestion of the military governor of Santo Domingo that the fractional currency of the Republic was very scarce and that he believed the prestige of the United States in the island would be greatly enhanced by the use of fractional currency of the United States, licenses for shipment of small coin were obtained from the Federal Reserve Board.

The number of requisitions drawn on the Treasury Department and the amount of money placed to the credit of the Navy disbursing officers are as follows:

Month.	Number of requisitions drawn.	Amount of money withdrawn from Treasury.
July	253	$70,951,500.00
August	224	65,370,500.00
September	215	68,535,000.00
October	222	115,013,000.00
November	255	120,858,000.00
December	282	116,468,500.00
January	294	136,504,500.00
February	238	89,528,700.00
March	334	143,325,000.00
April	302	136,109,000.00
May	305	160,064,899.05
June	333	155,014,227.24
Total	3,257	1,377,742,826.29

The number of public bills paid has been as follows:

July to September	82,957
October to December	115,180
January to March	137,970
April to June	169,892
Total	505,999

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

The service of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department includes supplying guns and their control equipment, together with powder and projectiles, to all ships in the Navy. It also provides, among other things, armor plates for battleships, torpedoes and their launching apparatus, all our naval mines, and the many new devices that have been developed to combat the German submarine.

Because of the vast quantity and variety of material that must be supplied the organization of the bureau is in the nature of a committee of experts.

The work of the past year has largely dealt with an enormous expansion along lines laid down prior to the declaration of war. As early as 1915 plans were drafted in preparation for war, should it come. When the President signed the declaration of war—April 6, 1917—telegrams were dispatched setting in motion the machinery that had previously been prepared, and during the past 17 months the work of the bureau has increased almost 2,000 per cent.

PREWAR EXPENDITURES.

For the two or three years prior to the war the expenditures were in the neighborhood of $30,000,000 a year. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 a period which included about three months of war, they jumped to $108,450,000.

Appropriations for the fiscal year 1918, which cover the period from July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918, reached the enormous total of $585,922,000.

For the current fiscal year—that is, the period from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919—the appropriations already made total $304,210,000.

The bureau operates many ordnance plants and factories, some of which are owned by the Government while others have been requisitioned or are operated under contract or on a "cost-plus percentage of profit" basis. Vast quantities of material are also purchased on contract.

Chief among the plants and stations operated is the naval gun factory, located at Washington, D. C. Since the declaration of war this factory has almost doubled its output, and employs nearly 9,000 men. Fifteen acres of adjoining land have been purchased and six large buildings are nearing completion thereon. The naval gun factory builds many of the guns and by far the greatest amount and variety of the special ordnance equipment for them. It has orders for over 50,000 articles for the Navy on its books now, and it is doing work that private concerns have confessed themselves unwilling to attempt. In addition to the new construction mentioned many of the shifts have been rearranged and enlarged to increase their output.

NAVY POWDER FACTORY.

The Navy powder factory at Indianhead, Md., manufactures powder of the highest grade for use in the big guns, employs 1,100 men, and covers a square mile. Additional buildings and machinery, together with a new generating station, are being erected and installed, and the capacity of this plant is increasing rapidly.

The torpedo station at Newport, R. I., a large plant, is engaged in the manufacture of torpedoes. Its facilities have been increased during the past year.

Numerous ammunition depots located throughout the country prepare the powder charges load and fuse the shell, handle high explosives, and ship the ammunition to vessels in the naval service. Among recent additions to facilities is an automatic-mine-loading plant of great capacity and of new design.

Despite the huge increase in number of guns supplied during the past year and the restricted area and inadequate facilities of the present naval proving grounds, the Bureau of Ordnance has continued to test every gun there, as well as to assign every powder charge, test every lot of shell, fuses, cartridge cases, armor plate, and do all ammunition experimental work.

Congress has very recently authorized the Navy to acquire a large tract of land along the Potomac River a number of miles below the present proving ground on which a new and longer gun range is being laid out. The necessary preliminary work is now going on at a rapid rate, and it is hoped that the proof of our long-range guns at battle ranges on this new proving ground will begin at a very early date.

On June 4, 1917, 180 acres of land were obtained at South Charleston, W. Va., for a projectile plant. The construction of buildings was immediately begun, machinery of the most modern type ordered and installed, and the plant is now in operation. The designs for an armor-plate factory have been entirely completed and much of the machinery is now on order.

In one plant taken over by the bureau manufacturing steel forgings, the output was increased 300 per cent within two months after Government managers were installed. In another plant, manufacturing binoculars and optical instruments, the previous output was about 100 accepted pairs per week. Over 75 per cent of the binoculars made failed to pass inspection tests. Under Navy control the output, without the installation of new equipment or improved machinery, is now nearing 1,000 pairs per week. Practically every pair made passes inspection.

The naval warfare of the enemy has brought many new developments. One of the most important steps taken by the United States was the arming of its merchant steamers as well as the naval auxiliaries, transports, mining vessels, subchasers, etc., following the severing of diplomatic relations with Germany.

The first merchant ship to be armed was the oil tanker Campana. Guns, manned by Navy men, were on board when she sailed on March 12, 1917. The big American passenger liners New York and St. Paul were armed on March 16, the Kroonland and Mongolia on March 19. And continuously, up to the present time, merchant ships, as they have become available, have been armed and provided with Navy gun crews.

GUNS FOR SUBCHASERS.

Guns have likewise been furnished to more than 650 patrol boats, to all our subchasers, to the Army, and many to foreign Governments. These guns vary in caliber from the 14-inch naval guns on British monitors to the 6-pounders on the French fishing fleet. Since the arming of the Campana more than 1,600 vessels have been furnished with batteries, ammunition, spare parts, and auxiliaries—a procedure which had never been contemplated by the department prior to the outbreak of the war.

Constant work has been done in the matter of armor-plate development, and considerable progress made during the past year. The problem of correct amount and location of armor on battleships and battle cruisers has received special attention.

Behind the gun supply there must, of course, be an adequate reserve of ammunition. In spite of the huge increase in the number of guns in service, sufficient ammunition has been provided without delay. Contracts for projectiles were placed in time so that a sufficient reserve was on hand. The call for explosives, however, not only for use in guns but for the many other offensive purposes has far exceeded the capacity of the naval powder factory, and the predetermined quantities necessary to complete the war reserve have been obtained from private factories under contract.

Owing to the great demand from both the Army and the Navy for the standard high explosive, T. N. T., or trinitrotoluol, the bureau has decided to use a new substitute product which promises to be satisfactory and of which an ample supply seems available to supplement the output of T. N. T. and make greater quantities of the latter available for Army use.

MANY INVENTIONS.

The task of combating the German submarine has brought the invention of many new devices. An efficient means of attack against the submarine was found to lay in the use of depth charges, or explosive charges, fitted with a mechanism designed to explode the charge at a predetermined depth below the surface of the water. The force of explosion of a depth charge dropped close to a submarine is sufficient to disable or sink it. An American type of depth charge has been developed and issued in quantity to our forces. A quantity of the British type is being manufactured for that navy.

In addition to the depth charge, smoke-producing apparatus has been provided to enable the ship to conceal herself in a cloud of smoke when attacked by a submarine and thus escape. Several types have been developed and the proper type issued to ships according to the character of the vessel. Vessels having the necessary gun power prefer usually to engage in gun duels rather than escape in a smoke screen.

After a study of the various types of mines in existence, the bureau has developed an American mine operating on an entirely new principle which also comprised the good points of all existing mines. This mine is now being manufactured in quantity, and large numbers are being supplied for use in the war zone and elsewhere.

The ordinary pointed projectile, hitting the water almost horizontally, is deflected and ricochets. Consequently the hull of a submarine below the surface of the water is protected from ordinary shell at short ranges. A special type of nonrichocheting shell, which has been issued to ships sailing in the war zone, was developed early in the year for use against submarines.

SEAPLANE DEVELOPMENT.

As the seaplane is an important means for attacking the submarine, special attention has been given to the development of aircraft devices. The past year has brought the perfection of the nonrecoil gun, and the Lewis gun has been adapted to seaplane use.

Aircraft bombs designed to explode either on impact, if they hit a submarine, or at at a predetermined depth, like the ordinary depth charge, have been developed, and the required quantities are being made. Sights for their accurate aim and improved seaplane cameras have accompanied them.

The first year of war saw the completion of the latest type of naval 16-inch gun throwing a projectile weighing 2,100 pounds. Our newest battleships will mount them. At present our largest battleships mount 14-inch guns, which throw a projectile weighing 1,400 pounds.

In this connection it is interesting to note that broadside weights have tripled in the short space of 20 years. The total weight of steel thrown by a single broadside from the Pennsylvania to-day is 17,508 pounds, while the total weight thrown by the Oregon, the largest ship at the time of the Spanish-American War, was 5,660 pounds.

A 14-inch, 50-caliber gun is 700 inches, or 58⅓ feet long. It weighs, without the mount in which it is supported in the turret of the battleship, nearly 95 tons. Its cost is $118,000.

The program of the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy for 1918–19 is in the nature of further developments along the broad lines laid down in its work during the past year.

The real major accomplishments of the Navy Bureau of Ordnance can not be told, as to do so would disclose important naval operations. Some of these operations are now under way; some only in the planning stage, after acceptance by the allies.

The bureau has conceived and put into execution extensive offensive operations. As is natural it leans to the offensive rather than to the defensive side of warfare. Material of entirely new possibilities for part of these expeditions has been not only originated but designed and produced in the bureau. The bureau can not relate what it is most proud of accomplishing in the time since the war commenced.

The new and frightful methods of warfare practiced by the Huns have not only called for an undreamed of quantity of our principal weapons—guns, shells, and powder—but also for new offensive weapons with which the new conditions of warfare on the seas are being met.

America still lays stress on offensive fighting, and her aim is not merely to equal the weapons of her enemy but to produce new and better ones with which he may be overcome

The arming of more than 650 patrol boats, of hundreds of transports, merchant ships, and naval auxiliaries, as well as the supply of ordnance material to "sub" chasers, the Army, and to foreign governments, has taxed the manufacturing facilities of the bureau.

To meet these demands the Navy has converted large manufacturing plants into gun and shell factories, and where plants were not available for conversion new ones have been built. Since the beginning of the war over 1,600 vessels have been furnished with Navy guns.

To properly provide the Navy with the ordnance material that it needs, the bureau now operates many plants and factories. Among these are:

The Naval Gun Factory, located at Washington, D. C., which, since the beginning of the war, has more than doubled its output and to-day employs 9,000 men.

The Naval Gun Factory builds many of our guns, and an enormous amount of the equipment for them.

The naval powder factory, located at Indianhead, Md., which manufactures powder of the highest grade for use in big guns and which now covers a square mile and employs 1,000 men.

The torpedo station at Newport, R. I.

The output of all these plants, the new sources of supply as well as the old, has been on the whole satisfactory. The majority have made good, and, in consequence, ordnance to supply the rapidly increasing numbers of men and ships in the Navy and merchant marines is keeping pace with the demand and should soon forge ahead, permitting the accumulation of a reserve of ordnance material that the Navy's war policy rightly demands.

Only the salient facts in the field of new naval ordnance can be mentioned, because it is inadvisable to discuss them publicly.

Many of the achievements of which the Navy Bureau of Ordnance is most proud must accordingly be omitted, yet among the new developments, we may mention the new Navy 16-inch gun, the most powerful Navy gun under construction or designed for use at sea as far as it is known, which was successfully tested last April. A howitzer shooting a heavy depth charge fitted to detonate below the water or in contact with a submarine is one of the devices that is aiding in exterminating the U boat.

Although many of the other devices used against the U boat had been developed abroad, partially, if not entirely, before our entry into the war, for a number of reasons it was found to be more advisable to proceed with the design of American types of these weapons that would prove to be more adaptable to American manufacturing methods. In this way an American type of depth charge was designed and is now being produced in quantity.

A large supply of depth charges means that the destroyers may use them without stint, and the chances of a successful attack against a U boat when it is sighted are enormously increased. The supply of depth charges from this country has probably reduced the U boat's sinkings more than any other one cause. Hun prisoners from U boats have stated that German submarine commanders are cautioned that American depth charges explode with great and unusual violence.

Similarly, an American type of mine, operating on an entirely new principle, which is believed to combine all the good points of the foreign mines and to be one of the safest mines in the world to handle, while at the same time a very effective weapon, was developed.

The work in developing this mine and the success attained has been particularly pleasing to the bureau. The output of mines in this country for one single day is now equal to the total output for an entire year before the war. In order to reach this production, manufacture of parts has been undertaken in hundreds of factories throughout the country and a large mine filling and assembling depot has been developed here. In addition, a large final assembling and testing depot has been established abroad. The efficient manner in which this great number of mines is assembled and tested is very impressive.

The enormous demands for explosives for mines, depth charges, and similar purposes showed that a shortage would soon result. Therefore, a new type of explosive, utilizing products not previously used, but available, was sought and adopted by the Navy to help out the situation. A large plant is being built in the West to produce it.

Many of the devices which can merely be briefly named have been developed and are being supplied. Among these are signal rockets and recognition stars, a new and more efficient type of apparatus for producing smoke screens, illuminating projectiles, etc.

Not only has armament for ships of the sea been carefully followed and developed, but armament for airships, seaplanes, was given early attention, and bombs of various types, together with necessary machine guns, large caliber nonrecoil guns, etc., were placed in manufacture and have met the demands of the service. New and improved bomb sights have given much satisfaction. Various training devices for bomb dropping and gunners have been supplied.

It is the policy of the bureau to endeavor to anticipate the needs of the service and to proceed in advance to meet them. In addition, the bureau endeavors to suggest to the Chief of Naval Operations such projects as can be effectively carried out with ordnance material that can be made available.

Accordingly the bureau has conceived and put into operation extensive offensive operations. As is natural it leans to the offensive rather than to the defensive side of warfare. Material of entirely new possibilities for part of these expeditions has been not only originated but designed and produced by the bureau. The bureau can not relate what it is most proud of accomplishing in the time since the war commenced.

BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

Brief summary of work under cognizance of the bureau done since the United States entered the war:

Since the United States entered this war the magnitude of the engineering work of the Navy, both mechanical and electrical, has been, not only in its actual amount but in the rapid development of facilities for its execution, without a parallel for the same period of time in the history of the world's navies.

The reasons for this are manifest in the swift growth of the huge fleet which the Navy now operates for the protection of our coasts from naval attack and of our coastwise shipping from submarines and mines, for guarding the steamer lanes to Europe, for offense against the submarines in British and French waters and in the Mediterranean, and, in conjunction with our allies, for keeping watch and ward over the German high-seas fleet in the North Sea.

It is a truism to say that, both on land and sea, this is very largely an engineering war. Hence, the construction, repair, and supply of this vast aggregation of vessels has been, and is, the work of engineers of all branches within and without the Navy.

SHIPS OPERATED BY THE NAVY.

In battleships, cruisers, gunboats, destroyers, mine ships, submarines, submarine chasers, torpedo boats, and auxiliary ships the Navy is now operating a total of about 570 regular naval vessels.

In addition, it is operating 93 vessels drawn from the Coast Guard, the Lighthouse Service, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Fish Commission.

Further, the Navy is operating a fleet of 937 converted merchant vessels, comprising troop transports, mine sweepers, repair ships, tenders, hospital ships, yachts, tugs, and fishing vessels for distant patrol service, and yachts, tugs, and launches in similar service in the various naval districts on our coasts.

And, finally, it is now operating for the Army and Navy 247 vessels of the naval overseas transportation service, with 112 more to be commissioned shortly.

These various items make a grand total of 1,959 vessels on a naval contribution to date to the allied forces waging the world war.

SHIPS NOW BUILDING.

In navy yards and private plants there are now under actual construction a large number of combatant and auxiliary vessels and tugs for the Navy.

The machinery for these vessels is being built either by the machinery division at navy yards or at private plants under the supervision of inspectors designated by the Bureau of Steam Engineering.

EXTENSION OF PLANTS AT NAVY YARDS.

Very extensive facilities are required for handling the construction and repair work for this vast fleet.

Large extensions of the plants under cognizance of this bureau have been made at virtually all of our navy yards. These extensions are especially noteworthy at the New York, Mare Island, and Puget Sound yards, where provision was made for work of the heaviest character, and also at the Philadelphia and Norfolk yards, where new machine shops and foundries were built.

PRIVATE PLANTS—EXTENSIONS FINANCED BY THE NAVY.

The Navy Department has also expended many millions of dollars on private plants in financing the extension of their shops or in building and equipping shops for wholly new plants.

(a) Thus a plant for constructing turbines was equipped for the General Electric Co. at Erie, Pa.

Also at Erie a new plant was built and equipped to be operated by the Erie Forge & Steel Co., for the production of shafting and gun forgings.

(b) A plant for building turbines was constructed and equipped at Buffalo, N. Y., for the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation.

And, for its subsidiary, the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., a new boiler shop was built at Providence, R. I., and an entirely new machine shop 300 feet long, was built at the Fore River Yard. Also a new machine shop was built for this company at Quincy, Mass.

(c) At the Bath Iron Works the Government financed the enlargement of the shops to expedite the delivery of destroyer machinery.

(d) The shops of the Pollak Machine Co., Cincinnati, were extended for the production of destroyer shafting.

(e) The forge plant of the Allis-Chalmers Co., Milwaukee, has been extended for the production of destroyer and gun forgings, and a heat-treatment plant installed there. Further, at Milwaukee, the plant of the Falk Co. has been enlarged to cut the gears for the reducing gears of destroyers. There are only two firms in this country which can do this work.

(f) In order to provide destroyer propellers, the brass foundry of the Cramp Shipbuilding Co. was enlarged.

(g) For the Union Iron Works, San Francisco, a new shop was erected at Alameda, in order to facilitate the construction of destroyer machinery.

The department has had to equip, in this way, a number of smaller establishments. The entire cost of financing these industries will be about $30,000,000. The general type of contract under which these plant extensions were made, is that the Government equips, and if necessary builds, the shops required. And, after the work ordered by the Government is completed, an appraisal will be held to determine the value, to the company concerned, of this new equipment, the company generally having the option of purchase at this figure.

DISTRICT BASES.

About 18 bases have been established in the various naval districts for the repair and maintenance of all district vessels, such as patrol ships, submarine chasers, destroyers, gunboats, and submarines. These bases have been equipped and supplied by this bureau with all necessary facilities for machinery repairs.

MECHANICAL SCHOOLS.

Numerous schools have been established throughout the country for training mechanics for all classes of vessels and for the Aviation Service. These schools have a complete machinery and hand-tool equipment for this purpose installed by this bureau.

REPAIR OF EX-GERMAN SHIPS DAMAGED BY THE VANDALISM OF THEIR CREWS.

The swift repair of the German ships taken over by this Government forms one of the most striking stories in the history of engineering in our Navy. When war was declared, 103 of these ships of all types were thus taken over, and, of these, practically all were found to have been more or less damaged willfully by their German crews.

In general, the vandalism consisted in breaking main engine cylinders, valves, cylinder heads, steam and exhaust nozzles, and circulating pump casings. One vessel had the connecting and piston rods of the main engines and the stay rods of the boilers sawed nearly through. Several vessels had boilers either ruined or very badly damaged by lighting fires with no water in them.

In addition to remedying this vandalism, extensive repairs were necessary owing to the long period of idleness of these ships and also to the generally run-down condition of the machinery and boilers of many of them.

The grave importance to our Government of their speedy repair is shown by the fact that 20 of the 103 converted to transports can carry about 70,000 troops in one trip.

In about five months, by working day and night, these 20 transports were put in good condition and were in service carrying troops. The repairs were expedited by the fact that the Navy Department put the ships in commission when they were taken over and their crews did much of the work.

The damages were repaired by electric welding, oxyacetylene welding, and by mechanical patching. While the damage was very serious in some cases it was not necessary in any case to renew a cylinder—a fact which redounds greatly to the credit of the welding and the welders.

After the completion of repairs the machinery was subjected to the test required of new machinery, and in addition every vessel was given a 48-hour speed trial to test its machinery throughout. No damaged part which had been thus repaired failed under test. After the speed trial all the vessels were at once placed in service.

Preliminary to the repairs every piece of machinery of the boilers and piping was given a thorough examination in search of vandalism. This work in reality took more time than that required for repairs.

INSPECTION OF ENGINEERING AND OTHER MATERIAL.

This is one of the most important branches of this bureau's work, not only in its own field but for other bureaus.

For example, during the fiscal year 1918 there were inspected—for the Bureau of Steam Engineering and for the Bureaus of Yards and Docks, Supplies and Accounts, Construction and Repair, Ordnance, Navigation, and Medicine and Surgery—a total of 784,427,945 pounds of engineering and other material, of which 97.4 per cent were accepted.

This material was inspected in 2,067 manufacturing establishments by a total force of 306 naval officers and civilian assistants.

RADIO TELEGRAPHY.

All matters relating to radio equipment—design, purchase, installation, maintenance, repair, and replacement—on naval vessels and in United States naval radio stations on shore are—except the actual operation by the radio personnel—directed by the Bureau of Steam Engineering.

Prior to the entrance of the United States into the war the existing naval radio installations afloat and ashore numbered about 305. In the 18 months since then the number has grown enormously and is now between 4,000 and 5,000.

VESSELS.

Thus the radio installations for ships built and under contract are now approximately 4,000. This number includes all vessels of the Navy, combatant and auxiliary, of the Army, and of all other branches of the Government, including the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

SHORE STATIONS.

The radio service on shore has increased to such an extent that this bureau now maintains approximately 210 stations. These include high-power stations to replace the cables, if necessary, for trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific communication; section patrol radio stations, radio service at aircraft stations, radio compass stations, listening-in stations, and the entire chain of commercial radio stations formerly operated by the Marconi and other companies.

TRANS-ATLANTIC COMMUNICATION.

A new United States naval high-power radio station, the most powerful in the world, is now being completed in France for trans-Atlantic communication, under the direction of the Bureau of Steam Engineering.

For similar service the Annapolis high-power station, just completed, is not only the most powerful in the United States but, for the time, in the world.

Four high-power radio stations in the United States—namely, those at Sayville, Tuckerton, New Brunswick, and Marion—have been remodeled and enlarged for trans-Atlantic service.

A high-power radio station is nearing completion at El Cayey, P. R., which can be used for trans-Atlantic service, and will as well insure uninterrupted communication with our West India possessions.

The plans of an additional high-power trans-Atlantic radio station, to be located in the southern part of the United States, are practically completed, and the station has been authorized. Also three radio receiving stations, capable of copying radiograms from European stations, have been developed.

TRANS-PACIFIC COMMUNICATION.

The chain of trans-Pacific radio stations, located on the Pacific coast, in the Hawaiian Islands, and at Cavite, have been improved and enlarged, as have also the intermediate stations at Tutuila and Guam. The Marconi Co.'s high-power trans-Pacific circuit, Bolinas-Marshalls and Kahuku-Koko Head circuits, is maintained in such condition that it can be immediately opened for service if the military situation should require increased facilities for trans-Pacific communication.

AMERICAN MERCHANT VESSELS.

In addition to the radio service on all Government-owned vessels, including those of the United States Shipping Board, this bureau is responsible for the radio equipment on privately owned American merchant vessels requisitioned by the United States Shipping Board. Therefore the radio equipment on practically all vessels flying the American flag is under the direction of this bureau for all matters other than operation and personnel.

RECENT ADVANCES IN RADIO SERVICE DEVELOPED BY THE BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

The use of radio for fire control on ships and aircraft has been developed into a practical service.

The development of the radio compass has progressed to such an extent that this instrument is now of the utmost value, making it possible for ships to determine their position at sea by means of radio, and also to ascertain the location of stations, either on shore or afloat, sending out radio signals. Further, by this instrument enemy secret wireless stations may be located, and as well the position of a submarine using radio.

A system of underground radio reception has been developed, which obviates the use of masts to support overhead antennæ. This is of great value economically and from a military viewpoint.

The distant control of all principal radio stations has been established, thus permitting the sending and receiving of radio signals in the immediate vicinity at the same time.

Cooperation has also been given in the development of the radio telephone transmitter. These instruments are used in large numbers on vessels of the Navy and elsewhere in the naval radio communication system.

SUMMARY.

From this brief review it will be seen that many of the advances in the science of radio communication, particularly for military purposes, are due primarily to the Bureau of Steam Engineering. This is true especially of the bureau's work in this line since the United States entered the war.

AIRPLANE MOTORS.

The marked military advantage to be gained by having but one type of airplane motor prompted the Navy Department to adopt the motor used by the Army. All Liberty motors used by the Navy are, therefore, obtained through the Aircraft Production Board.

About 1,500 of these motors have been delivered and have been assigned to naval air stations in this country and abroad. Since the number of Liberty motors produced has been too small for the needs of the Army alone, it has been necessary for the Navy to purchase others, to the number of about 700, which have been utilized while awaiting a full supply of Liberty motors.

In addition to these, a large number of motors of less power have been bought for use in training planes, all of which have been distributed to the flying schools, the most important of which is at Pensacola, Fla.

BALLOON GAS.

One of the very important duties devolving on the Bureau of Steam Engineering is the equipment and maintenance of stations for the generation of hydrogen for use in dirigible balloons. A number of stations have been established and a full equipment of hydrogen cylinders provided, so that any calls may be promptly met.

It has also been necessary to give suitable training to a number of young officers for this work and to assign them to stations at home and abroad for the proper conduct of these plants.

ELECTRICAL WORK OF THE BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

Communication systems, which are so necessary in the efficient control of gunfire, have, in the ships of the dreadnaught class, been placed in better condition than ever before, and all other vessels, including transports and even merchant ships on which guns for protective purposes have been installed, have been provided with similarly satisfactory systems It was possible to accomplish this because of careful planning prior to the war.

A work of vital importance conducted by this bureau has been that of the development of submarine detection devices. This work is of such a confidential character that it can be only referred to here.

Despite the large number of merchant vessels taken over, all have been provided with the electric signals for day and night use which are so necessary for the efficient and safe handling of ships in company at sea and in making recognition signals.

SOME OF THE DIFFICULTIES ATTENDING NAVAL WAR WORK UNDER PRESSURE.

The great difficulties which have been met in the sudden expansion of our fleet can not be better illustrated than by the story of the obstacles overcome in making provision for the machinery of the 150 destroyers ordered recently.

The act which authorized the construction of these destroyers was dated October 6, 1917, at which time there were building 115 other destroyers, 36 mine sweepers, and 360 submarine chasers. The destroyers under construction were given precedence over all other naval work, and the building yards were fully occupied with them. In order to build the mine sweepers other yards had to be enlisted, none of which cared to take the work, because of the greater profit in building merchant ships. The submarine chasers, being of wood, were placed with wooden-ship builders, while their machinery was allotted to one firm.

It will be seen then that to build the new destroyers new facilities would have to be created, especially as in addition to the absence of available plants there was a lack of enthusiasm among some of the shipbuilders.

Several conferences were held at the Navy Department between shipbuilders and representatives of firms manufacturing boilers, pumps, blowers, forgings, etc. When these first conferences were held the speed contemplated was 28 knots. Subsequently, however, the speed was changed to 35 knots, which change presented a totally different problem so far as the machinery of these vessels was concerned. For example, it meant twice the number of boilers, and with the difficulty then encountered in obtaining boiler tubes the problem as to tubes alone was one of very considerable proportion. However, at a subsequent conference, such assurances were received as to justify proceeding with the 35-knot boats.

The most difficult situation to be met was the one of forgings. For 28 knots we could use solid forgings and utilize facilities which were not available if hollow forgings were required. But two firms could handle the forgings of all sizes that were needed for the 35-knot vessels, and neither of these firms was at all keen to do any of this work.

In fact great difficulty had been experienced in getting one of them to furnish forgings for destroyers which were then under contract, and it was only after much persuasion that they were finally prevailed upon to proceed with this work. They preferred to make ordnance forgings, as did the other firm, the former having been designated for work of that character for the Navy, the latter for the Army.

In view of all this it was clear that the new program demanded a large increase in the forging facilities of this country if the destroyers were to be built—as was contemplated—within 18 months.

ALLOTMENT OF DESTROYERS.

The shipyards were filled with work not only for the Navy but for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and questions of priority had to be decided as to how far one class of work should be given preference. After several conferences with shipbuilders it was decided to allot 20 destroyers to Newport News, 20 to the New York Shipbuilding Co., 25 to Cramp's, and 85 to the Bethlehem Corporation as represented by Fore River and the Union Iron Works.

BUILDING A SHIPYARD ON A "GOOD SWAMP."

To build the hulls it was necessary for Fore River to create a new shipyard. A plat of land—which the builder termed "a good swamp"—was selected at Squantum Point, near Boston, and work was begun on the new shipyard as soon as Congress authorized the construction of the vessels. In order to provide for the transport of men and material to the "swamp" a creek had to be bridged and a branch trolley line built from Boston to the works.

BUILDING OR EXTENDING AND EQUIPPING SHOPS FOR THE PROPELLING MACHINERY.

The shop at Fore River could take the machinery for but a few of the 45 destroyers at Squantum. So it became necessary to build a shop for the manufacture of turbines and another for building boilers. The former was constructed at Buffalo, the latter at Providence. Both are now in operation. The Buffalo shop has no foundry, and the work of making turbine castings has therefore been distributed among a number of large foundries having good shipping connections with Buffalo.

In the case of the Union Iron Works a new shop was erected at Alameda in order to facilitate the construction of destroyers already under contract, and it was hoped that this shop would also be able to handle the machinery for the additional 40 ordered from the Union Works.

But it early became apparent that the bureau could not depend on this source of supply. So a contract was entered into with the General Electric Co., who were then building a new shop at Erie, Pa., to convert this into a special shop for manufacturing turbines for the destroyers at the Union Iron Works.

The order for this conversion was given 10 days before Congress authorized the construction of the destroyers. Under the terms of the contract the Government equips the shops, and after the completion of the contract an appraisal will be held to determine the value to the General Electric Co. of the equipment that has been installed. (This it may be said is a type of the contracts that have generally been entered into in such cases.) It was also found necessary to rent the old Risdon Iron Works at San Francisco and incorporate it as a part of the Union Iron Works, and, further, to launch submarines at Union in advance of the date contemplated in order to make room for the new destroyers.

For the destroyers building at Newport News and the New York Shipbuilding Co. contracts for the machinery have been let to the Westinghouse Co., who have sublet the most important portion of the work to the Allis-Chalmers Co., of Milwaukee. The combined facilities of these two large companies should produce the machinery within the time desired.

The case of Newport News was much more difficult. Even with the destroyers previously contracted for, it had been necessary for them to place contracts for the principal machinery with different establishments, chiefly in the Middle West, and it was only after many conferences and much discussion that satisfactory arrangements could be made to have castings from one place and their machining done in three others.

As to the Bath Iron Works, while they could not take any of the new program, it was found necessary for the Government to finance the enlargement of their shop in order to expedite the delivery of destroyers that had been already allotted to them. The same was true of a number of the older building firms. In connection with this, a notable piece of work was performed at Fore River by building an entire new machine shop, about 300 feet long, and having it under roof in a little more than a month. It was also necessary for the Navy to double-track the trolley road from Quincy to Fore River in order to facilitate the transport of employees who had almost doubled in number.

BOILERS.

While Fore River will build at Providence all of the boilers for the 45 destroyers they have under contract, those for the Union Iron Works will be built in San Francisco, and those for the other firms by the Babcock & Wilcox Co. To accomplish this and to deliver at the rate of five boats a month, it was necessary for the Babcock & Wilcox Co. to greatly enlarge their facilities. This in turn brought many difficulties which could not be foreseen and made necessary the manufacture, in their own works, of certain machine tools required for the production of their boilers. It also necessitated doing a considerable part of this work at Barberton, Ohio.

PUMPS.

As to pumps, it was found that all builders were so crowded with orders that it would be impossible to get the pumps required unless the Government enlarged existing plants. The Blake & Knowles Pump Works seemed to offer the best source of supply, and accordingly this establishment in East Cambridge, Mass., was almost entirely remodeled for the manufacture of pumps for all of the 150 destroyers.

BLOWERS, EVAPORATORS, AND DISTILLERS.

It was necessary to divide the orders for the blowers, giving the Terry Turbine Co. 45 sets and the Sturtevant Works the remaining 105 sets. Evaporators and distillers are being built by the Griscom-Russell Co.

PROPELLERS.

The propellers for the destroyers were allotted to the Cramp's foundry, which was enlarged to care for this work.

TURBINES FOR THE CRAMP DESTROYERS.

In order to manufacture the turbines for the Cramp destroyers it become necessary to buy outright the works of the De La Vergne Machine Co., New York City. This purchase was made by the Cramp Co., acting as agent for the Navy Department. Upon completion of their contract the Cramp's will be given the option of purchasing the plant or vacating it.

TURBINE REDUCTION GEARS.

There were only two firms in this country who could cut the gears for the turbines building by the Cramp and Fore River companies.

These firms were the De Laval Steam Turbine Co., of Trenton, and the Falk Co., of Milwaukee. The De Laval Co. could take care of Cramp's destroyers without difficulty, but the Falk Co. had already so many orders that it became necessary to enlarge their plant, which was done.

EQUIPMENT OF OTHER ESTABLISHMENTS.

The Navy Department was compelled to equip smaller establishments in order to enable them to produce the material desired. Some of these were: The Edwards Valve Co. for the manufacture of globe and angle valves, the Chapman Valve Co. for gate valves, and the Consolidated Safety Valve Co. for the manufacture of safety valves. This latter company has the entire order for the 150 destroyers.

Another firm in the Middle West which it was necessary for the Navy to finance is the Wellman-Seaver-Morgan Co., which is manufacturing many of the condensers and a great deal of sheet-metal work for the Newport News, Cramp, and New York ship destroyers.

BOILER AND CONDENSER TUBES.

The question of the supply of boiler tubes was one which for a year or more had given much uneasiness, since prior to the war there was only one firm on whom the Navy could rely for furnishing them.

After war was declared, however, other firms were brought into line, and a schedule established for tube deliveries, so that there was no delay in this respect for the earlier destroyers.

A similar schedule was formulated for the later destroyers, and the tubes have come—and doubtless will come—along as required. To do this several of the larger mills have practically doubled their production of small tubes in order to meet the demands of this country and our allies.

A similar situation obtains with regard to condenser tubes.

FORGINGS.

Because of the conditions referred to previously and the manufacture of 14-inch gun forgings, it was clear that the new destroyers could not be built unless an enormous increase was made in the forging facilities of the country.

Accordingly the Navy Department entered into a contract with the Erie Forge & Steel Co., Erie, Pa., whereby that plant is to be increased to a capacity adequate to handle the largest forgings that will be required for the destroyers and also to manufacture gun forgings for the Bureau of Ordnance.

Lesser extensions were also financed at the forge plant of the Allis-Chalmers Co., Milwaukee; at the Pollak Steel Co., Cincinnati; and at the Camden Forge Co., Camden, N. J.

MACHINE-TOOL SITUATION.

The question of machine-tool supply is one which has acted adversely, to some extent, as to competition in destroyer building. Certain classes of machine tools are very hard to get, and questions of priority are continually arising between the War and Navy Departments regarding the production of such tools. It has happened in more than one case that where the Navy Department has secured priority, the War Department came in and issued a commandeer order for the same tools. In most cases the commandeer order has been rescinded and the Navy Department tools have retained their original priority.

FUEL SITUATION.

The fuel situation put another obstacle in the path of rapid destroyer construction. For, while last winter exemption was granted to the shipyards and to the principal manufacturers concerned in destroyer building, a large number of smaller establishments, whose product is necessary for the completion of these vessels, were denied exemption.

SUMMARY.

On the whole, however, the shipbuilders, with a most commendable spirit, are doing all they can to meet the dates contemplated when the order for these destroyers was placed.

A striking evidence of this is that the yard at Squantum will probably deliver its first destroyer within a year of the date when Congress authorized its construction—and this speedy delivery comes from a yard which at that time was merely "a good swamp."

COST OF FINANCING.

The entire cost to the Navy of financing these industries was estimated at $30,000,000.

Including its allotment from the sums appropriated for increase of the Navy, the average expenditures of the Bureau of Steam Engineering are, at this time, nearly three-quarters of a million dollars per day.

In closing this brief review of the chief features of its work—of its vast responsibilities and the huge effort required to meet them adequately in war—the bureau feels that its staff in the Navy Department and elsewhere, the engineering forces at our navy yards and repair bases, and on our naval vessels, and finally the many skilled executives and the thousands of highly trained mechanics who, in industrial establishments have aided in this work, have all done their full share in writing in fadeless letters the epic of engineering on the dark pages of the history of this war.

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

On April 1, 1917, there were building and authorized for the Navy the following vessels:

Battleships	12
Battle cruisers	5
Scout cruisers	7
Destroyers	27
Submarines	61
Fuel ships	2
Supply ship	1
Transport	1
Gunboat	1
Hospital ship	1
Ammunition ship	1

Since the declaration of war the following vessels have been contracted for or ordered built at navy yards:

Destroyers	253
Submarines	58
Mine sweepers	54
Sea-going tugs	27
Harbor tugs	46
Fabricated patrol vessels	112
Submarine chasers	447

Some of these may be turned over to our allies.

Since the declaration of war the following vessels have been added to the Navy:

Battleships	2
Destroyers	30
Submarines	25
Mine sweepers	12
Supply ship	1
Transport	1
Submarine chasers (including 100 for allies)	405

In addition to the above, 36 interned German ships have been repaired and fitted for service; about 1,000 privately owned vessels (including 83 Dutch ships) have been purchased or chartered and have been or are being fitted for naval use, and orders are out to commission 112 more when they have been completed; about 107 vessels have been turned over to the Navy by other Government departments. Of the above-mentioned vessels about 740 have been put into naval service proper, including offshore and inshore patrol work, troop-transport duty, fleet fueling or provisioning, hospital, and other service, and about 300 have been put into naval overseas transportation service.

In addition to the preparation of designs for new destroyers, submarine chasers, mine sweepers, designs have been prepared by the Navy Department for various other types of vessels. One of the most important of the new designs that have been produced is that for the 200-foot fabricated patrol vessels, Eagle class, which are being built by Mr. Henry Ford in Detroit, and as many of these will be rapidly built as may be needed. In addition to the designs for naval vessels proper, the Navy Department has, in cooperation with the Emergency Fleet Corporation of the Shipping Board, prepared a number of designs for merchant vessels.

Owing to the restricted passages, the knapsack type of gas mask used by the Army can not be used on board ship. The Navy Department has developed a gas mask of superior type and has issued several thousand masks to the service. At present work is progressing rapidly on an order of several hundred thousand gas masks for the naval personnel.

The Navy Department has a building program of approximately 1,000 small pulling and power boats for its own vessels. In addition to boats for naval use proper, there are now under way 6,000 boats to be issued to vessels building by the Emergency Fleet Corporation and turned over to the Navy to operate. This small boat work is being proceeded with to the utmost practicable extent at the navy yards of the country, and most gratifying progress is being made. All naval vessels operating in the war zone are equipped with boat or life-raft capacity sufficient for every person on board. The Navy has also obtained large numbers of life preservers of an improved type and is issuing them to vessels in such numbers as to provide one for each officer and man on board.

The Navy has arranged for the installation on all naval vessels of mine-sweeping appliances. These appliances are being produced in large quantities; and vesels, both naval and commercial, are being equipped most expeditiously. There is already at least one definitely established instance of the saving of a large United States battleship as a result of the installation of this type of protective device. In close cooperation with the Emergency Fleet Corporation vessels building for the corporation are also being fitted with this device.

Numerous experiments have been carried out by the Navy Department in connection with protective camouflage painting of vessels, and a definite system of camouflage has been adopted. At present, in active cooperation with the Emergency Fleet Corporation, all vessels entering the war zone are camouflage painted.

The department has designed, built, and equipped at the navy yard, Philadelphia, a factory for producing naval aircraft. This factory has been delivering planes since April of the present year. In January last it was decided to quadruple the capacity of the naval aircraft factory. The expansion is now nearing completion, and the present capacity of the aircraft factory is about 50 seaplanes of the largest size per month, and will, it is expected, eventually reach a capacity of 95 seaplanes of the largest size per month.

In connection with the destroyer-building program authorized by the Navy act October 6, 1917, the utmost dispatch in construction was directed. This act authorized an expenditure of $350,000,000, not only for the destroyers but for plants to build them and for each and every purpose connected therewith. Unusual commandeering authority was also included in the act in order to enable the work to be pushed to the utmost. Preliminary work had already been done in this connection so that the Navy Department was ready to act at once. On October 9, three days after the passage of the act, orders were given to the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation to erect at Squantum, Mass., a plant specially designed for the rapid construction of destroyers, a large number of destroyers being assigned to be built there. In addition, and as virtually a part of the same undertaking, a large plant was directed built at Buffalo, N. Y., adapted to turn out destroyer machinery and turbines, and a plant was undertaken at Providence, R. I., for the special purpose of building boilers for destroyers. These projects were all pushed as fast as possible, being hampered somewhat by the exceptional winter of 1917–18.

The plant at Squantum consists of 10 building slips, 3 double wet slips, assembly shop, plate and angle shop, angle-smith shop, and galvanizing shop under one roof, the total area covered being approximately 790,000 square feet, or 18 acres. In addition there are necessary storehouses and other incidental establishments. It was necessary to build this plant and fit it with machinery. Even before it was completed, it was possible to begin work in part of it, the first work on destroyer material being done on January 14, 1918, when the first keel plate was punched for rivet holes. On April 20 a large amount of destroyer material had been fabricated, and on this date keels were laid for five destroyers, the first one being named the Delphy. This was the first vessel launched from the plant on July 18, and she is now nearly completed, so that she will be turned over to the Government probably within a year of the day when the order was given to convert the swampy, low-lying expanse of land at Squantum Point into a plant for destroyer building. There are now over 6,000 men employed at Squantum, and the force is being steadily increased until there will be between 8,000 and 9,000 engaged in destroyer building only. The turbine-building plant at Buffalo and the boiler-building plant at Providence are also now in full operation.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

EMERGENCY HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION.

Hospital accommodations have had to be greatly augmented with the increase in personnel for war operations. Emergency hospital units have been constructed in the neighborhood of the cantonments and temporary emergency wards on grounds adjacent to the permanent Navy hospitals.

The buildings have been in general of wood frame construction, one story in height. In Norfolk, Va., and in New York, where two-story buildings are built and where the fire hazards are unusually bad, terra-cotta walls have been used at an increase of about 15 per cent to 20 per cent over wood frame.

About 6,000 additional beds have been provided to meet the immediate needs of the war conditions, and, roughly speaking, 6,000 more beds are being provided for under present contracts or under contracts about to be awarded. The beds are provided for at 25 stations covering the east coast, south coast, and west coast.

For overseas the bureau has provided 190 portable buildings for hospital work and has completed hospital groups at several foreign stations.

SUMMARY.

The bureau has received appropriations from Congress for hospital construction amounting to $16,045,000, from which have been provided at 25 stations approximately:

Patients' beds	12,085
Additional personnel	4,900
Total	16,985

AVIATION CONSTRUCTION.

On the outbreak of the war the only air station in operation in this country was the one at Pensacola, Fla. Immediately upon the declaration of hostilities plans for new stations were drawn, and in May of 1917 actual construction started. Since that time 11 large additional stations have been put in operation, and also a number at strategic points, to assist in efficient patrol work. These stations, including additional work recently authorized and now under way, involve the expenditure of $15,000,000 and provide accommodations for upward of 9,000 men and 400 officers. In addition thereto work is just started at the site of the new station on the Gulf, the initial cost of which will run to $1,200,000, providing for 600 men and 70 officers.

Kite-balloon stations are being provided, one each in the first, third, and sixth naval districts and two in the fifth naval district, involving an expenditure of $500,000.

The bureau is as well supplying plans, hangars, and portable buildings for construction by the Canadian Government.

For the manufacture of aeroplanes there has been provided in the navy yard at Philadelphia the naval aircraft factory, the original installation involving the expenditure of approximately $1,000,000, the contract for which was let on September 15, 1917, and the work contemplated therein completed by November 28, 1917. In February of this year a contract was let for the extension of this factory, involving an expenditure of $2,850,000, providing not only for vastly increased factory space but, as well, a six-story concrete storage building and three-story office and laboratory structure. The office building is occupied as well as a portion of the factory building, and the concrete storehouse is approaching completion.

Additional storehouses for the reception of aircraft parts and materials have been provided at South Brooklyn, N. Y., and Gloucester, Mass. The original contract for storehouse at New York was let on December 5, 1917, and completed on March 10, 1918, the cost being approximately $300,000. Since that time need for further space has developed, and an additional building, practically doubling the capacity of the original structure, has been started under contract dated July 18, due for completion December 17, the cost involved being $362,000. At Gloucester there has been rented a tract of property with buildings already constructed, suitable in large measure for the Navy's use, and they are at this time being prepared for the reception of aircraft material.

A DESCRIPTION OF NAVAL TRAINING CAMPS.

Naval training camps, varying in capacity from 500 men to 45,000 men, have been completed and others are in progress of construction or have been authorized for construction.

Expansion has recently become necessary because of the large number of vessels the Navy has been called upon to man, the increased number of armed guard crews, and the greatly expanded aviation activities.

The design of a complete naval training camp is complex and involves first the special design of the individual buildings such as barracks, mess halls, latrines, instruction buildings, dispensaries, drill halls, recreation buildings, isolation buildings, laundries, power plants, storehouses, refrigeration buildings, bakeries, incinerators, guardhouses, and fire houses; and second, the grouping of these buildings in such a manner as to make a comprehensive plan of the military and naval organization. In conjunction with the planning of camps, topography, drainage, water supply, sewerage, roads, street lighting, and fire protection are important considerations.

Each camp generally has the following major divisions: Administration group, incoming isolation group, outgoing isolation group, main regimental groups, commissary group, educational and recreation group, and service group.

The administration group occupies generally a central situation. Building or buildings for office administration are provided, with subdivisions for executive and general offices. These offices are equipped with desks, chairs, tables, filing cabinets, typewriters, adding machines, and stationery. In a word, they are completely equipped offices. Buildings containing officers' quarters (which are completely furnished and provided with a single bed or cot, mattress, chiffonier, chair, and mirror), officers' mess and kitchen, post office, canteen, petty officers' quarters, armory, wireless and telephone central, make up the administration group.

The incoming and outgoing isolation groups are usually divided to provide for the incoming and outgoing of recruits, who are held under observation here for 21 days upon arriving and 21 days before departing. When new men arrive at camp they enter the receiving building, where their civilian clothes are disinfected and where they are bathed, given a shave and hair cut, examined, vaccinated, inoculated, and fitted out with their service uniforms. The exit of this building is the incoming probation camp. In both the incoming and outgoing probation camps men sleep in barracks housing 24 men in groups of 12 at each end. Each 12 men are provided with a separate dormitory, mess room, latrine, and serving pantry, all under one roof. Each serving pantry is provided with food by vacuum food carriers distributed from a central probation kitchen by special food trucks. The dishes never leave the building, but are sterilized in each serving pantry. There is a central laundry provided where soiled clothes for each man are brought in a laundry bag and sterilized before being laundered. The isolation camp is provided with a dispensary, officers' quarters, and brig similar to those described hereinafter for the main regimental group. The probation camp is surrounded by a double row of high barbed wire, electrically lighted fencing. Between the rows of fencing is a zone about 10 feet wide to prevent passing anything into the camp from the outside.

The main regimental group is composed of barracks housing men in groups from 54 to 144. The men sleep on mattresses or in hammocks supported by iron pipes. Outside a pipe rail is provided, and it is required that the hammocks be aired there daily in clear weather. Large comfortable latrines are provided, with cement floors. Substantial water-closets, urinals, and ample showers are provided with both hot and cold water. Buildings with scrub decks for washing clothes and hammocks in the same manner as is required of seamen on shipboard are provided. Clotheslines are provided immediately outside the wash houses arranged as similar as possible with racks and blocks as is done on shipboard. There is a dispensary for each regimental unit of 1,000 men. It is provided with 22 beds, a record room, doctor's room, examining room, dental room, pharmacist's room, room for venereal diseases, and adequate toilets. There are in many camps for every 5,000 drill halls approximately 600 feet long, with a span of 100 feet in width and an armory for the stacking of guns and repairs of same. The mess halls are large, airy rooms with cement floors and sanitary bases. The mess halls are equipped with tables and benches and a full equipment of mess gear, such as knives, forks, spoons, dishes, sugar bowls, water pitchers, drinking glasses, and serving trays. The kitchens are large, well-ventilated rooms, the walls of which are painted with washable paint. Kitchens are equipped with double steam kettles and large urns for coffee and tea. There are coal ranges with ovens for roasting or baking. There is also provided an electric potato parer, electric meat chopper, butcher's block, and steam tables and dish warmers. Each kitchen has a refrigerating storage room, a vegetable preparation room, and a storeroom. Large sculleries are provided and equipped with dish-washing machines. A dock is provided for small boats, equipped with float and gangway. Davits for the lowering and raising of boats are also provided as well as a boathouse for suitable storage of boats.

The hospital group has a centrally located and completely furnished administration building similar to that described hereinbefore, with ample provision for the doctor, nurses, and hospital corps, as to sleeping quarters and messing facilities. The hospital has accommodation for between 4 and 5 per cent of the main camp, and is thoroughly equipped with wards, operating pavilion, subsistence facilities, quarters for officers, nurses, hospital corps, and civilians, laundry, heating plant, garage, storehouse, brig, and mortuary and laboratory facilities. The buildings are lighted by electricity, heated generally by steam, completely supplied with hot and cold running water, and have adequate sewerage systems. Complete kitchen and laundry equipments are installed, including provisions for disinfection, sterilizing, and incineration. Operating facilities are available at all stations.

The commissary group contains storehouses, refrigerator building, bakery and general stores buildings for food supplies, clothing, and camp equipment of any kind. The bakery building is provided with modern ovens, electric kneading and mixing machines, and in connection with it there is a storeroom for flour, a room that is warmed for the proper raising of bread, and a room where it can be quickly cooled and stored.

The educational and recreation group contains adequate buildings properly equipped for their various purposes. In this group are an electrical school, a general school, commissary school, rigging school, carpentry school, yeomen school, music school, swimming schools, a stewards' school, radio school, and officers' school. There are also recreation buildings for moving pictures or entertainments. The Young Men's Christian Association and the Knights of Columbus usually provide reading and writing rooms as required.

The service group has buildings for fire house and garage, blacksmith shop, carpenter shop, electrical shop, tailor shop, paint shop, and other shops incidental to the upkeep of a large camp.

MISCELLANEOUS BUILDINGS.

In this group are the central power house, coal-handling apparatus, sewerage disposal, garbage incinerator, and other service buildings.

FIRE-ALARM SYSTEM.

Fire-fighting apparatus similar to that used in well organized communities is installed in each camp upon completion. Adequate water supply and hydrants will be installed for this purpose. In addition to this, buildings will be protected with hand grenades, pyrenes, chemical hand engines, fire pails, and other ready extinguishers. Well-drilled fire-fighting squads will be organized into a fire department.

GENERAL TYPE OF CONSTRUCTION.

Where concrete floors are used, such as in latrine buildings, kitchens, and mess halls, the foundations consist of concrete trench walls; generally, however, foundations consist of timber posts set on concrete footings. The sills, floors, and beams are of wood, and the floors laid double with waterproof paper between. The walls are sheathed inside with matched boards or a thickness of tar paper to prevent the entrance of vermin. The outside walls consist of seven-eighths-inch sheathing, a layer of tar paper, and drop siding of vertical boards and battens. The roofs are sheathed solid and covered in the main camps with green slate surfaced ready to lay roofing. In all the living quarters steam radiators are set somewhat above the floor and the outside walls provided with an opening fitted with shutters so as to regulate the amount of fresh air that can be introduced and warmed as it passes around the radiator. In the ceilings adjustable openings are provided so as to draw this air across the room, where it is exhausted from the top of the building.

PAINTING.

All the hospital interior walls are painted with flat-wall washable paint, and usually the sleeping quarters are painted or finished inside with a coat of barium varnish. The exterior walls of all buildings throughout the camp are painted with a standard olive-green beaver paint.

LIGHTING.

Buildings and grounds are lighted with electricity and so arranged that the master at arms in making his rounds at the proper time can regulate the lighting from the outside of each building. Roads and walks are amply lighted from poles; boundary line fencing is provided with flood lighting.

OTHER SERVICES.

Adequate sewers and sewage disposal, water supply and filtration, and garbage incinerators are provided.

ROADS.

Service roads of concrete are laid and each building is provided with either cement or wooden walks, so that one can pass from any one building to another in the camp without leaving the walks or roads.

NUMBER OF MEN ACCOMMODATED AND COST.

The camps already constructed provide winter accommodations for 145,000 men. Camps under construction or authorized for construction will provide winter accommodations for 53,000 men. The total number of men provided for when the work under construction and authorized is completed will be 198,000 men.

Naval training camps completed, under construction, and authorized for construction will cost about $57,000,000.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1918.

UNITED STATES NAVAL ORDNANCE PLANT, SOUTH CHARLESTON, W. VA.

The United States Naval Ordnance Plant, South Charleston, W. Va., is a combination of the two plants known as the Projectile Plant and the Armor Plant. In August, 1917, contracts for the construction of that portion of the plant originally known as the Projectile Plant were let and construction work begun almost immediately. During construction plans were modified to permit of the manufacture of light gun forgings. Construction work for this portion of the plant is now complete and the manufacture of steel was begun in June, 1918.

Plans for that portion of the plant originally known as the Armor Plant are practically complete and construction work has already begun. This work is being pushed as rapidly as possible, and it is thought that the manufacture of steel may be begun in August, 1919.

Five submarine bases have been authorized, at an expenditure involving over $5,000,000. In addition thereto there have been provided in this country over 60 section bases or repair points, where scout patrol and other vessels may resort for repairs and supplies. This work involves an ultimate expenditure of nearly $2,500,000.

MEMORANDUM ON NAVAL PROVING GROUND, INDIANHEAD, MD.

A vast amount of construction has been completed and is under way at the naval proving ground, Indianhead, to assure the proposed doubling of the output of powder contemplated by the Bureau of Ordnance. Among the regular items may be cited the Navy nitrate plant, for which Congress has already provided in excess of $9,000,000. And quite as important as any other feature is the railroad connection now under way from White Plains, Md., to the proving ground reservation which will give direct railroad connection and assure proper transportation facilities, from the lack of which the proving ground has suffered in the past, it being wholly dependent on water transportation. For this latter item, $850,000 is required.

ORDNANCE STORAGE.

For the storage of ordnance more than 250 buildings have been provided at a cost of approximately $7,500,000. This construction will provide ample space for the storage of the Navy's increased program in the production of the ordnance supplies. All of this work, except about 60 buildings, contracts for which have been let this spring and summer, is completed. The remaining buildings will be completed in ample time for the need.

IMPROVEMENTS AT NAVY YARDS.

Shipbuilding facilities and improvements for the construction of ships at the different navy yards have been made or are being made as follows:

Portsmouth: Improvements of this yard consist mainly of equipping the yard for the construction of additional submarines, the projects being construction of additional building ways and the rearrangement and extension of shop buildings and equipment, such as foundry, machine shop, and cranes.

Boston: Yard is equipped for the construction of auxiliaries and improvements consist mainly of rearrangement of equipment and extension of shops and building ways.

New York: Improvements at this yard, which is already equipped for the construction of battleships, consist principally of equipping the yard for the construction of additional battleships. The principal improvements are a shipbuilding slip for the construction of battleships; a new structural shop 200 by 576 feet, which will be completed by early spring, extension to existing machine shop. All necessary equipment for these projects, including heating and lighting cranes, and mechanical equipment and other accessories, are included in the improvements.

Philadelphia: This yard, already equipped for the construction of auxiliaries, is being equipped for the construction of battleships and battle cruisers. The principal features of the improvements are one building slip 700 feet long for battleship construction, and one 900 feet long for battle-cruiser construction; structural shop, 300 by 700 feet; foundry, 180 by 648 feet, with material yard; machine-shop extension, 130 by 325 feet; central power plant, with distributing system, etc.; galvanizing plant; oxygen, hydrogen, acetylene generating plant; fitting-out pier, 100 by 1,000 feet, including foundations for a 350-gross-ton crane. All of these above improvements, with the exception of the 350-ton crane, will be completed this year.

Norfolk: The Norfolk yard, already equipped for the construction of destroyers, is being equipped for the construction of battleships. The principal features of the improvements are a shipbuilding slip 700 feet long for battleship construction; structural shop 300 by 700 feet; foundry 180 by 408 feet, with material yard; machine shop 130 by 600 feet; central power plant; fitting-out pier 100 by 1,000 feet, including foundations for 350 gross-ton crane. The yard force is at work on a railroad, street, and sewer connections, and the completion of all of these projects with the exception of the 350-ton crane is scheduled for this year.

Charleston: This yard, already equipped for the construction of destroyers or small auxiliaries, is being equipped for the construction of additional destroyers. The most important improvements are three additional building slips for destroyers and three reinforced-concrete buildings for pattern shop, public works building, and machinists' mate school. The other improvements consist of minor extensions. The construction of destroyer ways are being carried out by yard labor.

Mare Island: The Mare Island yard, already equipped for the construction of destroyers and battleships, is being equipped for the construction of additional destroyers and larger battleships. The principal features, which have been or will be completed this year, are additional double ways for destroyers, extension of battleship ways for 700-foot ships, machine shop extension and accessory shop. At the present time bids have been received for the construction of a structural shop group to cost approximately $2,000,000.

Puget Sound: This yard, formerly equipped for the construction of submarines only, is being equipped for the construction of auxiliaries, battle cruisers, or battleships, and for mine sweepers or destroyers. The main features are a shipbuilding slip of dry-dock type 130 by 950 feet, served by traveling hammer-head cranes; accessory shop and yard improvements; also timber ways for two mine-sweeper tugs in tandem or four single destroyers. All projects are due for completion by the end of this year.

STORAGE FACILITIES AT NAVY YARDS.

Allotments have been made for storage facilities at the following yards:

Boston, $500,000; New York, $1,200,000; Philadelphia, $500,000; Norfolk, $800,000; Mare Island, $250,000; Charleston, $225,000; Puget Sound, $500,000; Pearl Harbor, $100,000; and for miscellaneous and temporary storehouses, $100,000. In addition, funds have become available for the following items:

General storehouse, New London, Conn	$120,000
General storehouse, Newport, R. I	148,000
General storehouse, Washington Navy Yard	400,000
Medical supply depot, Brooklyn, N. Y	200,000
Medical supply depot, Mare Island, Cal	125,000

These structures have been designed uniformly with previous structures and in accordance with the revised bureau code. All storehouses are now under contract or have been completed. The storehouses at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Mare Island are completed and in use and the others well under way. The New York building is the largest of its kind in the world. It is 11 stories high, 180 feet wide, and 360 feet long, without courts, and contains 712,000 square feet of floor area. It was constructed in record time by the Turner Construction Co., of New York City. Contract was awarded April 21, 1917, work on the site was started May 21, 1917, and the building completed December 13, 1917. Three thousand seven hundred and seventy-six Raymond concrete piles were used, averaging about 23 feet in length.

In addition to the above, increased storehouse facilities are being provided at Boston; a new storehouse at Philadelphia; a coal-storage plant at Hampton Roads has been completed; storehouses are under way at Newport, Philadelphia, and Norfolk. In addition, facilities for the storage of lumber, steel, and boats are receiving the specific attention of the bureau.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1918.

FUEL-OIL STORAGE.

Contracts have been awarded to provide storage for approximately 50,000,000 gallons of fuel oil, at the cost of $3,850,000. Information relative to these projects follows:

Melville, R. I.: Five million gallons' storage in concrete reservoirs; contract awarded August, 1917. Work now approximately completed. Actual cost, approximately $365,000.

Guantanamo, Cuba: Six million gallons' storage; contract awarded April, 1917. Work now approximately completed. Approximate cost, $530,000.

Pearl Harbor: Six million gallons' storage; contract awarded November, 1917. Approximate cost, $530,000; work 30 per cent completed.

Puget Sound: Eight million gallons' storage; reinforced concrete; contract awarded November, 1917. Estimated cost, approximately $475,000. Work approximately 30 per cent completed.

San Diego: Two million gallons' concrete storage; contract awarded January, 1917. Approximate cost, $350,000. Work approximately 30 per cent completed.

Chesapeake Bay: Twenty-one million gallons' reinforced concrete storage, with necessary equipment and wharf; estimated cost, $1,600,000. Contracts for wharf, reservoirs, and equipment already awarded. Wharf approximately 50 per cent completed; reservoirs 20 per cent; equipment contract just recently awarded.

Overseas: In April, 1918, the bureau purchased one 50,000-gallon gasoline tank and two 200,000-gallon gasoline tanks, all of steel construction, for transshipment to and reerection. At the same time the bureau purchased nine 1,000,000-gallon fuel-oil tanks, three each to be erected overseas. At the same time the bureau purchased the necessary piping, pumps, valves, and fittings for the fuel-oil installation. Most of this material has already been shipped and is being installed under the supervision of the Navy. Recently a request was forwarded from Admiral Sims for three 2,000,000-gallon tanks for fuel oil, for erection at an important point. The bureau entered into contract for these three tanks, and they will be delivered at an early date.

RADIO STATIONS.

Several radio stations are now under construction. The one just recently completed at Annapolis, Md., is the largest high-tower radio station in the world. Detailed information regarding these installations follows:

Philadelphia: Two steel towers, each 300 feet high, were completed August, 1917. Operating building and operators' quarters were completed shortly thereafter.

Cuban Government: In June, 1917, the bureau, at the request of the Republic of Cuba, took bids and awarded contract for 18 towers for use in connection with the radio work in the Republic of Cuba. Fourteen of these towers were 200 feet high, the remaining 4 being 300 feet high. In June, 1918, the bureau added, at the request of the Republic of Cuba, six 200-foot towers, making a total of 24 radio towers. The total tonnage of these towers were 1,120, including the six additional noted above. Arrangements were made with the Cuban Government to have the material shipped from the United States to Cuba by means of a Cuban transport, which is being loaded now at a dock in Baltimore. The original fourteen 200-foot towers and a large percentage of the four 300-foot towers are on the dock ready for shipment. It is anticipated that the entire work will be completed within the next six weeks. Approximate cost, $140,000.

Virgin Islands: Contract awarded December, 1917, for two 200-foot steel towers; approximate cost, $20,000. Work now approximately 75 per cent completed.

El Cayey, P. R.: Contracts awarded October, 1917, for three 600-foot radio towers and necessary buildings. Approximate cost, $250,000. Work on buildings now approximately completed. Work on towers approximately 60 per cent completed.

Annapolis: Contract for four 600-foot towers entered into November 1, 1917. Approximate cost, $690,000. Contract for radio buildings, wharf, radio-water system, electric systems, and other incidentals awarded October 15, 1917. Work now completed. Station actually placed in commission and first message sent to France first week of this month.

France: In January, 1918, entered into contract for eight 820-foot towers, France, on the basis of erection of the towers by enlisted personnel. Material was actually purchased, fabricated, and shipped complete by August 30, 1918. Erection is now going forward. The total estimated cost of Navy work is $635,000.

On September 19 the bureau was authorized to proceed with the construction of twenty 500-foot radio towers, which are to be located near Monroe, N. C. The total estimated cost of this work, with the necessary buildings and service system, omitting the consideration of the work to be done by Steam Engineering, will be approximately $3,600,000. It is expected that five of these towers and all buildings and service systems will be complete so that the station may be put in operation on or before May 1, 1919.

Contracts were entered into for various minor installations of radio buildings at various stations, notably three 200-foot towers at Norfolk, with receiving building; radio building at Charleston, S. C.; compass stations at various small radio stations all along the Atlantic coast; radio towers at Valdez, Alaska; radio buildings at North Truro, Sayville, Tuckerton, and other places. These are all installations, however, of minor character.

OPERATING BASE AT HAMPTON ROADS, VA.

One of the outstanding accomplishments of the year has been the partial development of the operating base at Hampton Roads. It has long been needed.

Congestion at the Norfolk Navy Yard and Training Station made the provision of some base, outside of the navy yard, an absolute necessity, and Congress provided for the purchase and initiation of the development of the operating base at Hampton Roads.

It was the original intention that one of the activities at Hampton Roads was to be a training station for 8,000 men. This is now in operation, and has been for some time, with an expanded capacity up to 15,000 men.

A second activity is aviation operating base, originally intended for a double coastal unit, and for the operation of two coastal patrol balloons. Aviation activities now include training as well as operation, and there is at least twenty times the activities in the air contemplated originally.

The submarine basin for the accommodation of 20 submarines is now under construction and will soon be available for the use of submarines, destroyers, and the small district patrol craft.

A very important activity contemplated at Hampton Roads consisted of storehouses for fleet stores, so that these might be stored where accessible to the fleet and removed from the navy yard, thus leaving the yard storehouses for the storage of yard material exclusively. There have been completed a number of temporary storehouses for the storage of mines and mining gear. There is a storehouse for general fleet stores now approaching completion, also a cold-storage plant to take care of the supplies for the training station, aviation station, submarine base, and the fleet.

The necessity for the fuel-oil storage and coal storage originally planned at this station has been eliminated by the establishment of fuel-oil tank capacity in the immediate vicinity of the station and connecting up by piping, and the development of large coal-storage capacity at Newport News, Lamberts Point, and Sewells Point.

One permanent pier 1,300 feet long is approaching completion. One temporary pier has been in use for some time in the handling of materials for the construction of the remainder of the station.

Retaining walls and dredging, to permit the deep-water vessels approaching the piers, and the filling in behind the retaining walls, is largely increasing the original area purchased.

The value of this development and the necessity of its continuance is becoming more apparent daily to the yard, the department, and the fleet.

GREAT LAKES.

The naval training camp located at Great Lakes, Ill., is the largest of all the naval training establishments, providing accommodations for about 50,000 men. The first training camp buildings constructed at Great Lakes were begun immediately after the outbreak of the war.

As it became apparent that the Great Lakes camps would have to be greatly expanded in order to provide for the greatly increasing requirements for naval training, a comprehensive scheme of camp location was attempted. The original naval training station which existed before the war formed a nucleus for a later development. The station is located on a high bluff overlooking the west shore of Lake Michigan. The camps have expanded in northerly, southerly, and westerly directions on land lent to or purchased by the Government.

The present training camps at Great Lakes comprise a modern city in wood, every essential facility being provided. The buildings are heated by steam from central power plants, lighted by electricity, and furnished with water by underground systems of piping. The water is taken from Lake Michigan and purified for pumping through the mains. A complete sewer system is provided and sewage disposal is required before turning the effluent into Lake Michigan.

The camps at Great Lakes together have cost more than $14,000,000, and all construction conducted since July, 1917, has been the result of advertising for competitive bids from plans and specifications provided in the Bureau of Yards and Docks to cover all types of building construction, utilities, and services. Great Lakes has every facility in incoming detention and in outgoing detention to isolate the incoming and outgoing recruits from the main camp as a protection against disease.

The buildings number several hundred in all and include barracks buildings, mess halls, latrines, detention buildings, dispensaries, storehouses, garages, fire stations, administration buildings, power plants, water supply, sewage-disposal plants, drill halls, swimming schools, bakeries, laundries, machinists' mates and aviation schools, yeoman schools, shop buildings, and various other shop and school buildings for training purposes. The reservation is subdivided into regimental camps for the better administering of training.

NAVAL TRAINING CAMP AT PELHAM, N. Y.

The naval training camp at Pelham is located at City Island, on Rodmans Neck, Pelham Park, in the borough of The Bronx, New York. Permission to build this site in the park was obtained from the city officials in June, 1917, and the construction of the camp, to accommodate 5,000 men, was begun in July, 1917. The camp was divided into three parts—the main training camp, the detention camp, and the camp hospital. The cost of the original work for the 5,000 men was approximately $2,000,000. The barracks buildings were one-story structures arranged about a centrally located parade ground. The mess halls were large, airy structures with a centrally located kitchen arranged to feed in each wing of the building 500 men on the cafeteria system. Latrines were also large structures fitted to accommodate 500 men. The camp is located amongst trees, and only such trees as were necessary to locate the buildings in a symmetrical plan were removed. In the spring of 1918 an extension was authorized to provide for an additional 10,000 men, 8,000 of which were to be in the extension to the main camp and 1,000 to be in the incoming isolation and 1,000 in the outgoing isolation. The extension to the main camp was located on an oval-shaped piece of property and connected to the old camp by a wooden highway bridge. With the extension to this camp was authorized swimming schools built with reinforced concrete tanks about 75 feet long and 25 feet wide; also a large drill hall, approximately 200 feet wide and 450 feet long, the floor of which has a wearing surface of asphalt to soften the floor for marching and to prevent flying dust, which would have been very unhealthful to men when drilling indoors. This camp was constructed entirely by the Bureau of Yards and Docks. The bureau, through its public-works officer, hired all of the mechanics and labor employed on this work and purchased all of the materials required for the entire camp. The cost of this camp was approximately $6,500,000. This camp is now occupied to its full capacity, a total of 15,000 men. Complete services, such as concrete roads, sewers, water supply, electric service, and steam heat, was provided for the entire development.

HAMPTON ROADS.

Naval Training Camp, Hampton Roads, is located on the property of the old Jamestown Exposition grounds at Hampton Roads, Va. This property was purchased by the Government for the purpose of developing a naval operating base and combining with it a naval training station. The training camp construction was begun in the early part of July, 1917.

With the acquisition of this property the Government became possessed of the old exposition buildings, which were incorporated in the general design for the camps.

The work originally authorized provided for habitation for 10,000 men. The buildings were grouped about the old exhibition administration buildings, which were incorporated in the design of the camp for use as such. The camp was divided about a centrally located parade ground and provision was made at the easterly end of the camp for approximately 5,000 men in a detention unit. The original cost of this camp was approximately $4,500,000. This camp provides for schools of instruction, such as rigging schools, music schools, commissary schools, electrical schools, general schools, and steward schools.

Later, a one-thousand-man isolation detention group was added to the naval training camp. This work was constructed by the King Lumber Co., after taking competitive bids.

At various times authorizations have been granted for the construction of additional buildings, such as swimming schools, drill halls, gyroscopic schools. The complete service, such as roads, walks, sewers, water supply, fencing, central heating plant, etc., were installed for the entire camp.

In September, 1914, the bureau was directed to construct an extension to the naval training station on property bounded on the eastward by Bouch Creek, Willaby Bay on the northeast, and the Virginia Railroad on the southeast. This new camp provides for 14,000 additional men, to be administered from the original camp on the Jamestown site. Two thousand of these men will be in the incoming isolation group and 2,000 men in the outgoing isolation group, and 10,000 men in the main camp. Provision has been made for swimming schools and additional instruction schools.

All of these new barracks buildings will be two stories in height and the men arranged in groups to be messed in four large mess halls, each feeding 25,000 men on the cafeteria system.

Complete plans and specifications for this work were compiled by the bureau. Work was begun about the middle of September, and the time of completion for the entire camp buildings fixed at 125 calendar days. It is estimated that this camp will cost, when completed, including all service, such as storehouse, power plants, roads, water supply, sewers, and electric lighting, approximately $5,000,000.

MARINE BARRACKS, QUANTICO, VA.

One of the two principal establishments for training Marines for the Navy is located at Quantico, Va., about 40 miles from Washington on the west bank of the Potomac River.

The Marines receive a training similar to that given the Army recruits, so that their barracks are modeled more or less after the Army organization. The camp is subdivided into an infantry camp, artillery school, and officers' school, and includes hospital facilities, storage, and commissary facilities.

The camp is fully equipped with modern roads and walks, water supply, mains, sewer system, garbage incineration. The first construction at Quantico provided for 5,000 men. An extension to the Quantico camp to provide for 2,800 additional recruits was started during the spring of this year. Complete plans and specifications for the work were prepared in the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and include 270 buildings of different descriptions. The contract price for the King Lumber Co. contract was $1,085,562.

PARIS ISLAND, S. C.

The second important establishment for training recruits for the Marine Corps is located at Paris Island, Port Royal, S. C. Paris Island is located off the coast of South Carolina, is located on the Beaufort River southeasterly from Charleston.

The first camp at Paris Island was constructed in 1917 and was modeled like Quantico after the Army plans. It provided for about 2,500 men. As a result of congressional action increasing the personnel of the Marine Corps it was found necessary to increase the size of the camp at Paris Island as well as at Quantico. Plans and specifications were prepared during the spring of 1918 in the Bureau of Yards and Docks covering all points of the construction of and extension to the Paris Island camps, and provided for quarters for 5,000 additional recruits.

Construction was provided at six different points on the island, as follows: Extension to the training camp, increasing the facilities at the main station, quarantine station, and existing rifle range, and establishing a new rifle range, and a group of buildings at the maneuver grounds. The buildings include barracks buildings, mess halls, latrines, officers' quarters, outbuildings, administration building, post exchange, library and recreation building, lecture hall, post office, clerk school, auto-repair shop, bakeshop, radio school, pump house, bowling alleys, ice plant, meat-cutting room, resthouse, guardhouse, a group of hospital buildings, and storage buildings, a pier and sea wall. This camp, like Quantico, is provided with roads and walks, water supply and sewer systems, fire-fighting facilities, and sewage disposal.

The work of constructing the extension to the marine barracks at Paris Island will cost $1,882,297 under the contract.

CODDINGTON POINT.

As a result of the acceptance by the Navy Department of the training of the merchant marine it was necessary to establish a new naval training camp at Coddington Point, Newport, R. I. This establishment provides facilities for 15,000 men. Plans and specifications were prepared in the Bureau of Yards and Docks to cover all points of the intricate construction of this camp, which is the largest single camp contract ever prepared by the Navy. The work was awarded to the lowest bidder for approximately $3,500,000. Coddington Point is located a short distance from the naval station, Newport, and is connected by bridge with Coasters Harbor Island, where a naval training camp for 7,000 men is provided.

The layout of the camp at Coddington Point is typical of the latest naval training camp construction. It includes the following features:

Regimental training unit.

Regimental barracks, 104 men each	107
Latrines	35
Mess halls to accommodate 11,000 men	5
Regimental quartermasters' buildings	11
Regimental office buildings	11
Battalion commanders' offices	35
Brigade headquarters	2
Dispensaries	4
Large drill halls, 100 by 350 feet each	4
Barracks for chief petty officers accommodating 100 men each	2
Large storehouses, 60 by 350 feet each	4
Garages for 15 cars each	2

Barracks for cooks and many other features such as would be necessary for the service of a city of 15,000 inhabitants. The total number of buildings provided is 373.

An interesting point in connection with the camp at Coddington is the installation of four swimming pools, complete with pumping, heating, and filtration facilities. These swimming pools are under roof and built of concrete, with showers and locker rooms.

DETENTION UNIT.

This division of a typical camp, such as the Coddington project, will accommodate 4,000 men, 2,000 incoming and 2,000 outgoing. In addition to the barracks would be found two laundries, four dispensaries, four isolation wards, two executive buildings, two office buildings, two storehouses, two garages, and a large receiving building. Where such buildings occur in pairs, it is to be noted that one is in connection with incoming recruits and one in connection with those outgoing.

The completed camp at Coddington Point will include development of the water supply from a distant point, purification of the water supply, a system of fresh-water mains and a salt-water system of mains for flushing and fire-protection purposes. The camp will be provided with large pumping units for fire protection, adequate power plants, and for heating and lighting the camp. A complete sanitary sewer system is also provided and a system of roads and walks. The site is surrounded on three sides by water and is most picturesque. The camp when complete, including heating, lighting, and other services, will cost about $6,000,000.

INFORMATION ABOUT THE TRAINING CAMP, GULFPORT, MISS.

The naval training camp is located on the Mississippi Centennial Exposition Grounds on the shore of the Gulf of Mexico, near Gulfport, Miss. The regimental and isolation group of buildings, the alterations to existing exposition buildings, and complete outside services, such as roads, sewers, gas, electricity, and hospital group, are being constructed. Camp now accommodates 2,100 men. Plans provide for extension for total of 2,500 or more if necessary.

Complete plans and specifications, covering every item entering into the work, were prepared by the Bureau of Yards and Docks and advertised for bids. The award in each case was made to the low bidder, as the result of competitive bidding.

The cost of the main regimental group, isolation group, outside services, drill ground, pier, and other accessories, when completed, will be about $500,000, and the hospital group $100,000, making a total cost of the completed naval training camp, $600,000.

A comprehensive plan of the camp was made with a full appreciation of the esthetic value of the original exposition layout of grounds and buildings, and only such modifications to these original grounds and buildings were made as was necessary to adapt them for camp purposes and provide a suitable mess hall, storehouse, armory, receiving building, officer-of-the-day building, and headquarters building. Temporary buildings, comprising the regimental, isolation groups, and hospital groups, were arranged in such a manner as to interfere as little as possible with the palm court, vistas, trees, and other lanscape-gardening features in the original layout. These groups are composed of officers' quarters, barracks, mess halls, latrines, wash houses, storehouses, brig and guardhouse, dispensary, and garages.

Shell roads were laid out and built as originally planned for the exposition with such additional roads as were necessary to serve the needs of the camp. A garbage incinerator, a landing pier, grading of the ground to provide for a drill field, and a sewerage-disposal plant are also provided in this contract. The training camp generally has the following major divisions: Administration, isolation, main regimental, hospital, commissary, and service.

MARINE CORPS.

Barracks of modern construction for the Marine Corps are under way at several points. Information relative to these operations follow:

Philadelphia: In September, 1917, contract was awarded for an extension to quartermaster's storehouse, at an estimated cost of approximately $300,000. This work was later increased by another contract for mechanical equipment and still a further contract for another building, the total increase amounting to approximately $400,000. Work is now approximately 75 per cent completed.

Philadelphia Marine Barracks: Contract awarded November 26, 1917. These barracks to accommodate 400 men, approximate cost $200,000. Work now practically 90 per cent completed.

Philadelphia advance-base storehouse: Contract awarded June, 1917. Estimated cost, $76,000. Work completed December, 1917.

Peking, China: Contract entered into July, 1918. Estimated cost, $130,000. Work now going forward.

San Diego: Contract for dredging at San Diego, Marine Corps. Base was awarded January, 1918, and work is satisfactorily progressing with the dredging and filling. Plans and specifications for the Marine Corps base are being prepared and it is anticipated that they will be issued for bids within the next month. This total project will cover about $5,000,000.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Work of extending the Naval Academy is well under way, a very satisfactory plan having been worked out for the extension of Bancroft Hall, the midshipmen's dormitory.

One of the wings accommodating about 550 midshipmen will be completed and ready for occupancy by October, 1918, and the remaining wing in February, 1919. The extension of the mess hall and its accompanying utilities will be completed by the same time, allowing for the messing of the maximum number of midshipmen, for which accommodations are to be provided. The extension of Isherwood Hall is under contract and will be completed early in October, 1918, including the enlargement of the forge shop. Temporary quarters have been completed which will accommodate about 450 reserve officers stationed at the academy for training. These quarters include a recreation and lecture hall large enough to seat the whole number of men.

Work on the high-power radio station at Annapolis is complete.

Extensive additions to the power-plant equipment and outside distributing systems are required to take care of the additional buildings. This work is well under way and will be finished by the time the new buildings are ready for occupancy.

DRY DOCKS.

Three naval dry docks are in course of construction at the present time and two other dry docks for which under congressional authority the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to enter into contract for naval purposes at a guaranteed minimum annual rental, all five docks being of such dimensions as to permit of docking the largest vessels capable of passing through the locks of the Panama Canal. In addition to these, appropriations have been made by Congress for the construction of a 1,000-foot dock at the navy yard, Charleston, S. C.

The two dry docks authorized at the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress were placed under contract under favorable terms after public competition, the Norfolk Navy Yard dock in November, 1916, and the Philadelphia Navy Yard dock in April, 1917.

Work has progressed very satisfactorily on the Norfolk dock and at present it is expected that the dock will be completed ready for use by December of this year, approximately a year in advance of the contract date, due for completion. Satisfactory progress has been made on the Pearl Harbor Dry Dock, which it is expected will be completed early in 1919. Considering the unusual difficulties under which this dock is being constructed and the fact that no dock has ever been built by any such radical method as is being employed on this contract, the status of the work is considered as very satisfactory. The progress of construction of the dry dock being built by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts at Boston has been more satisfactory than during the preceding year. Shortage of labor and difficulty in securing materials have had their influences, however, upon the progress of the work upon this dry dock during the past year. From present indications this dock will probably be completed in 1919. Congress has authorized the use of this dock by the Navy Department under practically the same conditions as those applying to the dry dock of the Union Iron Works in San Francisco, Cal. The Union Iron Works dock is approximately 90 per cent complete.

BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

When war began the Medical Corps of the Navy numbered about 300 commissioned officers. To-day we have that many Navy medical officers on duty in European waters or ashore in foreign countries. To-day the Medical Corps consists of 3,000 officers, all of whom are actually required for the present needs of the service and would not suffice in the event of further expansion. All these accessions to the Medical Corps were taken in after physical and professional examinations and they have received special training for military service and special professional training at the Naval Medical School, Washington, D. C., at naval hospitals, on board cruising ships of the Navy, and at great medical centers like New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, where intensive courses, both didactic and practical, were conducted for their benefit by the best professional talent in the country. The Dental Corps at the beginning of the war numbered 30 officers, it now has 500 members and the demand for their services has not even been fully met. As in the case of the doctors the dentists now serving abroad are numerically equal to the corps of two years ago. At the front, serving in the field with the marines in France, we have medical officers and dental officers. Their record is known from the newspapers. The first commissioned officer of the Navy proper to die in battle on the soil of France was Dental Surg. W. E. Osborne, fatally wounded while carrying a wounded comrade from the field. He was posthumously awarded the distinguished-service cross by Gen. Pershing.

Equal courage and fortitude has been shown by members of the Hospital Corps, the male nurses of the Navy, who serve on our battleships and go into action with the marines, sharing every danger with their comrades of other branches of the service. The Hospital Corps in July, 1916, numbered 1,585 men. To-day the corps consists of 14,000 men, for whom we have four large, thoroughly organized training schools and many smaller centers of instruction.

The female nurse corps comprises 1,128 women, of whom 260 are serving at our naval hospitals and dispensaries in England and France. We have more than doubled, nearly trebled, our enrollment of female nurses for active service since last year. The Navy nurses are without exception women of unusual ability and the highest character. They continue to show in every emergency the fidelity and devotion which has always characterized them.

The most carefully planned arrangements have been carried out during the past year and are now being increased and elaborated in every direction for the care of our sick and wounded. During the first year of the war we completed sufficient emergency hospital construction to increase the previously existing hospital facilities in 18 regular naval hospitals with their 1,600 beds by 114 new buildings, constructed and equipped—wards, contagious pavilions, operating rooms, quarters for female nurses and Hospital Corps men, storerooms, kitchens, mess halls, and barracks for civilian employees. By July, 1917, 2,700 additional beds had been provided for the sick. The buildings since completed, now nearing completion or contracted for and under way, will give the medical department of the Navy a patient capacity of between eleven and twelve thousand beds. For example, the hospital at Norfolk, Va., which had been increased last year to one thousand four hundred-odd beds will soon have 900 more beds. The hospital at Hampton Roads is being increased from 750 to 900. Brooklyn is being prepared for 500 additional patients, and Pelham Bay Park for an increase of 500 over last year, making 750. When I say beds I mean to include all the necessities for that many sick—heating, lighting, food, ambulance service, skilled nursing and skilled professional attendance, medical, surgical, and dental. At the Great Lakes Training Station the hospital capacity is about 1,300. An additional 200 beds are being provided. The three hundred and fifty-odd beds at Charleston, S. C., are to be doubled. League Island, Pa., which last year had 200 beds in 17 buildings, will shortly accommodate 600 additional patients in 30 additional buildings. The old Philadelphia Hospital is being increased this year by 300 additional beds, and a contract has been awarded for an addition to the hospital at League Island of 500 beds. In addition to this a hospital of 175 beds is going up at New London, Conn. At Wards Island, N. Y., 15 barrack buildings are under construction, which will accommodate 800 beds. In all these buildings attention has been given to adequate heating and ventilation. A full allowance of floor space and cubic air space is assured for each bed.

The list of beds here given represents the accommodation for patients only, and it must not be forgotten that the necessary attendant personnel for these patients is large and requires housing too. Thus, with the money expended in this hospital construction, there have been obtained also quarters for doctors, dentists, male and female nurses, and civilian employees, which may be estimated in terms of beds as from 40 to 50 per cent more than the number cited.

It remains to be said in this connection that while buildings were going up and equipment was being assembled arrangements with the best civilian hospitals of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia provided immediate accommodation and skilled treatment for any excess of sick over and above the naval facilities of the moment. Such sick as were sent to civilian institutions continued under the medical surveillance of the Navy, whose doctors were responsible for their welfare and their behavior.

In spite of the interference with business, caused by the war, the medical department of the Navy has not at any time lacked and does not now lack ample supplies of instruments, drugs, and dressings. Substitutes have been found for certain articles needed for the sick; others have been modified, where the cost was prohibitive or it was impossible to obtain them from abroad. All the thousands of recruits who have joined the colors have been vaccinated against smallpox and have received antityphoid prophylaxis. Not only were the candidates for enrollment examined by medical officers at recruiting stations, but trained psychiatrists have been at work in our training camps to weed out from the beginning those who were mentally and temperamentally unfit for the strain of war, aiming not only to remove this element of weakness from the fighting forces, but to prevent the shipwreck in individual cases, due to infringements of discipline and their consequent punishment, which invariably mark the career of these unfortunates when they are encompassed by the iron restraints of military discipline.

A most vital part of the work of the medical department of the Navy has been in the field of hygiene and sanitation. Important as it is to treat the sick it is more important still to ward off the dangers incident to large assemblages of men in camps, barracks, and ships by preventive measures.

The Bureau of Medicine and Surgery had a voice in the planning of our new training stations and in the modification of the existing ones when the expansion of the Navy began. Certain fundamental principles of housing, berthing, ventilation, isolation, and observation were laid down for the handling of recruits, and while epidemics of meningitis, measles, and mumps have occurred, they have been limited and controlled. While recognizing the need for rapidity of enrollment and training, the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery has stood out for systematic, concerted effort against overcrowding and has insisted that preparations for the adequate handling of men must keep pace with the recruiting of them. Two features stand out prominently in the Navy training-camp arrangements. They were accepted experimentally at first. To-day their enormous value has been fully recognized by naval military authorities. They are the detention system and the small-unit barracks. By detention system is meant that all recruits reporting at a training camp or station are housed, fed, and drilled apart for a period of 14 to 21 days. During this period contagious cases or men capable of carrying infection are sent to hospital or subjected to special observation. The detention period permits of careful vaccination and inoculation against smallpox and typhoid fever, while the new arrivals are gradually growing accustomed to their new environment and duties. Homesickness and discouragement are prone to attack the young recruit, and he is peculiarly susceptible to fatigue and physical deterioration, and therefore to epidemic diseases in the first days after enrollment. When the period of training at camp and barrack is over and the recruit has reached the point where he is ready to go aboard ships, a further detention is instituted to protect the personnel of battleship and cruiser from the introduction of contagion from abroad. During the early weeks of the war this so-called outgoing detention was not in full operation and epidemic diseases developed in the personnel afloat, but this no longer happens. The other important point in the Navy training-camp system is the small-unit barrack. The Bureau of Medicine and Surgery has urged that men be housed together in small groups, preferably 9 to 12, never more than 35 or 50 to a building, each man to have a minimum of 50 square feet of floor space. The tendency to overcrowding is inevitable, but abundant cubic air space is the most essential prerequisite of healthy camps.

Besides making these basal demands, the medical officers have exerted themselves to the limit of their strength to keep the men well by sanitary measures. They have had a gratifying success, if we may judge from the general admission rate for the entire Navy for all causes, including accidents and injuries as well as sickness, for the six months from January 1 to June 30, 1918. This admission rate means that when a man is put on the sick list for a boil it counts 1. If the same man later has measles, it counts 2. Later if he sprains his ankle, it means three admissions. The admission rate, as so interpreted, has been 716.5 per thousand men per annum. Compare this with the average admission rate for the eight years of peace from 1909 to 1916, which was 624.23. Consider that the period referred to included the months of January, February, March, and April, the wet, snowy, cold, inclement months, when sickness is most prevalent, when men want to shut windows and doors and ventilators and enjoy being crowded together for the sake of warmth and temporary comfort. Remember that the history of all military operations teaches the disproportionate increase of morbidity that accompanies concentration of men in large numbers. Remember that susceptibility is greatest in youth and that the average age of the Navy enlistments is well below that of land forces. You will then realize that, in spite of the country's unpreparedness, the need for dispatch and the work accomplished, the Navy's showing as to health has been reassuring, gratifying, splendid.

The factor of youth in causing sickness under stress is so great that I must give you one other figure to impress you with the value of our Navy medical service. It is a very striking figure. The admission rate for recruits in training for the half year alluded to was 1,086.04, as against the average admission rate for apprentice seamen during the preceding eight-year period of peace, which was 1,272.99.

For the sick and injured abroad we have a total hospital bed capacity, divided between England, Scotland, Ireland, and France, of over 3,000, of which 1,475 are in France and the balance in the British Isles. There are, in addition, less elaborate and temporary accommodations in France for 400 patients at smaller stations.

The medical department of the Navy has made special effort to prevent sickness among the troops going abroad in Navy transports. Careful thought was given to the subject, and a very simple scheme has been put in operation. The Army embarks and disembarks the troops, and is expected to embark them free from disease, clean, properly vaccinated, etc. Army medical officers hold sick call for their respective units, and the men requiring to be turned in, that correspond in shore parlance to hospital cases, are berthed in the ship's sick bay under the care of the ship's Navy medical officers. Minor ailments are prescribed for by the Army doctors, and their prescriptions are filled in the sick bay from the ship's stores, so that the Army medical units may not have to break into their outfits and deplete them in transit. (The senior medical officer of the Navy aboard has charge of all sanitary measures.)

The Navy has three hospital ships—the old Solace, 20 years in the service and still having a limited usefulness, and two 10,000-ton vessels, originally Ward liners, which have been converted to ambulance ships and fully equipped for 300 patients each. These ships do not more than cover the needs of the Navy. Hence when the Army called for assistance in returning its sick and wounded from abroad it was decided in conference between the two services to utilize the sick bays or hospital facilities of returning transports. Of course these ships can not bring home in comfort as many sick and wounded as the well men they carry on the eastward voyage. The troops on the way to the front can put up with bunks on lower decks and can go up and down ladders to mess, to the toilet, to get into the air and sunlight, as the sick could not. Still this arrangement meets the need, provided the Army sick are evacuated and distributed to different ports so that no transport shall ever return without being filled to its legitimate sick-carrying capacity. The transports vary not only in size but in type of construction, which counts almost as much as size where proper handling of the sick is concerned.

To give some idea of the total patient capacity at present, as distinguished from troop capacity, of these ships, I may say that if they all sailed at once from Europe they would bring home in a single voyage:

Bedridden patients requiring a maximum of care and attention, all occupying hospital bunks	1,400
Patients requiring surgical dressings and treatment but able to live in troop quarters	7,800
Insane	600
Tuberculosis cases, either isolated or housed on open decks	975
Patients requiring no surgical attention quartered in officers' rooms	4,900
Convalescents having the status of well men so far as berthing is concerned	76,000
Total	91,675

At the headquarters, in New York, of Admiral Gleaves, commanding the Transport and Cruiser Force, we have a medical officer of special ability, who acts in an advisory capacity on all matters sanitary. He inspects every transport coming in or going out, and, as opportunity permits, without delaying the expeditious transfer of men, institutes the changes and improvements which experience proves to be required. This doctor has made four trans-Atlantic voyages in transports for the sole purpose of acquiring full knowledge of conditions and problems connected with this service. Another medical officer is stationed at Newport News with identical functions. In each of two French ports we have a Navy medical officer who has had experience of transport service to facilitate the prompt distribution of Army patients to returning transports.

A brief reference should be made to the many enterprises, connected with war service, engaged in by the Medical Corps. The subject of gas warfare, the use of masks, the neutralization of poisonous gases and the treatment of the gassed has been fully mastered. The ventilation of submarines, the food appropriate to men serving in them, has been investigated and improved. Antiflash clothing has been devised to minimize the dangers from liquid fire, burning gunpowder, and explosives. Traveling laboratories have been organized at the medical school, and, on telegraphic request, their units, fully equipped, can proceed to the scene of an epidemic where personnel is overworked or facilities for bacteriological work are limited. The medical departments of the vessels of the fleet are fully prepared for the hazards of battle. The battle dressing stations, located behind armor and equipped with hot and cold water, with electric sterilizers, operating tables, and ample supplies of surgical dressings, manned by skillful and devoted doctors and attendants, are ready. A painstaking study has been made of all problems connected with the food and clothing of the men. Epidemic diseases have been investigated, both as regards prevention and treatment, and elaborate statistics have been tabulated. Instruction on all these topics has been given, as required, to doctors and nurses, and the personnel of the medical department has been kept fully abreast of all scientific advancement through quarterly and weekly publications, which embodied our own findings and all that could be observed by our representatives abroad or learned from current foreign literature.

Sanitary inspectors from the United States Public Health Service have worked with the Navy doctors to improve local conditions in the vicinity of our camps and stations, so that, instead of the presence of these camps being a menace to civilian communities they have proved a blessing, through destruction of mosquitoes and flies and improvement of water supplies, sewage and garbage disposal. Social conditions have also improved, and the fight against prostitution and venereal disease, begun by the Navy 15 years ago, has taken on vast and comprehensive proportions. Lectures and personal talks, moving-picture shows, distributed booklets and posters, have furthered the cause of clean living. Not only the physical man but his spiritual side has been considered and much has been accomplished to promote happiness and contentment as well as health among the men.

Office of the Judge Advocate General.

As the volume of work of this office is very largely dependent on the number of personnel in the service, it is evident how the pressure upon this office has increased by this sudden and extraordinary expansion. But in another respect also the change from a state of peace to that of war has placed heavy burdens on this department, because of the important war legislation affecting the personnel that suddenly became necessary, and because of the many new and varied questions of law that have been constantly arising out of the new conditions, as affecting both the Regular Establishment and more particularly the auxiliary arms of the service.

During the past year 4,831 men under naval jurisdiction were tried by general court-martial, as compared with 1,816 during 1917. This large increase was due to the increase in the naval personnel. During 1917 there were 95,548 men under naval jurisdiction, as compared with 412,415 during 1918. The percentage tried by general courts-martial during 1918 was 1.185, as compared with 2.23 during 1917. Men who have been convicted of purely military offenses are offered every opportunity to rehabilitate themselves in the service.

During the past year 4,505 men under naval jurisdiction were confined in naval prisons, as compared with 2,018 during the previous year. Additional buildings were constructed at Portsmouth to take care of this increase. Contracts have also been let for additional prison buildings at the naval prison, Paris Island, S. C.

Every effort is being made to reduce the number of men confined. All prisoners who are physically or mentally unfit are immediately discharged. That efforts have been successful is shown by the reduction in the percentage of imprisonments from 2.97 per cent in 1914 to 1.22 per cent in 1917, a result obtained while maintaining and improving the discipline of our armed forces. With the methods now employed it is hoped to still further reduce the percentage of imprisonments and make progress in the general lines indicated.

Marine Corps.

When war came to the United States in April, 1917, it found the Marine Corps with authorized enlisted strength of 17,500 officers and men. It was readily seen that this limit would be too small for the new activities of the corps, with the result that in May the authorized strength of the corps was increased by act of Congress to 30,000 men. Within less than six months voluntary enlistments to the corps were up to full strength, while the call was for "more marines." This accounts for the fact that the authorized strength of the corps now is 75,500, and after the 1st of October, when voluntary inductions will be allowed, the 20,000 men who are needed to bring the corps to its full strength will be readily obtained at a rate of 5,000 men a month.

War found the marines ready. In fact, three days before the breaking off of diplomatic relations between the United States and Germany, an order went forth for 50,000 pair of shoes for the corps and other matters of housing, equipment, and cantonment necessities were handled in the same efficient manner. There have been no troubles from overcrowding or from lack of food, clothing, or equipment in the Marine Corps.

Marines landed in France early in the summer of 1917. Owing to the need for experienced rear troops to guard the lines of communication, it was necessary for Gen. Pershing to scatter a number of the sea soldiers and use them for provost guards at base posts and in Paris. However, as soon as the necessary men to take their places arrived the marines were relieved from this duty and assigned to a "quiet sector" in the Verdun district, there to receive their initiation into war. They stood the tests so well that when Gen. Foch called for troops to help stem the German rush on Paris, the Fourth Brigade of Marines was rushed forward in company with the famous Twenty-third Infantry Regiment, and a crack French unit to achieve what then seemed an impossibility—the stemming of the German advance, with the Germans numbering four to one against the defenders of Paris.

This came in the vicinity of Chateau-Thierry with the battle that began May 27. From then on through the fierce encounters of Torcy, Bouresches, Lucy, and Belleau Wood, the marines, who had been rushed to the conflicts in motors, fought night and day, enduring terrible hardships and terrific losses. But they achieved their aim—they not only stopped the German rush, but drove back the Huns and recaptured lost territory.

Their bravery caused the French Nation to change the name of Belleau Wood to "Bois de la Brigade des Marines," and to give the marines the credit of having saved Paris. To show the fighting spirit of the marines, it is only necessary to cite the fact that one battalion that went into the fight with 1,350 men, emerged with only 350. Another had only 450. Others with 600 and 800 were common. And the surprising part of it all was that the replacement troops who took the places of fallen men fought just as hard and as bravely as the more seasoned men. Some of the replacement troops were under fire for the first time when they hurried forward to reinforce the marines fighting near Belleau Wood and Bouresches.

Following these battles, there was the necessary rest. Then when the great attack began on the Marne at Viller Cottent on July 17, the marines were again present, and again gave a good account of themselves.

The fighting in France does not encompass all the activities of the marines. Of course, the foregoing is in addition to the well-known duty of marines as a part of the Navy. Marine detachments as usual are maintained on board capital ships. Detachment at navy yards, ammunition depots, radio stations, and other naval activities have been largely increased since the beginning of the war, and the advance base force, comprising about 6,000 specially-trained marines, is standing by, ready for service at an instant's notice with the Navy.

The policing of various countries in cooperation with local authorities still continues—especially in Santo Domingo, where occasional brushes between the marines and bandits occur. There, too, the marines are living up to their reputation. Recently 10 men and a colonel, ambushed by brigands, killed 20 of the bandits, while the marine detachment suffered a casualty list of 1 mule.

The careful training of marine recruits has been heightened by the rush of war, rather than weakened. Recently it was brought to the attention of the Navy Department that the Thirteenth Regiment of marines had achieved almost perfection in marksmanship, with 95 per cent of its personnel qualifying on the range, and the ideal percentage of that personnel qualifying to scale. The ideal unit should possess one-seventh of its number in expert riflemen, two-sevenths in sharpshooters, and four-sevenths in marksmen. This division is to be found almost to the man in the 95 per cent of the Thirteenth which qualified.

Another point which illustrates the careful training of the United States marine:

Since the fighting began in France, up to September 21, 1918, 37 officers and 942 men are reported dead, 64 officers and 1,927 men are reported wounded, but only 11 are known to be in the hands of the enemy. The marines don't surrender. They fight.

In addition to the foregoing reported casualties unofficial advices indicate a great many more casualties not included in the cablegrams from Gen. Pershing.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On September 24, 1918:

H. R. 12923. An act to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes.

On September 26, 1918:

H. R. 11283. An act to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes.

On October 1, 1918:

H. J. Res. 333. Joint resolution to aid in combating "Spanish influenza" and other communicable diseases;

H. R. 12714. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919; and

H. J. Res. 334. Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government for the month of October, 1918, and for other purposes.

On October 5, 1918:

H. R. 11259. An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply;

S. 4194. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4543. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4722. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

On October 10, 1918:

H. R. 12429. An act to authorize the health officer of the District of Columbia to permit the disinterment of the bodies of Eliza Hill Bowles, Bernice Worthem Bowles, and Bessie Vivian Bowles.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MEEKER (on request of Mr. IGOE), indefinitely, on account of illness;

To Mr. WELLING (on request of Mr. MAYS), indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family; and

To Mr. MCFADDEN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. FAIRFIELD, on account of the serious illness of his son at Camp Taylor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The correct way to make these requests is to come to the Clerk, fill out the blanks, and put them in, which would save time.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow after disposition of matters on the Speaker's table that I be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes in reply to the charges made by the gentleman from Minnesota against the efficiency of the Post Office Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] makes the request that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, that he be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes about the Post Office Department and strictures thereon. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand to-day we have a little business here—I do not know whether the gentleman from South Carolina wants to get in with his conference report or not?

Mr. LEVER. I would like to call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 11945.

The SPEAKER. What about the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FOSTER. If it does not interfere with other matters——

Mr. BLANTON. That is for to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I should not object.

Mr. WALSH. It will interfere with the rule, according to the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, we understand it is not to interfere with these other matters.

Mr. WALSH. The request has been granted in the manner in which the Speaker phrased it.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, the Rules Committee can set it aside, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman withhold his request for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. It has already been granted.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. I ask permission to address the House for a few moments, with the privilege of extending my remarks in the Record, on the achievements of the Department of Labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding five minutes, with the privilege of extending his remarks, on the achievements of the Department of Labor. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, 2,000,000 of our best and strongest men have gone into the fighting forces on the battle fields of Europe, while over a million more are in training in the various camps of the country. Their lives and their country's salvation are at stake. We must produce for those at home and we must produce for our soldiers at the front and for our men in the various cantonments in this country. For the battle line is not only in France. The battle line runs through our mills and factories here at home. The workers—and that includes the managers, the superintendents, and the men who make and carry things and the men employed in all our industries—they are all in the second line of defense; they are all comrades in the battle line for humanity and democracy.

That second line consists of an industrial army five to seven times as great as the military forces. We who are back in the second line are not privileged to go to France, so we will do our duty to the utmost here, with one goal in view—production. That means work, for only work can produce food, can produce ships and guns, can produce the equipment necessary for the boys in France.

Upon the United States Department of Labor rests, in a large measure, the duty of handling all of those questions which are so closely related to the mighty problems of production. This means that that department is charged with the duty of the adjustment of trade disputes, with securing the necessary employees for our industrial plants, with the conditions of labor as they affect the employees, with the training of labor, with industrial housing and transportation, and with the necessity of maintaining a fine spirit of cooperation and peaceful relations between employer and employees. And well has the Department of Labor met the very difficult industrial questions incident to the great war. Under the wise and capable direction of Secretary of Labor Wilson this department has been able to cope with and solve these problems as they presented themselves.

The Department of Labor is the department of the Government that deals with the intimate human relations, the inner American life. It represents no one element. It deals with the relations of all elements of our internal industry, for, after all, American life is, to a large degree, American industry. None of us is outside of it. So this department stands for all of us. This department is the youngest in the Cabinet, and notwithstanding that it is the youngest in the Cabinet its every activity has been a vital part of the great war program. To-day the department has eight divisions, showing the scope of its work. They are:

Adjustment Service (including Division of Conciliation).
United States Employment Service.
Bureau of Labor Statistics.
Bureau of Immigration.
Children's Bureau.
Bureau of Naturalization.
Information and Education Service.
Bureau of Industrial Housing and Transportation.
The War Labor Policies Board.

ADJUSTMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES.
[Hugh L. Kerwin, Director.]

The first problems which faced the department were in connection with the adjustment of labor disputes.

The Mediation Service is under the immediate supervision of Hugh L. Kerwin and seeks to bring about an adjustment of labor disputes on terms mutually acceptable to employers and employees. A large force of trained and experienced conciliators keep constantly at work and in this way hundreds of industrial disputes are quietly adjusted. If they are unsuccessful, the good offices of the National War Labor Board are invoked.

This board is under the joint chairmanship of Hon. William H. Taft and Hon. Frank P. Walsh. The board is composed of an equal number of representatives of employers and employees, the employers having been nominated by the president of the National Industrial Conference Board, and the employees nominated by the president of the American Federation of Labor. Its functions are to decide questions at issue between employers and employees where adjustments have not been reached through the machinery of existing agreements or law.

Both of these services work in complete cooperation with the War Department, Navy Department, Shipping Board, Railroad Administration, and War Industries Board.

The Secretary of Labor himself has been responsible for the peaceable settling of many strikes. When you pick up your paper in the morning and read about a large number of men who have "walked out," you know instantly that the Secretary of Labor himself is working to bring the men and their employers together peaceably.

During the fiscal year of 1917, 378 cases were brought to the department for mediation. Of this number 248 cases were adjusted by commissioners of conciliation, 41 were settled before department took jurisdiction, 42 were pending at close of fiscal year, and in only 47 cases was the department unable to bring about an adjustment. The number of employees directly and indirectly concerned aggregated 807,959.

The department is now called upon to use its good offices in upward of 100 industrial controversies each month. A gratifying feature in connection therewith is that the machinery of conciliation is now utilized to adjust grievances while the men remain at their work. An interesting example of this is that I observed recently that in one week 77 cases were received, only 7 of which had reached the strike stage.

At this point I desire to pay a just tribute to the fine work of the National War Labor Board, which I mentioned a few minutes ago. This board, under the joint leadership of former President William H. Taft and Hon. Frank P. Walsh, has been of inestimable service to the country as a "supreme court of adjustment" when the existing machinery of conciliation has been unable to get a settlement. The marked absence in our daily newspapers of strike news in recent months is a tribute to the efficiency of the adjustment service, the Taft-Walsh Board and the other departmental services all working in fine cooperation for industrial peace. [Applause.]

I also desire to speak briefly of some of the other services of the Department of Labor which are ably meeting the strenuous conditions imposed by added burdens due to the war. There is the—

THE EMPLOYMENT SERVICE.
[John B. Densmore, Director General.]

This service is the Government's "helping hand" for the people. Last May it placed more than 200,000 wage earners. On account of the war its functions have been greatly extended. Its purpose to-day is to locate surplus labor and distribute it to supply the needs of the Navy Department, War Department, Railroad Administration, Fleet Corporation, War Industries Board, and contractors doing war work. The general work is handled through a division of information, administration, and clearance. A public service reserve registers and card indexes people of all kinds of professional and technical attainments whose services may be needed by way of the departments or boards for war purposes, and also registers and card indexes a reserve of volunteer workmen for war industries; a boys' working reserve, organized principally for the purpose of training and utilizing the services of boys between the ages of 16 and 21 for seasonal occupations, such as farming; a division of farm service which works in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture, the agreement with that department being that it will recruit farm labor in the rural communities, and when the need arises for using workmen from the towns and cities for farm labor, they will be handled by the Department of Labor; and a woman's division, which, in conjunction with the general administration and clearance, handles the problem of the placement of women in industrial employment.

The Employment Service has 400 organized offices in the United States from which daily reports are received at the Washington office of the local demand for and supply of labor. These are compiled into weekly reports for the preparation of maps which show at a glance the surplus or shortage of every class of labor in the various localities by which the service can be guided in gathering and transporting needed labor for war activities. It has the active assistance of many civic bodies, not organized for profit, which have interested themselves in the matter. It is in cooperation with the War, Navy, and Agricultural Departments, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the Railroad Administration, and the Civil Service Commission.

The women and girls' division not only provides employment for women and girls but investigates thoroughly the character of every one who applies for female help, ascertains how the employees will be trained, how they will live, and how this work will fit them for the greater work of home building, which is every woman's heritage.

And, by protecting these women, the next generation is protected by the Department of Labor. These women and girls are to be the mothers of the Nation that will carry on the work of to-morrow. The ideals which these working girls set up to-day will be the ideals of the men of to-morrow. Thus this service is daily laying the foundation for a greater America every day.

The department is working upon a plan for the development of ways and means to find employment for aged people. How frequently have we heard it said that in modern times when men and women pass a certain defined line they are subjects for "the human scrap pile."

But the Department of Labor, furthermore, has taken upon itself the work of actually creating new places for employment that will bring health, happiness, and prosperity to workers who have not found employment through the regular channels.

The Secretary of Labor made definite recommendations that Government land be utilized in order to provide new places for employment. Congress has this under consideration.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.
[Dr. Royal Meeker, Commissioner.]

The United States Bureau of Labor Statistics has been gathering and compiling for Federal and State departments and individuals a great deal of material on wage rates and retail prices in communities affected by the expansion of industry, types of collective bargaining, industrial hazards from accident and disease, and the employment of women in men's occupations. The demand for information on labor conditions in the belligerent countries of Europe has been met by the reproduction, in the form of a special group of bulletins and articles, of British, French, and other foreign official reports on hours, fatigue, health, welfare work, the employment of women and juveniles, labor unrest, and other matters concerning conditions of labor in these countries.

Very thorough studies have been made in regard to industrial poisons used or produced in the manufacture of high explosives and reports have been published on dope poisoning in the manufacture of aeroplane wings, also further studies of industrial poisons used in the manufacture of high explosives.

To assist in the restoration work that must be undertaken at the close of this war, special investigation of the land policies pursued by foreign countries and the land available in this country for settlement by men discharged from the military service has been made. A special phase of this restoration work is the rehabilitation, reeducation, and reemployment of men disabled in the service of the country. In the study of these problems the Commissioner of Labor Statistics is cooperating with the Federal Board for Vocational Education and Surgeon General's Office.

At the request of the shipbuilding, an investigation into the cost of living in shipbuilders' families is being conducted in different parts of the country. The results of this investigation are being used in making of awards in the settlement of wage disputes in shipbuilding.

The work of classifying and standardizing occupations in Government service and in industries doing war work is being carried on under the direction of the United States Commissioner of Labor and Statistics for the United States Employment Service, in cooperation with the War Department, the Navy Department, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the Civil Service Commission, and the Bureau of the Census.

BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION.
[Anthony Caminetti, Commissioner General.]

The war activities of this bureau may be summarized as follows:

Supervision of the importation of skilled men for the manufacture of munitions and other war materials, in cooperation with the Canadian Department of Immigration and Colonization, so far as such importations from Canada are concerned, to prevent harmful interference with such work in both countries.

Strict examination of all aliens entering the United States with a view to the detection of alien enemies endeavoring to pass as friendly neutrals; as immigration officers are expert in handling aliens of all classes, they are peculiarly well fitted to deal with such persons in a skilled way. It is the Department of Labor that stands between us and the undesirable immigrant.

Interchange of information and cooperation with the investigative agencies of the Departments of Justice, War, Navy, and Treasury in dealing with aliens who are amenable to action under the immigration laws. These relationships are highly confidential and can not be more fully described without prejudice to the work being done.

Cooperation (particularly at New York) with the Post Office Department in checking up the foreign-language newspapers. The facilities of the Immigration Service in the way of translators have been placed at the disposal of the postal authorities.

Supervision of the importation of agricultural and other labor for temporary periods, incident to keeping up production on farm products, particularly in the West and Southwest.

Supervision of alien seamen coming ashore for purposes of reshipment.

Deportation of aliens found advocating or teaching anarchy, sabotage, or other methods of destroying life or property.

German and Austrian seamen taken from merchant vessels at the time of the declaration of a state of war with those countries have been interned under the control of this bureau. At the request of the Swiss Legation, through the State Department, they are about to be transferred to the jurisdiction of the War Department. There will still remain under the control of the bureau aliens arrested in the United States under departmental warrant who have been found advocating anarchy, the destruction of life and property, or who are in this country in violation of any other portion of the immigration law and who must be interned until opportunities of deportation occur.

There has also been organized an alien enemy observation division, which keeps in touch with the officials of upwards of 30,000 labor organizations and conveys to the Department of Justice such information as may be gathered relative to enemy activities.

CHILDREN'S BUREAU.

[Julia C. Lathrop, Chief.]

In April, 1917, the Children's Bureau began a study of materials available in this country about the effect of war conditions upon children in certain European countries. The studies were not concerned with the children immediately within the war zones, but with children in city and country "behind the lines" whose experiences should be of value for the protection of American children in war time. The following reports have been published:

Care of Dependents of Enlisted Men in Canada.

Governmental Provisions in the United States and Foreign Countries for Members of the Military Forces and their Dependents.

Child Labor in Warring Countries.

The following papers based on the bureau's study have been published by members of the staff in technical reviews and have been reprinted for distribution by the bureau:

Infant Welfare Work in War Time.

Illegitimacy in Europe as Affected by the War.

Child Labor in Warring Countries.

The bureau directed the preparation of the report on soldiers' dependents in Canada by Mr. S. Herbert Wolfe, of New York. Capt. (now Maj.) Wolfe was detailed to cooperate with the bureau and supervise the preparation of the bureau's second report, which gives in detail the provisions made in the United States and 12 foreign countries for soldiers' dependents. Throughout the study for the second report the bureau's readers had the cordial cooperation of the War Department, of the Navy Department, of the Pension Bureau, and of the Library of Congress. The material assembled by the Children's Bureau was used by the special committees appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the committee on labor of the Council of National Defense to draft the measure (enacted on Oct. 6, 1917) for the compensation of American soldiers and the care of their families. The chief of the Children's Bureau was a member of these committees.

Special studies of the decreased use of milk in families with small children because of its rising cost have been made in three cities by local agencies, under the supervision of the bureau. In cooperation with the Food Administration and the Department of Agriculture a bulletin on "Milk, the Indispensable Food for Children," has been issued.

A brief war-time program for the protection of children was outlined in the bureau's last annual report.

In January, 1918, the Children's Bureau, in consultation with the child welfare department of the woman's committee of the Council of National Defense, expanded this program and outlined special activities to prevent unnecessary deaths of babies and to protect children from the hazards of war time. The Children's Bureau has published a popular statement of the importance and the purpose of "Children's Year" leaflets in suggestions for the work of the local committees.

BUREAU OF NATURALIZATION.

[Richard K. Campbell, Commissioner General.]

The war activities of the Bureau of Naturalization consist of administering the law by which all of the soldiers of foreign birth who are not citizens may be naturalized, whether in the United States or in a foreign country under military jurisdiction of the United States. This work is now being carried on, and in all of the cantonments throughout the United States thousands of American soldiers have had citizenship conferred upon them under this activity of this bureau. It is also actively cooperating with the War Department and the military forces, including the local Army exemption boards throughout the United States, in locating aliens declared subject to the Army draft law.

In cooperation with the public schools throughout the United States, it is fostering and developing with increasing force a spirit of loyalty and devotion to the Nation among the entire foreign body in all parts of the country. Through these foreigners who have taken a solemn oath to become citizens of the United States the influence and effect of the Bureau of Naturalization is being felt throughout the entire foreign body. While the bureau does not induce foreigners to take the oath of citizenship or to take any step in that direction, it does direct its energies to arousing in the minds and souls of the foreign residents a sense of their loyalty and obligation to this country. This force which the Bureau of Naturalization has created in this one-third of the population of the Nation has already reacted and is shown in the large number of reports of loyal aliens to the Bureau of Naturalization through its naturalization examiners in the field, both directly and indirectly, of alien-enemy activity. The bureau has been authorized by Congress to place in the hands of each candidate for citizenship who attends the citizenship classes which the public schools all over the United States are forming at the instance of this bureau a standard course in citizenship instruction. This book is to be presented without cost and will be as soon as it is delivered from the Government Printing Office.

The only bureaus of the Federal Government with which this bureau is coordinating its work at the present time are the bureaus of the War Department having charge of the work referred to and the Council of National Defense.

INFORMATION AND EDUCATION SERVICE.

[Roger W. Babson, Director General.]

War needs demand expansion to include sectional divisions of publicity, information, industrial plants, and labor reports.

The important aim of all these divisions is the development of sound public sentiment among both employers and wage earners concerning the real issues of the war. The publicity section, which already cooperates with the Committee on Public Information, includes all newspaper, magazine, and educational work of any kind, bringing before the public material that will be of practical value in improving conditions from every angle to give more efficient war production.

An inquiry office is already acting as a medium between industrial information and the public, who need help to work intelligently, but are not acquainted with the source. At present a force of 12 to 15 speakers is continuously on the road all over the country telling the story of the issues of the war and the service this and other divisions offer for the public's use in furthering war production. This is done before existing organizations or by general public meetings.

To the industrial-plants section belongs the responsibility of helping the labor situation by offering advanced employment-management methods; issuing posters for factory distribution; stimulating interest in Government work among employees; and starting a competitive campaign to reduce turnover.

Daily labor reports from the 400 United States Employment Service offices are handled by the other section. These are condensed into weekly summaries showing labor shortage and surplus in different industries. The compilations are used not only by the Department of Labor but by all Government departments functioning on labor to secure and distribute labor according to the supply and demand.

BUREAU OF INDUSTRIAL HOUSING AND TRANSPORTATION.

[Otto M. Eidlitz, Director General.]

The function of this Bureau of Industrial Housing and Transportation is to arrange for housing labor employed on Army and Navy contracts by—

1. Discovering vacant dwellings and rooms.
2. Organizing and maintaining room registries.
3. Opening up the suburbs through improved transportation facilities.
4. Commandeering available living quarters not otherwise in use.
5. Construction of new, temporary, or permanent dwellings, and by building communities of houses where large operations are needed.

The bureau cooperates in its activities with other Government departments or bureaus as follows:

1. War Department, Ordnance Department, and Quartermaster and Signal Corps, by investigating housing needs in the vicinity of arsenals and industrial establishments producing for the above departments and bureaus and by recommending and carrying out relief for the needs which its investigations reveal.
2. Navy Department, Bureau of Yards and Docks, and the Bureau of Ordnance by making investigations and plans for the relief of housing needs in the vicinity of navy yards, proving grounds, and war industries filling Navy contracts.
3. Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation. Some of the projects of the bureau are in cities in which the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation have projects. Under these circumstances there is an interchange of reports of investigators and a joint agreement as to the selection of sites and making allotments.

WAR LABOR POLICIES BOARD.

[Felix Frankfurter, Chairman.]

The War Labor Policies Board is under the direction of Felix Frankfurter, assistant to the Secretary. This service is endeavoring to coordinate the war-labor policies of the different departments and boards of the Government, from which may be formulated a common Government war-labor policy. The War Labor Policies Board as organized is composed of representatives of the War, Navy, and Agricultural Departments; the Fleet Corporation; the Railroad, Food, and Fuel Administrations; the War Industries Board, and the chief of each of the bureaus and administrative divisions of the Department of Labor.

Through a series of committees representing the various interested departments of the Government, the board is now considering the ways and means for centralizing labor recruiting through the United States Employment Service, the standardization of wages of skilled and unskilled labor, the centralization of data in regard to industrial relations, and the standardization in Government contracts of clauses pertaining to industrial relations. These and other matters are being considered with a view to reaching in a just, deliberate manner conditions making for stability and the largest productivity of the labor of the country.

Through this service the question of rent profiteering in industrial centers has been taken up. An experiment at New London, Conn., a method of regulating rentals through a large committee divided into a subcommittee of three—one professional, one business, and one working man—which will pass upon any complaints of rent profiteering, has been given publicity by the board. The hope is that the public sentiment created by any violations of the award of such committees will have a restraining influence upon rent profiteering. The plan was suggested by Mr. Richard Washburn Child, who was sent in here by the department to look into complaints that had been made about excessive profiteering.

NEW DIVISIONS.

CONDITIONS OF LABOR SERVICE.

[Grant Hamilton, Director.]

The purpose of this service is to examine into the matter of working conditions in the war industries, to determine the standards as to conditions which should be maintained in the war industries, to adopt rules embodying such standards and explaining them, to determine the best means for securing the adoption and maintenance of such standards, and to cooperate with State authorities for the above purposes.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY SERVICE.

[Mary Van Kleeck, Director.]

The purpose of this service is to consider all general policies with respect to women in industry and to advise the Secretary of Labor as to the policies which should be pursued; to keep informed of the work of the several divisions of the department in so far as they relate to women in industry and to advise with the divisions on all such work; to secure information on all matters relating to women in industry and to collate such information into useful form; to establish connections with all governmental departments and divisions on this subject and with voluntary agencies and societies.

TRAINING AND DILUTION SERVICE.

[Charles T. Clayton, Director.]

The purpose of this service is to ascertain the best methods used in various plants and industrial establishments for training workers to do specific work; to ascertain the needs for such training of workers; to provide information on this subject to the various plants, industrial establishment, and employees, and to promote such training wherever it is necessary or desirable; to inspect the operation of such training and to report thereon, and to cooperate with the United States Employment Service in all of this work.

For the foregoing statements as to the activities of the new "services" of the Department of Labor I am indebted to the "Committee on Public Information." My object in calling them to the attention of the House and the country at this time is to emphasize the fact that here within the jurisdiction of the youngest department of Government is found machinery created by law and directed by an able and conscientious official—Secretary Wilson—which has proved its efficaciousness in coping with the tremendous industrial problems of war and which will also prove of inestimable value in the reconstruction period which must follow the proclamation of peace—when our people take up their former pursuits and our victorious armies return from the battle fields of Europe.

Could an administration do more toward caring for the great army of toilers in the greatest industrial nation on the globe?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will my colleague state the subject?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; on the war.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. On the pending peace proposition?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the situation is so tense and fraught with such possibilities——

Mr. MADDEN. I am not going to say anything that will make it any more tense, I think.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. In view of the situation, I do not like to object. I should prefer the gentleman not to make the request.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not withdraw the request.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Then I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE RESERVE CORPS (H. REPT. 829).

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 440.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 63, entitled "Joint resolution to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service"; that there shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate. At the conclusion of such general debate the resolution shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the resolution shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas has 20 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has just been read at the Clerk's desk provides for the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 63——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-one gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Ellsworth	Kearns	Roberts
Anthony	Elston	Kelley, Mich.	Robinson
Ashbrook	Emerson	Kennedy, R. I.	Rowe
Austin	Estopinal	Kettner	Rowland
Ayres	Fairchild, G. W.	Key, Ohio	Russell
Bacharach	Fairfield	King	Sabath

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that there is not going to be a quorum present. I do not want to stop the consideration of this bill, so I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that. One hundred and seventy-eight Members have answered to their names, not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 15, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication for the Secretary of the Interior submitting additional estimates of appropriation required by the Reclamation Service for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1325); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation required by the Navy Department for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1326); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Ordnance Department of the Army for armament of fortifications for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1327); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1328); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13072) to incorporate the War Mothers of America, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 827), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4886) providing for the sale of certain lands in the original town site of Port Angeles, Wash., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 828), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DENTON: A bill (H. R. 13072) to incorporate the War Mothers of America; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. GARD: A bill (H. R. 13073) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroads to their employees in certain cases," approved April 22, 1908, and amended April 5, 1910; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LITTLE: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 336) expressing the views of the Congress of the United States on justice to the Armenian people; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. VAN DYKE: A bill (H. R. 13074) granting a pension to Patrick H. Brown; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13075) granting an increase of pension to W. J. Wilson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WELTY: A bill (H. R. 13076) granting a pension to Presley F. Black; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. McARTHUR: Petition from the Oregon Pure Bred Live Stock Association, pledging the support of the association to the President of the United States during the war, and asking Congress to enact such laws as shall forever banish from our shores all persons who shall in any way be inimical to our great country; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. SCULLY: Petition of Perth Amboy Council of Defense, protesting against reconstruction of the T. A. Gillespie plant at Morgan, N. J.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Br. Mr. CLASSON: Petition of Mosquito Hill Local Union, No. 6847, A. S. of E., on the subject of taxation of war profits; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 15, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, whose loving heart is ever in sympathy with Thy children, let Thy mercy be upon a suffering and sorrowing world and send us relief from the ravages of pestilence, fire, and the sword.

We thank Thee for the clear and decisive answer of our President to the people of Germany in their overtures for peace. Let it come, our Heavenly Father, but with all the assurances laid down in the President's reply, that justice and righteousness may be assured to us, our allies, and all humanity. In Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INFLUENZA.

Mr. LAZARO rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Louisiana rise?

Mr. LAZARO. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on influenza in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the subject of the influenza plague. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about the influenza situation in the District of Columbia. It is evident, from the reports, that influenza is spreading and the death rate increasing. If ever there was a time when the people should keep cool, avoid hysteria, and cooperate with the authorities in their fight against this disease it is now. The health authorities understand the situation thoroughly and are undoubtedly doing all they can, but it is necessary that the people cooperate with them in order to succeed.

The situation in the District of Columbia is an unusual one. On account of the war it was necessary to enlarge the governmental activities suddenly. The result was that thousands of clerks from all over the country came to Washington to work. One of the most difficult problems they met was in securing rooms. I know, from personal observation as a physician, that they are crowded, often three and four in small rooms, often not well ventilated and without the necessary heat. I say I know that this condition exists from personal observation, because several times recently I have been asked by parents and friends of these people to visit them when it was difficult to get physicians here. Another thing, with the high cost of living and the small salaries paid these clerks, many of them are compelled to room in one place and eat outside. There is no doubt at all in my mind but that their vitality is reduced as a result of it and renders them more liable to develop complications, such as broncho-pneumonia, which is responsible for the high death rate. Then, too, this sudden increase in the population, with the epidemic on, has placed an extra strain on the hospital facilities, the medical profession, and the nurses.

However, if the people here will keep calm, avoid hysteria, and follow the instructions of the health authorities, and assist in stamping out this epidemic, it will not be very long before the situation will be well in hand. According to my way of thinking, the most vital problems we are facing and must solve as soon as possible are overcrowding, furnishing necessary heat, nutritious food at a reasonable price, and assisting in nursing the patients properly. We should have increased hospital facilities at once, more physicians, and more nurses. The permanent population, especially those who have means and the time, should cooperate with the health authorities and help relieve this situation, and especially give all the relief they can to these thousands of boys and girls who have left their homes and parents to come here and work for the Government so as to make it possible to prosecute this war with speed and success.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I say that the people here should be calm and avoid hysteria and cooperate with the health authorities in order to stamp out this epidemic I mean this: For instance, on yesterday I was asked by a friend of mine to go and see his secretary, who was sick. I found that young man in a room on the third floor. I did the best I could for him under the circumstances. Upon coming down I found the lady of the house, a lady about 45 or 50 years of age, a very intelligent lady, on the first floor scared to death. She asked me this question: "Doctor, what shall I do to protect myself and my children?" I said, "Madam, the only protection you have in this house is to see that this boy on the third floor gets good medical attention and proper nursing during the physician's absence and nutritions food, and that his room be kept clean. In other words, the sooner he gets proper attention the quicker he will get well and the quicker the danger of infection will be removed from your house."

You will understand from that case exactly what I mean. If the people will only keep cool and avoid hysteria and assist the medical authorities in giving attention to these clerks who have come here and need attention, I think it will be a question of a very short time when this epidemic will be at an end. My intention in addressing the House this morning is to appeal to the Members to look into the condition of these thousands of clerks who have come here suddenly and see that they get needed attention.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an editorial from the Journal of the American Medical Association on influenza, dated October 5, 1918. It is one of the latest editorials in the Journal, and the Journal is the official organ of the American Medical Association.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is a practitioner of medicine, and of course understands hygiene. Does he not think a mistake was made in not undertaking to combat this disease by the District authorities when it first broke out?

Mr. LAZARO. Well, I will answer the gentleman from Oklahoma in this way: It makes no difference where and when an epidemic starts; we are always a little slow in adopting the measures that we should adopt in order to stamp it out.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahom. The gentleman knows, I assume, that after the epidemic had broken out and had infected practically the entire city, the schools were still open, and that in a few days they had to be closed, whereas if they had not opened the schools the District might not have been infected as it is now.

Mr. LAZARO. No. I think all these epidemics follow in the same channel. When they begin we are always in hope that with ordinary measures they will be stamped out, but we find out in the course of time that we have to resort to measures that are more radical in order to stamp out the epidemic.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the editorial referred to:

THERAPEUTICS.

EPIDEMIC INFLUENZA.

Under various names epidemics corresponding to epidemic influenza have occurred at irregular intervals since accurate descriptions have been made of disease. It is likely that at still earlier times this disease was combined and confused with other epidemic disorders and so did not stand out as an entity until a relatively modern period. In early English literature this disease is spoken of under a variety of terms. Creighton (Creighton: History of Epidemics in Britain, 1894) recognizes it under the name "ague," used by the British seventeenth century authors. In 1658 Cromwell died from this disease, when Morton says the country was "one vast hospital." The Italian term "influenza" first came to England in association with the epidemic of 1743, and it has been employed in connection with the great epidemics of 1833, 1847, and 1889–90.

About 1712 the French term "la grippe" came into use and has been periodically revived ever since. The great pandemics usually originated in the Far East and gradually extended westward. The rate of human travel and the degree of intercourse between various parts of the world determined the rapidity of the extension. Besides the great pandemics scarcely a year has passed without local outbreaks, which have been classed under the term "influenza." Whether these are identical with the more widespread epidemics it is impossible to say.

The severity of the disease has varied greatly; some epidemics are very mild, others have been severe. Influenza has embraced America in several pandemics. In his remarkable work on epidemic diseases, published in Hartford in 1799, Noah Webster locates the first American epidemic of which he could find an account in 1647. It passed through the whole country and extended to the West Indies. There were between 5,000 and 6,000 deaths in Barbardos and St. Kitts. In 1655 a second severe epidemic occurred in America. Benjamin Rush described an epidemic in 1789 in Philadelphia, which was brought there by members of the First Congress, which had assembled in New York. Daniel Drake records a widespread epidemic in the West in 1807.

The history of epidemics of influenza does not differ so much from that of other diseases spread by human intercourse that are usually called contagious. A widespread epidemic follows the introduction of a specially virulent virus, and there follows a general immunity among those of the population who have been infected. As the epidemic dies out the infection decreases in virulence and only sporadic cases occur. From such cases and probably chronic carriers local outbreaks occur, but the general immunity prevents any general epidemic. After a period of years a new susceptible population has replaced the immune one, and with the introduction of a fresh virulent virus a general epidemic is again brought about. This would account for the great susceptibility of young persons, and as it is 28 years since the last great epidemic we should not expect many individuals above 30 years of age to be now affected.

CAUSATION.

The causative agent of epidemic influenza has not been certainly recognized. The attachment of the name "influenza bacillus" to a small bacillus described by Pfeiffer in 1892 has been followed by its frequent reception as the actual specific agent. There is, however, much uncertainty as to its etiologic rôle. It is to be hoped that the study of the present epidemic may lead to some certain knowledge regarding the essential cause of the disease. This should enable us to determine whether the endemic cases and those of limited mild epidemics are really identical with the ones observed in the great periodic outbreaks.

COURSE OF THE DISEASE.

The cases in the present epidemic begin usually quite suddenly with pain in the head, back, eyes, limbs, and joints. With the pains there is great prostration, chilliness, and a fever of from 101° to 104° F. The pulse does not become very rapid, and the patient often is drowsy. Vomiting may occur. Sometimes there may be diarrhea, but usually there is constipation. After the disease has become established the mucous membranes of the nose and throat become reddened, and there is sneezing and redness of the conjunctiva. Involvement of the larynx, causing hoarseness, and of the bronchi, causing cough, is common. There is an associated leukopenia or a normal leukocyte count. A leukocytosis points to some complication. The fever gradually falls to normal after a few days and more or less prostration is present during convalescence. A transient albuminuria is frequent. Many of the cases have hemorrhages of the mucous membrances of the nose, some of the urethra or bowel.

SECONDARY PNEUMONIA.

Not infrequently a lobular pneumonia develops after a few days, and this is responsible for most of the fatalities. The pneumonia differs from the usual picture of pneumonia, in that the temperature may be very slight, and the pulse rate may give little indication of the gravity of the condition. These cases, instead of subsiding, may come down to practically normal temperature for 12 hours; then there may be a sharp rise in temperature, not followed by a chill, backache, boneache, headache, or nausea.

About this time there may also be expectoration containing bright red blood. As a rule, 12 or 24 hours after the second rise of temperature on physical examination in the lower lung, in a preponderance of cases on the left side, as seen at Great Lakes, small areas about the size of a silver dollar of typical pneumonic consolidation are found by auscultation. These areas may become marked so that by the second day of the second rise scattered through the lung, probably both lungs, 10 or 15 of these small areas may have appeared. In the epidemic at Great Lakes, if the patient did well these would gradually disappear. They did not resolve as a pneumonia would resolve. The clearing up of the lung after this in the recovered patients was remarkable as to its rapidity. Other cases went on to a typical lobar, massive consolidation, as far as the physical signs were concerned, with dullness, increase in fremitus, typical tubular voice and breathing, and all the signs, except that there was not a very marked increase in the pulse rate, and the respirations were not up to this time markedly increased. Cases with almost complete consolidation of the lung, as to the lower lobes, with a temperature of 105°, would have a pulse around 100, with respirations 24 or 26. There may be rapidly developing toxemia and vasomotor depression, with death of the patient resulting in many cases.

INCUBATION PERIOD.

The incubation period in these influenzas is probably very short, but it is difficult to obtain accurate figures on this point. The disease is probably spread entirely by contact infection, the virus of the disease being disseminated for short distances through droplets driven into the air in coughing and sneezing. Circumstances which favor this means of spread, such as crowding in cars, favor the spread of the disease.

TREATMENT.

The treatment of the disease is largely symptomatic. Acetylsalicylic acid or similar remedies may be required to relieve the pain. The acetylsalicylic acid may be given in a dosage of 1 gram (15 grains) every three hours, as advised by Hewlett, or a smaller dose combined with 0.1 gram (2 grains) of acetphenetidin, until symptomatic relief is secured. Warm baths may give relief, although in numerous cases seen at the Cook County Hospital hydrotherapeutic methods failed and were discarded. The mouth should be kept clean, and elimination stimulated by the free ingestion of water and hot drinks. The patient should be kept in bed in a well-ventilated room until the fever has disappeared. Chilling should be avoided. The latter precautions will do much in avoiding the occurrence of complications.

When pneumonia develops, as indicated by moist râles in the base of the lungs, with or without dullness on percussion, the patient demands particular care. Every effort must be made to provide for an adequate intake of fluids, and for nourishment which must be given in fluid form to a large extent. Warm packs are often useful, combined with the application of cold to the head. With any indication of failing heart, stimulants are indicated.

In the cases of secondary pneumonia, many of which result fatally, the chief conditions to be combated are the severe toxemia and the vasomotor depression. The toxemia may be combated by the usual methods, getting fluids into the body by mouth or proctoclysis or even by hypodermoclysis. Small doses of epinephrin may be given at the same time. The removal of the toxemia may be aided by securing elimination, giving large doses of salts, such as magnesium citrate, or by the giving of calomel. In severe cases, venesection may prove extremely valuable. If a marked cyanosis occurs, as is frequently the case, this may be combated by the use of oxygen by inhalation, perhaps according to the method devised by Meltzer, or even as has been suggested by Dr. F. Tice, by injection of oxygen under the skin. The prostration is to be combated by the use of the usual stimulants, such as caffein and sodium benzoate, digitalis, strophanthus or camphorated oil, usually hypodermically. The final stages in this pneumonia are frequently a massive exudation into the lungs and bronchi. At the Great Lakes Naval Training Station efforts have been made to combat this by the use of morphin and large doses of atropin, in some cases as much as 0.0025 gram, or one twenty-fifth grain, being used.

Specific measures are not available in the treatment of influenza. With certain identification of the causal agent we may hope for some specific protective measures, and perhaps for some specific therapeutic serum.

In the absence of a specific virus to be used in immunizing animals, there remains but one source of a therapeutic serum at the present time. This is in the blood of persons recently recovered from the disease. It is quite probable that the blood of convalescent patients contains antibodies for the specific agent of the disease. It would be desirable to inject citrated convalescent blood into the muscles of patients with pneumonia at least. Naturally, such blood should be known to give a negative Wassermann reaction. In view of the strikingly beneficial results from convalescent serum in scarlet fever secured by a number of observers, it seems reasonable to try this in influenzal pneumonia, especially as it is devoid of any harmful effects.

PROPHYLAXIS.

The measures to be taken to prevent the spread of the disease comprise all those which interfere with the transfer of the infectious materials from the sick to the uninfected. This includes isolation of the patient, and the intelligent use of proper gauze masks by the attendant. In the time of an epidemic, prompt and efficient isolation of the first cases in a community could accomplish much. If this has been neglected and the infection has spread among the population, measures which prevent the coming together of numbers of persons in close quarters are to be employed. The desirability of closing schools in a large city in the presence of an epidemic is a measure of doubtful value. In smaller places this is more reasonable, and the danger of infection when children are outdoors should be less than when they are brought together in a schoolroom.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3470) to amend section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 179. Joint resolution authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10609. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the present Federal building site at Eatonton, Ga., for another site on the public square in said city; and

H. J. Res. 331. Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 12402. An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes; and

H. R. 12982. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to purchase from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a large dry dock and appurtenant lands.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by the late James A. Garfield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by Gen. James A. Garfield, late President of the United States. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. KEATING. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WALDOW, for an indefinite period, on account of illness in his family; and

To Mr. HUTCHINSON (at the request of Mr. BROWNING), for an indefinite period, on account of serious illness in his family.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business in order to-morrow on Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FOSTER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. FOSTER. I want to take up the rule for consideration that we had up yesterday morning.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker knows; but under a special order of the House the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has 40 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not that rule have priority and precedence, the previous question having been ordered?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. But, Mr. Speaker, this consent was given after the previous question was ordered, and the arrangement was that it was to follow the reading of the Journal.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is in error. It was granted before the previous question was ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Well, that makes the arrangement all the stronger.

Mr. VARE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. VARE. I disagree with my colleague from Massachusetts. I was under the impression that it was granted with the understanding that the special business that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] had before the House was to be considered first.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman knows that you can not grant permission conditionally.

Mr. VARE. Oh, yes; we frequently do.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not care to take up the time of the House if I can get unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object to that.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I insist on my time.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that under the rules of the House anything which is made in order under a rule would set aside other business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, the unanimous consent was given, but a special order of the House came in after that. Now, that special order has not been completed up to this time, and being a privileged resolution it seems to me that under those circumstances the business made the special order under that resolution would come first.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman will permit, the House had proceeded with that business until it found itself without a quorum. It is really the unfinished business of yesterday that was proceeding when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] obtained his unanimous consent to address the House to-day. I think a fair construction of the situation would be that the business that was started on yesterday that was suspended for the want of a quorum should now proceed to its conclusion before the gentleman from Texas obtains the floor.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. FOSTER. In just a moment. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that to-day is probably the last day we will have before the Army deficiency bill comes in. If this bill is to be passed at all to do any good in this epidemic which is going through the country now, we ought to pass it to-day, and I believe the gentleman ought to find an opportunity to address the House upon the subject in which he is interested at some other time and let us pass this little bill, which it is believed will be of great service in assisting the Surgeon General, and will help to stamp out this disease that is taking away so many of our people.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope under the circumstances the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his request.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of no quorum present.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman will not do that. This is an important bill——

Mr. DOWELL. If the bill is to be presented, and we are to proceed with the business of the House, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my point of order; but I shall raise it again if we are to sit here and listen to something that is of no importance for half the afternoon.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course we can not confine ourselves as to that.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman should have made his objection yesterday.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman is not making my objection. I will make it at the proper time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to follow the consideration of this bill, I am willing to waive the time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] withdraw his point of order?

Mr. DOWELL. If the business of the House is to be proceeded with, I will withdraw my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws his point of order as to a quorum, and the gentleman from Texas will follow the matter presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. WALSH. Under what arrangement will he follow the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. Under the arrangement that he said he would waive his right if he could have his 40 minutes after the consideration of the gentleman's bill.

Mr. WALSH. If he waives his right, then he loses his right to address the House. Let him ask permission to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but this is an effort to arrange a modus vivendi by which we can go on with the business.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for the time allotted me after this business is completed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 40 minutes after the matter which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has in charge is disposed of. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the point of no quorum, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

RESERVE IN THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution which we were considering yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 440.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. J. Res. 63, entitled "Joint resolution to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service"; that there shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate. At the conclusion of such general debate the resolution shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the resolution shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution presented is for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 63, providing for a medical reserve for the Public Health Service. As some Members know, I have not been in favor of the House bill, as it is written as an amendment to the Senate joint resolution, but I want to do all that I can to relieve the distress that exists throughout the country to-day.

The public health officials believe that if they are enabled to commission men for the time being—which is not a permanent matter—that they can send them from one part of the country to another where the doctors are badly needed. For instance, the Public Health Service has been able so far to get some physicians to go from one part of the country to the other. They found the other day two physicians in the State of Indiana that they were able to send to the State of North Carolina, where the conditions were so urgent from this disease that they found it absolutely necessary to do so. In the State of Ohio, at East Palestine, the conditions were such, as reported to the Public Health Service, that people were dying without being able to obtain the services of a nurse or a physician. The conditions reported from some parts of the country are critical, and they exist throughout the country everywhere.

This attack or epidemic of influenza is the worst our country ever suffered from. We have had numerous epidemics of influenza in the past, but never before in the history of the country have they been so severe as this one is. If you read the daily papers you see that in the city of Washington the number of deaths is large.

There is a peculiarity about this disease. It first appeared along the Atlantic coast, where more than a thousand died in the city of Boston alone. It then broke out in the State of Arizona, and the State of Montana, way across the country, across the Rocky Mountains. Then it appeared later in the Middle West. It appeared in Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and Iowa, which were free from it while it existed in Arizona and Montana.

The Public Health Service has had some reports throughout the country as to the fatality of this disease. In the Army, where the previous death rate was 4 per thousand, it increased to 80 per thousand, an enormous increase. Every Member, I am sure, is aware of the great number of boys in these camps from all parts of the country that have lost their lives as a result of this disease.

This joint resolution has the indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, in a letter to Mr. POU, of the Rules Committee, which I shall ask to insert in the RECORD. The Public Health Service has been very insistent that this legislation be passed, and that they might call these men, not those going into the Army but those above the age that usually go into the Army, and commission them for a time. This bill provides that it shall expire by limitation in five years. However, the committee may change that provision, making it a less or longer time. The bill carries an appropriation of $300,000 for the Public Health Service, and they ask that that appropriation be stricken from the bill. They say that the money that Congress has already appropriated can be used for this purpose, and that it will be unnecessary to make further appropriation.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I notice from the press reports that boys in the camps die from pneumonia. Is pneumonia the result of the influenza or is the pneumonia the influenza itself?

Mr. FOSTER. Pneumonia is the result of the influenza. The influenza attacks the mucous membrane of the throat and nose and then extends down to the bronchial tubes and the lungs and results in pneumonia.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state whether it is different from the ordinary form of pneumonia?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not, except that possibly it is of a more severe type.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If this bill becomes a law, is it not the purpose to send these physicians to communities throughout the country where the doctors have been called into the Army in such numbers that it has left those communities without the necessary medical attendants? Is it not the purpose to send these men to those communities to relieve the situation?

Mr. FOSTER. That is exactly it; that is the reason why physicians were asked to go from Indiana and sent to North Carolina.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have had letters in the last three days showing that those conditions exist in Indiana where they are in want of necessary medical attendance.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. VARE. Has the Health Department secured data as to the services of physicians in different parts of the country that they can avail themselves of?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; they sent out first a thousand telegrams to different parts of the country trying to secure physicians. Out of those they have had about 150 or 200 favorable replies.

Mr. VARE. And the gentleman is of the opinion that if this bill is passed it will give immediate relief?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I believe it will aid materially, because they can commission these men and send them to different parts of the country.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. What are the salaries of these commissioned officers?

Mr. FOSTER. They will correspond to those in the Army of first lieutenant, captain, major, and lieutenant colonel.

Mr. GORDON. Can not the gentleman give it in dollars and cents?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Ohio knows as much about that as I do; he is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORDON. Do they get allowances?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; they get allowances.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand, there will be no age limit in case they find surgeons who are in good health.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no age limit.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I mention that because I know of some cases where men in excellent health have applied for appointment in the Army and have been rejected on account of age.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what this is for—to take men who are not eligible for service in the Army. There are about 140,000 physicians in the United States. Probably 20,000 of those are not in active practice. There are some 30,000 to 35,000 who have gone into the Army, so that you can figure out what a shortage there is. If there are some communities where there may be a surplus of doctors and others that have none, it may be possible to send those physicians where there is a surplus to places where they are badly needed. They have taken nurses from the city of Milwaukee a long distance over the country where they have not been able to secure nurses to take charge of this disease. The Public Health Service is bending every effort it possibly can to relieve this awful situation that exists in the country.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the necessity for commissioning these men? You can not compel them to enlist. It must be voluntary. If they are willing to enter the service in the interest of humanity and the department has already got the money to pay the expenses and salaries, what is the necessity of giving them a commission to extend over a period of five years. It seems to me that all they have got to do is to get every physician who is willing to volunteer and pay him and let him go into the service now.

Mr. FOSTER. I said to the Surgeon General, or his assistant, that if there was any doctor in the United States who was so derelict in his duty that he would not serve in a crisis like this, he would not be fit to be commissioned in the Public Health Service. He replied that that was not the idea at all. Many of these men who may be commissioned will be sent throughout the country. Many of them will go without commissions, so far as that is concerned, but they would meet up with medical men who would supersede them. I mean by that, medical men in the Army, working as they would be with the Surgeon General's office. The commissioned men would supersede these others and they would have no authority. The doctors of the country have always responded to crises like this. I cite the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] and the House to the heroic work that medical men have done in the past. The other day I mentioned the Walter Reed commission, the yellow fever commission, which had three men appointed upon it, each one of whom died as a result of the disease that they were investigating. It was said of one that he could secure no volunteers, but they had men who did volunteer. There is one man in Indiana, in the district of the gentleman who stands at my left [Mr. BARNHART], who did volunteer and did his part to help find out what this disease was. One of these men put his hand into the jar where the mosquitoes were, in order that they might bite him, so that they could determine how long after the mosquito infested with yellow fever bit the patient before the patient took the disease. He lost his life as a result of that, but he was willing to make the sacrifice.

I say that any medical man who is not willing to go into danger under circumstances that may come is no better than a deserter who would fly in the face of the enemy [applause], and I know that the doctors of the country have always been patriotic, and they will be patriotic and true to their profession, whether they be commissioned or not.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the gentleman, and I believe all that he says in regard to the medical profession is true. That is exactly why I ask, What is the necessity for commissioning them? Here is a man who is just as patriotic, just as brave, just as competent as any other who will get his first lieutenant's commission, which carries a salary of $2,000, while some other man no braver, no better equipped to perform the service, no more loyal, will get a major's commission, perhaps, drawing $3,600 a year. If these men will volunteer, and I believe they will, to combat this danger in the interest of humanity, why commission them? Why not take every one who will go and pay him a salary and let him serve during this epidemic?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, the very purpose of this bill is to grant them commissions.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the point I make.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what the Public Health Service has been straining for for months past.

Mr. HAMLIN. There will be half a dozen discriminations in salary for the same work performed.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, we have that in many other things.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will not the fact that these men bear a commission from the United States obviate a great many difficulties in the way of regulations as they go from one State to another?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. In a moment.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. I call the attention of my friend from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] to the fact that the pending resolution rests the discretion in the President to terminate these commissions at any time, so that they will not necessarily continue for the full period of five years. In connection with the question he propounded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] I would like to quote briefly from a memorandum prepared by the Public Health Service.

The Public Health Service wishes it clearly understood that it does not believe that the doctors of the country are refusing to accept epidemic service because they are not offered a commission, but it does believe that when these doctors leave their homes and enter a serious epidemic, such as the influeuza has proven to be, such service should be recognized and rewarded with a commission.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question. I am heartily in favor of the measure, but I would like to know more about it. We have a situation in the city of Washington now in which a terrible epidemic is prevailing. Every physician in this city is working day and night.

Under the provisions of this bill some physician, to be called, possibly, from Baltimore, will be given an Army commission to come over here and do exactly the same work and take the same risk that these local physicians do. If you are going to commission a man called from one city where they have no epidemic to another where they have an epidemic, why not also commission the doctors who are in the midst of the trouble and risking their lives every day? I can not understand the line of distinction.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say to my friend from Indiana we have already commissioned about 30,000 physicians and surgeons in the Army.

Mr. BARNHART. Commissioning them does not add to their qualifications and self-sacrifice a particle.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman think there is no distinction between a doctor who goes from his State, in Indiana, and leaves his home and goes to the State of North Carolina or some other State and a man who is attending his patients in the town in which he lives? I think there is a great difference.

Mr. BARNHART. I say the man who goes from a community where there is no epidemic to assist in a community where an epidemic does prevail is entitled to no more credit than the local man who is doing his best in his unfortunate community.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree; but I am saying this, that the gentleman from Indiana would have a physician go without authority, as said by the gentleman from Louisiana, without any authority from the United States Government when he goes into that community, in a State of which he is not a resident.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, by printing the matter to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, October 10, 1918.

Hon. EDWARD W. POU,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. POU: Permit me to invite your attention to the necessity for the immediate passage of Senate joint resolution No. 63, to establish a sanitary reserve corps in the Public Health Service.

This resolution passed the Senate June 18, 1917, was favorably reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce August 30, 1917, and is now pending on the Union Calendar of the House. The object of this bill is to create a medical and sanitary reserve corps in the United States Public Health Service during the present national emergency.

The necessity for this legislation becomes especially urgent at this time because of the epidemic of influenza which has now invaded the whole of the United States and has become so serious as to cause the Provost Marshal General to cancel orders sending drafted men to camp. The passage of the resolution (S. J. Res. 63) is greatly needed in order that the medical and sanitary personnel employed by the Public Health Service may be commissioned. Under this resolution doctors who are required for service in the Army or Navy will not be selected, but it necessarily follows that doctors who are patriotic enough to join this sanitary reserve corps, at a great sacrifice, deserve the honor of a commission. Furthermore, under the provisions of Executive order of April 3, 1917, constituting the Public Health Service a part of the military forces of the United States, it would necessarily follow that the medical and sanitary personnel of the Public Health Service could be utilized, in so far as practicable, for duty in the Army or Navy.

I therefore urge upon you the necessity for reporting the resolution (H. Res. 440) now pending before your committee providing for the consideration of Senate joint resolution under a special rule. This is urgently needed at this time in order that the Public Health Service may meet the present situation, which constitutes a grave national danger.

Cordially, yours, W. G. MCADOO.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr Speaker, I think there is a misapprehension with respect to some of the provisions of this bill. Statements which have been made and questions which have been asked leave the impression that the bill is probably a part of the Army or in some way connected with the Army. As a matter of fact the Public Health Service is under the Treasury Department and these men are not commissioned as officers of the Army but they are commissioned by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service. They have no title beyond colonels or majors. They are commissioned in certain grades with similar rank to the Army and Navy, but they are not a part of either.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What particular class of people are these doctors to be appointed to treat, citizens?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; citizens.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is not to treat the military?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not the military at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman know of any reputable physician in this or any other previous epidemic who has ever refused to do his full duty as a physician in giving medical attention to sick people?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly not.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the occasion of opening here a military rank for possibly permanent retention in the service with salary?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what I was just attempting to answer. It does not open up an opportunity for military rank.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman must admit it is an entering wedge.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to say, in reply to the query propounded by the gentleman from Texas, that representatives of the Public Health Service, knowing I was opposed to the health bill, have called upon me on several occasions to have me withdraw my objection——

Mr. SLAYDEN. To this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. To this bill, and they stated that the purpose of this bill was to confer rank above that of second lieutenant upon the physicians of the country so that the physicians could go around with a uniform above the grade of second lieutenant. They informed me at the present time under existing regulations and law they are privileged to confer rank upon those physicians of second lieutenant and they wanted to confer a higher grade upon them as they go about the country.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is what I thought.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman here that this bill has had opposition for years, and it could not now pass if it were not for the epidemic that prevails throughout the country.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit, it seems to me the whole thing could be narrowed down—this bill does not propose to carry a dollar of appropriation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; the Public Health Service already has the money with which to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, the passage of the bill would not add to-day a single additional physician. They have got to depend upon the physician to volunteer his services. Now, the only thing it can do on earth is to put a uniform on these fellows, and that does not add to their qualifications.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this also true: It does not add, but it is more than that; they can now be uniformed, but only with the uniform of a second lieutenant. The desire is to give higher rank. Is not that the situation?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what is represented to me by those who are most insistent on this legislation.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would like to go on and make the statement I had in mind. As a matter of fact, everything that is contemplated under the provisions of this bill should, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, be carried out without the bill, but the contention is that this bill creates an organization that can coordinate throughout the States and across State lines and accomplish better results than the unorganized physicians of the country could accomplish. For instance, the States are not working in harmony to-day with the view of suppressing this epidemic. Kansas, my own State, through the health officer, has forbidden all assemblages of every character. That was done as soon as the epidemic began to show itself within the borders of the State. It was done with the view of preventing the spread of the disease in the State. It will be interesting to the future and interesting to other States to note the effect that forbidding the people to assemble or to gather in their usual places of meeting will have upon preventing the spread and growth of this epidemic that is prevailing throughout the country.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman understand that all the officers commissioned under this act would draw their salaries so long as they held their commissions?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hoped the gentleman was going to ask me some question germane to the matter that I was discussing.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not one of those who have any doubt about the patriotism of the doctors of the country or of the people of the country generally. The gentleman does not have to prove that to me, but what I would like to know is something about the bill. That is the important matter now before the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentlemen in charge of the bill will have their inning in a short time and will undoubtedly explain to the gentleman from Wyoming and others the purport and intent of the measure.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman means that he "passes the buck"?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman from Wyoming is disposed to put that construction upon my answer.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Kansas does not know what that means.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The reason I have consented, so far as I have had any part in bringing this bill up for consideration at this time, is because I believe that it will coordinate the activities of the physicians of the country and aid in a measure in suppressing the influenza where it exists and preventing it from spreading to where it does not exist. The organization, the uniform, the title, the button, the ribbon, the card, or whatever it is, that signifies a membership in the organization, with a head that can give orders, orders that are respected, will undoubtedly have a beneficial effect upon the activities of the physicians of the country in bringing about the results that the country so much desires.

Now, another thing. This will call into the service physicians who are practically now retired. The country has been literally combed for physicians, and they have been taken into the military and naval service. It is doubtful if there has been a time when the services of physicians have been as universally in demand as they are to-day. This will give older men an opportunity to work in connection with other physicians in their profession.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am just concluding now and I would rather not yield. I have promised some time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

And for the reasons I have stated I think the bill should have consideration. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution came to the House of Representatives from the Senate as long ago as June 26, of a year ago, and has received more than special consideration on my part in connection with the work of the Public Health Service. Shortly after the beginning of the war the Public Health Service conceived it should be its policy to branch out extensively and create a reserve corps of the physicians of the country that should be permanent. This resolution came over to the House carrying an appropriation of $300,000. It was opposed by many Members because they feared it would create a permanent force. The Committee on Appropriations had no objection to voting as much money as was necessary for temporary purposes, and in one of the appropriation bills a year ago the amount carried in this resolution, of $300,000, was voted to the Public Health Service to carry on the work of inspecting the zones tributary to our camps and cantonments.

On a casual visit to the War Department I inquired of Surg. Gen. Gorgas whether it was necessary to have the Public Health Service perform the work of sanitation and supervision around the camps and cantonments. He informed me that his office was willing and ready to perform the work of sanitation in territory tributary to the cantonments and camps, but that the Public Health Service requested that they should be permitted to perform that work, and he acquiesced. And accordingly $300,000 was appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations to allow the Public Health Service to perform work that was directly connected with the welfare of our soldiers at the camps and cantonments, and which could have been performed as well, if not better, by the accredited doctors connected with the Surgeon General's office and of the Army.

Mr. ESCH. As I understand it, there is no warrant of law that authorizes the Surgeon General's office to exercise any jurisdiction beyond the confines of a camp or cantonment?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no warrant of law, but the Surgeon General's office was willing to perform that work. However, the Public Health Service stepped in because we know that the respective bureaus of the Government want to magnify themselves in war time and have some work to do.

Then there came into the House this resolution, amended, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, granting commissions to members of the reserve corps and conferring certain ranks on civilian officers connected with some of the divisions of the bureau. I strenuously opposed it, and raised the question of no quorum one day when the chairman of the committee presented this resolution on Calendar Wednesday for consideration. The resolution was withdrawn. There came down here the health officer of the State of Wisconsin, who asked me to withdraw my objection. I asked him his reason for favoring this resolution. He said that young men of draft age who were doctors and were connected with the health activities of the respective States and municipalities were resigning, because they did not wish to be known as slackers, and desired to go into the Army service; but by this bill they would be given some kind of a status in the Government employ that would retain them in the sanitation work of the States. I said to the health commissioner of the State, "I suspected that was one of the purposes of the bill when I read it, and I am more strenuously opposed to it now than ever, because the Army needs, and pressingly needs, all the young men it can get for the Army service, and we should not throw the mantle of protection around any young men connected with municipal or State health boards in order to prevent them from going into the real service of the Army."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman from Michigan was on his feet first. I will yield to him first. Then I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DOREMUS. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin realize that this bill provides that the young men liable to military service shall not be exempted?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but it will prevent young men connected with the activities of States and municipalities from volunteering in the Army, because if they were not taken into this service they would be known as slackers. This resolution has the support of the health authorities of the States, and the health commissioner of my own city on three different occasions on that same day came and begged me to withdraw my opposition, and when he went home he gave out an interview to the papers of my city to the effect that I was opposed to establishing a reserve of the Public Health Service, not stating any reasons, but with the purpose to prejudice the minds of my constituents toward me by stating that I was opposed to the proper surveillance of the health activities of the Government, when that was not my purpose at all.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Texas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield for a short question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks that under this bill there is a sufficient increase in the number or scale of physicians to meet the present emergency?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not its purpose. Only yesterday a representative of the Public Health Service called upon me—and they have been calling upon me every week—and stated to me that in his opinion this bill would in no way have checked the present epidemic or increased the efficiency in any way of the Public Health Service in administering the million-dollar appropriation that was voted them a few weeks ago, when the epidemic became so critical in this country, and it was represented at other times by other representatives of the Public Health Service that the main purpose of this bill was to give a desired commissioned rank to the doctors who are performing service at present.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And to build up a bigger bureau?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. The main purpose, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, and quite correctly, is to build up a big bureau, to give them commissioned rank of higher grade than that of second lieutenant, because there were instances where doctors have refused to wear the uniform of a second lieutenant, but who wanted a proper grade commensurate with their station.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania and Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield first to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and then I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps the gentleman can answer the question which I asked of another gentleman, and which he could not answer. Under this bill the officers are to be commissioned to draw the salaries of their rank during the entire period of their commission?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but I have an amendment which I intend to offer which will restrict the payment of the salaries they would receive to the time while they were on active duty under the Public Health Service.

Mr. DOREMUS. We have an amendment to cover that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very glad to hear that the committee has such an amendment. It was not called to my attention by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], who reported this rule. I was informed that they intended to abandon the substitute as reported by the committee and accept virtually the bill as it came over from the Senate.

Mr. DOREMUS. That rule also applies to men already in the service, that they shall get pay only while on active duty.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but under this bill there is no such limitation, and they would receive the pay as suggested by the question of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. One more question. Unless such an amendment is adopted as suggested, this would create only an active corps and there would be no reserve, because there would be no young men to be called on when needed.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no difficulty in corralling the doctors to meet an epidemic. There is no doubt but that the Public Health Service has been endeavoring to magnify itself and spread its activities for many years.

Everybody knows what the real purpose of the Public Health Service is in trying to have this bill passed. They do not dare to say that the epidemic which is now confronting the country is the occasion of their desire for the passage of this legislation, and they do not dare to say that they have been limited in their activities by reason of the want of any such bill as this. This bill merely authorizes a commissioned rank to these men who occupy to-day the various civilian grades and receive the pay of civilian grades while on duty. Now, the question for the House is whether we wish to grant them the epaulets while they are going about doing this civilian work, with the rank and the pay which belong to their present civilian status.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is there anything in the bill that limits the payments to be made to the men practicing medicine or that prevents men who are not doctors from receiving commissions under this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is quite correct. There are no such limitations as would prevent the President, on the recommendation of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, from recommending private citizens. The bill is very crudely drawn, without proper restrictions; but, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], amendments will be offered that will safeguard the interests of the Government and safeguard the interests of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the rule.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOSTER) there were—ayes 29, noes 19.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands tellers. The Chair will count. All in favor of ordering tellers will rise. [After counting.] Thirteen Members, not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused. The ayes have it, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 63, to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of securing a reserve for duty in the Public Health Service in time of national emergency there shall be organized, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe, a reserve of the Public Health Service. The President alone shall be authorized to appoint and commission as officers in the said reserve such citizens as, upon examination prescribed by the President, shall be found physically, mentally, and morally qualified to hold such commissions, and said commissions shall be in force for a period of five years, unless sooner terminated in the discretion of the President, but commission in said reserve shall not exempt the holder from military or naval service. Said officers shall consist of sanitarians, senior assistant sanitarians, and assistant sanitarians, and when ordered to active duty in the service of the United States shall receive the rank, pay, allowances, and leaves of absence of surgeons, passed assistant surgeons, and assistant surgeons, respectively.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $300,000 be appropriated out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

With the following committee amendment:

That there is hereby established a Reserve Corps of the United States Public Health Service to be composed of officers of State, county, and municipal health organizations and other persons skilled in sanitary science.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the committee amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman from Michigan ask unanimous consent that the committee consider the Senate resolution, and not the resolution reported by the House committee?

Mr. DOREMUS. I ask unanimous consent that the committee consider the original Senate resolution in lieu of the resolution as amended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the Senate resolution be considered in lieu of the one reported by the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the matter should be presented to the House in full; therefore I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming objects. The Clerk will continue the reading of the House committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That appointments to the Reserve Corps of the United States Public Health Service shall be made by the President upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and commissioned with grade of assistant surgeons, past assistant surgeons, surgeons, or senior surgeons in the Reserve Corps of the Public Health Service for four years or during the war in which the United States is now engaged in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the President: Provided, That no person shall be appointed as a member of the Reserve Corps as aforesaid until his voluntary application for appointment has been filed with the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the committee is one entire substitute and must be considered as an entirety and not by sections, and the substitute has not been read in its entirety.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order of the gentleman from Wisconsin is well taken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that provided in the rule?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not provided in the special rule, but under the rules of the House and of general parliamentary law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What was the ruling of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the Chair hold that the amendment is not offered at the proper time?

The CHAIRMAN. This is not the proper time for the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. SEARS. After the reading of the whole bill, then we will return to each section and offer amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule there will be one hour of general debate, and then the bill will be opened for amendment.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the committee amendment, as follows:

SEC. 3. That said officers when ordered to active duty as members of the Reserve Corps of the United States Public Health Service shall be subject to the orders of the Surgeon General of said service and while so serving shall receive from the United States the same salaries and allowances of officers of the corresponding grade in the Public Health Service: Provided, That officers of State, county, and municipal health organizations shall not be commissioned in said Reserve Corps without the assent of the proper executive officers of their respective States, counties, or municipalities. Officers in the Reserve Corps of the Public Health Service may be promoted successively to the higher grades of the Reserve Corps of the Public Health Service under rules and regulations prescribed by the President.

SEC. 4. That when any person other than a commissioned medical officer of the Public Health Service shall be appointed chief of either the Division of Chemistry, Zoology, or Pharmacology of the Hygienic Laboratory he shall be commissioned by the President as zoologist, chemist, pharmacologist, or assistant pharmacologist, as the case may be, in the Public Health Service. Sanitary engineers, assistant sanitary engineers, epidemiologists, and assistant epidemiologists may, on the recommendation of the Surgeon General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be commissioned as such by the President. The respective grades and order of promotion of such officers shall be prescribed by regulations of the Public Health Service.

SEC. 5. That the duties of the Reserve Corps of the United States Public Health Service shall be performed under instructions issued by the Surgeon General of such service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be directed toward the proper sanitation of ports and places within the United States or within the jurisdiction of the United States Government, including especially places in and near which industrial forces are or are to be mobilized and places in which military forces are to be mobilized and places near which military forces are mobilized.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the United States Public Health Service to cooperate with State, county, and municipal health organizations and with officials in charge of industrial establishments, with a view to coordinating the activities and making effective the work of the health organizations of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule there is to be not to exceed one hour of general debate.

Mr. ESCH. Can we arrange for a division of the time?

Mr. DOREMUS. Has the gentleman anything to suggest?

Mr. ESCH. I suggest that the gentleman control half the time and that I control half the time.

Mr. DOREMUS. I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided between the two sides, the gentleman from Michigan to control one half the time and I to control the other half.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would it not be more equitable to divide the time half and half between those who favor the joint resolution and those who oppose it?

Mr. DOREMUS. I have no objection to that. The gentleman from Texas suggests that we divide the time equally between those in favor of the resolution and those opposed to it.

Mr. ESCH. I shall yield time to gentlemen on this side who favor the measure, as well as to those who are opposed to it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. All I am asking is that there shall be an equitable division of the time. The aisle is no indication of how gentlemen stand on a question like this.

Mr. DOREMUS. How much time does the gentleman from Texas want?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Not over five or six minutes.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will see that the gentleman gets that time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am not speaking for myself alone, but in the interest of all gentlemen who may be opposed to the measure.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I suggest that one-half the time be at the disposal of Members who are in opposition to the joint resolution, if they claim it?

Mr. DOREMUS. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] has just stated to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that that division of time would be made with due regard to the attitude of gentlemen toward the bill.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I shall be very glad to yield five minutes to him.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would rather take the time a little later.

The CHAIRMAN. It is understood that the time is to be yielded with due regard to the views of gentlemen in favor of the bill or in opposition to it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Michigan made that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ESCH. Is it understood that we are to consider the Senate resolution?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Outside of any amendment?

Mr. DOREMUS. That is my understanding of it; yes.

Mr. WALSH. You can not make that agreement.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I do not hope to be able to say all that I intended to say about this joint resolution in five minutes. I am not very much concerned as to the question of commissioning the physicians attached to the Public Health Service. I am very much concerned about the problem which confronts us in all the large centers of population throughout the country. I am especially interested in subsection (a) of the report on the third page, which states that the purpose of the proposed legislation is to create machinery whereby the Government can instantly attack civilian epidemics which threaten to spread to military forces.

I recently consulted Dr. Wilmer Krusen, the director of public health of Philadelphia, and he writes me as follows:

We need 100 more physicians in Philadelphia to-day in order to properly man our hospitals and take care of the poor people who are not able to get physicians because they are overworked.

He further advises that the acting commissioner of the State of Pennsylvania, Dr. Royer, says that the situation in the anthracite coal regions is desperate, and that unless this epidemic is speedily abated the coal supply, which is so necessary for the completion of the war program, will be jeopardized.

When I went back to Philadelphia last week, immediately upon reaching my office I was called upon by the chairman of one of the draft boards in the southeastern part of the city. He had appealed for the organization of a corps of physicians and there were 10 physicians assigned to one small locality in the southeastern part of the city, taking in a part of my congressional district and part of that of my distinguished colleague [Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania]. A little later on these physicians, having worked night and day, were physically unable to endure the strain. I personally provided automobiles in order that they might be taken without any loss of time from place to place. After 48 hours night and day of constant work there was still a waiting list of 100 people who had received no medical aid. I only give this as an illustration of one part of the problem which the health authorities have confronting them. I might go into the different districts and tell the great number of deaths. I might call the attention of the House to the fact that distinguished clergymen of Philadelphia have been working side by side with the day laborers in cemeteries digging graves in order that those who die may receive prompt burial.

We have a total number of physicians in Philadelphia of 3,400; number absent in military service of the United States, 900; number of physicians remaining in city, 2,500.

In normal times one physician cares for 600 persons. At present time one physician cares for 800 persons. In normal times population sick at one time, 4 per cent. At present time population afflicted, 10 per cent to 15 per cent.

Philadelphia is a medical center for training doctors and nurses, and has contributed for Government service a percentage equal to, if not greater than, any city of its type in the United States.

It is at present affected by the worst epidemic in history. The death rate for the week ending October 11 is 95.74 per thousand population per year. Normal death rate for this time of the year is 15 per thousand population per year, an increase of over 600 per cent.

Our city has also given five of its hospital buildings at Byberry for Government use, and in many of its larger hospitals has turned over its wards for the treatment of Army and Navy men, thus decreasing the facilities of the civilian population. A great demand for hospital facilities in Philadelphia has been created by reason of the prevailing epidemic. Doctors and nurses who have remained faithfully behind to treat the civilian population have not only been overburdened, but many of them are ill and unable to perform services. It has been necessary to place medical students in the field to take the places of doctors.

Philadelphia has contributed to the Army and Navy and Red Cross 865 nurses; number of men in military service from Philadelphia, 51,000; number of men employed in shipyards and other war industries, 250,000.

The city of Philadelphia has cared for 7,000 soldiers passing through the city en route to other points since February, 1918. It has also cared for 1,300 families of soldiers in the service, paying $22.50 to $40 per month for the relief of each family. Medical attention and supplies are given to the families of those absent in military service. Free burial is also granted to their relatives.

Surely, Philadelphia is giving her all as a patriotic duty to the Government. The city, however, is now in need of aid and calls upon the Government to assist it by sending to the city as many physicians as is consistent with the situation.

We in Philadelphia need this help. We need it now; not next week, not a month from now, but we need it now. I appeal to the Members of this House to pass this bill with proper amendments and pass it at the earliest possible date in order that relief may be given to the people who are in such great distress.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VARE. I will.

Mr. ROSE. Is not the bill badly needed through many sections of the State of Pennsylvania, in the coal regions where physicians have left and they are now unable to get physicians to cope with the disease?

Mr. VARE. Yes; and I will recall the statement of Dr. Royer, the acting health commissioner, in which he says that the situation in the anthracite coal regions is desperate, and unless the epidemic is abated the coal supply so necessary for the completion of the war program will be jeopardized.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VARE. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is this limited to the present emergency?

Mr. VARE. My understanding is——

Mr. GORDON. It says in a national emergency. Is it proposed to commission a lot of people with high salaries for the purpose of going out and performing medical service that usually devolves upon the local authorities of the State?

Mr. VARE. My information is that the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. DOREMUS] will offer amendments in order to perfect the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] three minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I would not be in favor of this bill, but with the emergency that is upon us at this time I see no other way to control it.

The epidemic that is spreading over the country threatens now not only to paralyze business in certain communities but to strangle military preparations. In certain quarters it is on the increase. I know of no method which has been advanced and no proposal which has been made which will get control of this epidemic better than the one offered in this bill. If I knew of a better one, I would be in favor of it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman think that it ought to be limited to the present emergency?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman that there ought to be certain limitations put on it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do we get any more service from physicians by passing this bill and giving rank to medical men?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think I can explain that by alluding to a situation of which I have personal knowledge. I know of physicians of high rank who would not by reason of age be permitted to go into the military service. They are anxious to do something, to feel that they are doing something in the crisis of the country, something directly affecting the whole Nation, and participating in the war work. I am satisfied that they are ready to go forward and offer their services, and will offer their services, in case the bill is passed, although they may know nothing of the bill at this time and perhaps have not even heard of it. I know physicians to whom I believe the provisions of the bill will appeal; it will appeal to their patriotism; it will appeal to their desire to serve their country, to their desire to be of use at this time. I believe they will come forward, and that the Government can marshal them together and put them where they are needed to carry on the work which will be effective. That, as I understand, is the great object and purpose of the bill.

The epidemic is serious in parts of my State, and in other parts it is hardly felt at all. At Camp Dodge, according to the letter I received the other day, there were 1,300 cases in a single day, 900 cases the day before, and 600 cases the day after. Deaths in that camp are now somewhere from 70 to 80 each day as a result of this epidemic, and yet there is nothing like the number of soldiers in that camp which it is able to accommodate, and not the number that there ought to be there and would be there were it not for this epidemic keeping them away.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, this resolution would not furnish any additional physicians for that kind of work.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is in error, for, if I understand the bill properly, these surgeons assembled under this can be sent anywhere; but even admitting that is the case, this camp is spreading influenza over my State and other States, because soldiers come there from all States.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no limit to the funds of the War Department to handle cases of that kind.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is no limit to the funds, but there is a limit to the physicians that can be obtained where they are needed most. I think this bill ought to pass.

Mr. Chairman, I have been surprised to-day to hear gentlemen contend that the only purpose of this bill was to give a number of doctors uniforms, and that those whose services could be obtained under the bill were not men of high standing. This attack on the physicians and intimations that the profession is back of the bill, and that some members of it are animated by a desire to get into a uniform, is entirely unwarranted. The bill will give a uniform to no one, although it does provide for the granting of uniforms.

It is not unlikely that a doctor who gives up his business to take up the Government service at a long distance from his home and with small pay would at least desire that he possess some evidence of the character of his service. For this reason the commissions ought to be granted to many standing to those who receive them and the honor of serving their country in this time of war and disease will be the main reward which the doctors will receive.

Let me say also, in this connection, since these uncomplimentary intimations have been made, that I know of no profession which gives so much to the world in general, without war, as that of the physician and surgeon. In my State at least there is no one so poor that he can not obtain a doctor in case of sickness, and nearly every physician has treated hundreds of cases for which he never could expect to receive any pay.

The doctor also often runs great risk, especially in treating contagious diseases like the one which causes the present epidemic and others even more infectious. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has referred to the case of the doctors who volunteered for experiments in order to discover the cause of infectious yellow fever and met their death thereby. These men were as truly heroic as any who lose their lives on the field of battle, and the pension which was subsequently awarded to their families was small indeed for the great service rendered mankind by their sacrifice.

This bill is a somewhat inadequate acknowledgment of the value of a profession which stands, to say the least, as high as any.

I trust the bill will pass and soon become a law.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the terms of the bill itself. This House has twice passed, by unanimous consent, a bill on rural sanitation. Sanitation of the cities has been looked after and rural sanitation has been neglected. The rural sanitation done now by the Federal Government is in cooperation with the State and county health authorities. The Federal Government is committed to this work by virtue of the fact that we are appropriating $150,000 a year for the purpose of cooperating with the States, but the trouble is that there is no fixed or definite policy by reason of the fact that the appropriation has been made without being authorized by law. The bill to which I refer has been discussed repeatedly upon the floor of the House and has passed by unanimous consent. It was killed in the Senate by virtue of one Senator who happened to be upon the committee who had no objection to the terms of the bill but who by reason of the fact that he did not believe in the practice of medicine objected to the bill becoming a law. I want to say that this bill I have introduced, and it is now pending before the committee, is the same bill that has been several times reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, except that the principal objection to the bill was a tuberculosis department, creating two bureaus. I want the RECORD to show that at the proper time I shall offer this bill as an amendment to the pending resolution. I would have no objection if I could get recognition to move to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill and to take it up without putting it as an amendment upon this resolution, but the same committee and the same members of the committee who have been upon that committee before have repeatedly reported the bill. The chairman of the committee has not given the bill a place as yet, and I have asked him once or twice to let me take it up, but in view of the fact that it has unanimously passed the House on two occasions I want to offer it as an amendment to this resolution at the proper time. I hope it may be in order. Omitting the formal part of the bill—it is short—it is as follows:

That hereafter there shall be in the Bureau of United States Public Health Service an additional division known and designated as the division of rural sanitation, and said division shall be under the charge of a commissioned medical officer of the United States Public Health Service, detailed by the Surgeon General, which officer, while thus serving, shall be an assistant surgeon general within the meaning of section 3 of the act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency and change the name of the United States Marine Hospital Service."

My reason for asking the committee to adopt this amendment is this: There are five diseases that constitute about 85 per cent of the death rate in the United States, according to the statistics. All of these diseases are preventable diseases. This rural sanitation has nothing to do with the practice of medicine but simply teaches the people the sanitary laws. For example, typhoid fever is now known to be due to infection.

The sources of infection can be discovered and eradicated, and homes that are properly looked after in a sanitary way are never visited with typhoid fever unless the infection comes from some other source. One of the chief sources of infection is milk and another is water. It does not make any difference how sanitary you may make the great cities. Take, for instance, the city of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], the city of Philadelphia. If you have the vegetables and milk coming from the country and they are infected because of careless sanitary arrangements in the country, you will have typhoid in Philadelphia. Therefore, as a protection to the city as well as to the country we should increase the knowledge in respect to sanitary laws. Malaria, which kills so many people in the United States, is absolutely preventable solely by observance of proper sanitary measures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to grant me two or three minutes more.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. My reason for insisting upon this measure passing at this time is that if this becomes a part of this bill, by cooperation with every county in the United States we can get in touch with the proper authorities and with the expenditure of very little money on the part of the Federal Government, because the States and counties will have to contribute 50 per cent either in service or money of the amount spent by the Health Department of the Government that makes us capable of preventing these diseases. I know of nothing more costly to the human family than ignorance. If you will give this information and convince every farmer in the country that by the use of proper sanitary methods he can eliminate these five communicable diseases in the United States it will save millions of dollars in doctors' bills and a great deal of suffering; but if it is not done by somebody having charge of the work, somebody with authority, strange as it may seem, the county and State health authorities are not capable of impressing the people at home as they are if they have cooperation with the Federal Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is very much in favor of his bill, which is a very different measure than the measure before us?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman in favor of issuing these commissions at this time, as provided for in this bill?

Mr. SISSON. I must say to my friend that in the past I have not looked with much favor upon this proposition that is now before the House. I have not given the bill the study, perhaps, I ought to have given to it; but if the bill becomes the law, since this House has by unanimous consent twice passed this bill before, I see no reason why it should not become the law with this bill at this time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the country is passing through a fearful epidemic and there is not a Member of Congress who would withhold the moneys and the authority necessary to deal with that epidemic. As a matter of fact the Congress has appropriated $1,000,000 and placed it in the hands of the Public Health Service for the purpose of meeting this emergency. Those moneys are now being expended. Congress would gladly appropriate more if necessary, but that more is not considered necessary is evidenced by the fact that those who are presenting the resolution propose to strike out the appropriation which it carries. Now, the question is, in view of the situation, What is the necessity for this legislation? What we need is more doctors. What we need is doctors where they are needed. Will we secure them through this resolution? We will not secure one more than we now have or can get unless there be somewhere a physician who refuses to render the aid and services which he can render unless he receives a commission and epaulets. That is the proposition. This bill does not furnish any money to the Public Health Service; it does not give any authority they do not now have. This bill can not increase the number of doctors. This bill will not necessarily bring any more physicians into the Public Health Service unless there are physicians so dead to the ethics of their profession that they refuse to do what they can to relieve the situation. I do not believe there are many physicians who can be dragooned into the Public Health Service by putting a major's shoulder straps on them; if there be such they will be of very little use when they do get them. I am not certain we should not create a reserve in the Public Health Service of men commissioned in various parts of the country who would respond whenever called upon, but this bill does not as it is now presented make such provision. The caption of the bill refers to a reserve, but as a matter of fact the measure as the committee is prepared to present it creates a permanent force of men who are to be commissioned and paid for five years unless their commissions are sooner taken from them.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. So it does not create a reserve corps which can be useful in case of emergency. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOREMUS. I know my friend from Wyoming does not want to make any misstatement.

Mr. MONDELL. No.

Mr. DOREMUS There is nothing in the resolution which requires or provides that these men shall be paid for the period of five years. They will only be paid——

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, there is nothing in the resolution as your committee now proposes to present and support it that authorizes anyone to commission a man without paying him, and in the absence of any provision in the resolution to the effect that the reserve corps may be called upon when needed and be paid only when in active service, those men would be commissioned, would draw their pay, and would not be a temporary force but a permanent force.

Mr. DOREMUS. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under existing law none of the men in the Public Health Service get any pay at all except while on active duty, so the gentleman is clearly in error.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is not speaking accurately. If the gentleman will stop to think for a moment he will realize how inaccurate he is when he makes the statement that no one in the Public Health Service receives any pay unless on so-called active service. They are all on active service the moment they are commissioned, and they continue on active service while they hold their commission. This bill purports to create a reserve but it creates an additional active service. If it would give or add a single additional man, or would in any way help in getting physicians we do not now have, we would all of us be favorable to it, but I can see nothing in it but an attempt to create a permanent body of commissioned men under the pretense of being of some assistance in the present emergency. Not a man can be secured, employed, or paid under it who can not now be employed and paid unless, as I said, there are men who refuse to do their duty unless commissioned. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, when I came into the Hall a few moments ago I heard the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] discussing this bill, and I sought to get information in reference to it, and I find in talking to the gentlemen who have charge of the bill that the object of the bill is not to do what I feared and what the gentleman from Wyoming seems to fear; that is, put a major's shoulder straps on a lot of doctors. That is not the object of the bill at all. If it were the purpose of the bill, to offer an incentive to the doctors of this country to do their duty by giving them a commission in the United States Army, of course I would not be for it. I do not believe you have to offer an incentive to physicians. I do not believe the physicians are moved by the spirit which the gentleman from Wyoming seems to think they are moved by. My observation has been that the doctors of this country give more of their time and attention to real public service than possibly any other class of professional men that we have. They are the only professional men who are constantly giving their time and their attention to bring about conditions which will be a detriment to them financially.

Every time the physicians of this country—and there are a lot of them anxious to do it—give their time and attention to improve the public health, we all know they reduce their incomes. And yet that is the condition that we know exists with reference to the medical profession of this country. We know what they have done since this war started. We know that the most of the physicians who have gone into the Army, and are to-day in France, have given up practices that in a great many instances amount to a great deal more than they receive in pay as officers. They have felt the call of patriotic duty and have responded to it. And I believe that in this epidemic the physicians of this country are working night and day doing everything they can.

Now, you ask what is the benefit of this. From what I gather, the benefit of this will be that it will give an organization that will make it possible for the Public Health Service to more fully utilize the services of people who can be used by creating a public health reserve in this country, just like you have other reserves connected with other branches of the Government. And now, if it does that, why not do it? The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is mistaken as to pay, because the bill provides that they are paid only when on active duty. And I do not think you want to ask a doctor to give services to the public unless you give him pay for that service in keeping with the pay given for other services of the same grade.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. REED. Am I to understand that this bill is a permanent bill or an emergency war measure?

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, the committee proposes to offer an amendment which will restore the language on page 1, does it not?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Then, if it does, commissions will be for a term of five years unless sooner terminated.

Mr. REED. It says "during the war in which the United States is now engaged." That is why I asked the question. My colleague was talking as if he thought this should be a permanent institution of our Government.

Mr. WINGO. I will pay very little attention as to whether or not it will be a permanent institution. My idea is this: That if we provided for this during this epidemic and it proved of great value, the Public Health Service would show us it was a good thing and therefore it ought to be a permanent institution. Frankly, I can not see any reason why, if it is good in emergency, we should not have an organization that will be ready whenever another emergency arises and one which we can immediately use, instead of having to constitute new machinery each time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Especially when they are only paid while on active duty.

Mr. WINGO. Only paid while on active duty. And even if I did not have that notion, I will close with this suggestion: There is not any more efficient organization in this Government than the medical organizations, the health organizations. We are proud of the record that the Public Health Service has made in this country, the splendid service that it has been to the country both in times of epidemic and in their customary routine service. We are all proud of the showing that the medical divisions of our Army and our Navy have made. The reports from the camps of this country are something that we ought to be proud of, and I know we are. And I am willing to give what the Public Health Service and the medical divisions of our Army and Navy say is necessary to serve the public at this time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this measure would not come in at this time except for the accident of the epidemic which now afflicts the country. It seems to me it is rather unfair for the proponents of the bill, which contemplates the organization of a permanent institution, to take advantage of the existing crisis and, because of that crisis, use this opportunity to pass this measure which they have long had in mind and which hitherto has been subject to many objections.

I have read the bill, that portion which was stricken out, and I have read the amendment, or substitute therefor, and have failed to find in either the bill or the amendment any reference to the existing emergency, that emergency which my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE], referred to, and referred to very appropriately, because he comes from a district where the people have been dying during the past week by the hundreds and where they are still dying, due to an epidemic that has been passed down to us from New England. I happened to be in Boston two weeks ago when this epidemic was at its height there, and have observed its progress and have felt its effects in my own family. It is a terrible scourge. It has come on to Washington. It is now passing west. But will this bill relieve the situation? Is this bill intended to relieve the situation? Gentlemen have said that an emergency exists and that this bill, of long standing in the House, should be passed because of that emergency. Our crying need in the section from which I come is for doctors, nurses, and undertakers. We need the doctors now. Those that we have are overworked. We want the doctors to come into our homes and take care of our families, our children, our men, and women, who are dying for the want of medical care. Why? Because we do not have enough physicians. As they did not have enough of them in Boston, we did not have enough of them in Philadelphia, and you do not have enough of them in Washington; and if this scourge passes west or south you will not have enough of them left to take care of the wants of your families. A gentleman told me, coming down in the train yesterday, that outside of one of the munition plants there was one undertaker who had in his establishment now 168 bodies that he could not move for 10 days because it was impossible to get coffins and grave diggers to decently put those bodies away.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield in a moment. Where were many of our physicians? They were in the Army, or they had been engaged in other war activities. What do you propose to do by this bill? You propose to create a permanent organization to do what? To take physicians who may be in attendance upon my child now and who may be in attendance on your child to-morrow to put on shoulder straps and go into the Government service.

That is what this bill does. There is not one thing in it to relieve the present crisis; it creates a permanent organization to run four years in one instance and five years in another. It relieves the man who is doing a needed domestic service and puts him in the official service.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. Does not the gentleman know that the men in this service do not wear shoulder straps?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what is proposed to be done when you commission them. You propose to grade them and take them from private service and put them into the public service. You propose to take them from the homes and put them into political places. You are not meeeting the present emergency; you are looking forward to a five-year tenure of office, and you are taking the physicians away from the homes where they are so badly needed at the present time.

It is unfortunate; it is not fair for the committee to bring in a bill of this kind under the guise of the present emergency.

No one appreciates the Public Health Service more than I do. No one values more than I do the trials and sacrifices and services of the heroic men, past and present, in that organization who have studied science and medicine and devoted their attention to the public good and the general welfare. But you do not intend to help the individual family by this change. Under this bill you do not propose to send our domestic physicians to war; you propose to send them to the ports and put them around industrial establishments and take them away from the points where they are useful and absolutely necessary to protect life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pensylvania. The bill has been brought in as an emergency bill, but it covers no immediate emergency. It provides for a five-year tenure of office for physicians who are sadly needed now in the afflicted districts.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Michigan any other speaker?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, this resolution was introduced on June 26, 1917; apparently, if one would give full credit to the argument that has been made here, to provide for the emergency of the epidemic which came to us in the autumn of 1918. It seems to have been a wonderful forecast of events. But it is like a good many of the so-called "war measures." I am coming to believe that the phrase "war measures" covers a multitude of sins—anything that anyone wants, from the establishment of an organization to conduct a series of pink teas to this resolution, which masquerades as "a war measure."

Mr. Chairman, I have not yet been able to become convinced of the necessity of this legislation, although I have listened carefully to the arguments of gentlemen while I have been in the House, and I have great respect for them, and usually for the soundness of their arguments and their logic, but I have not yet been convinced that by simply giving men commissions in the Federal service you are thereby adding to the number of doctors in the country and thus relieve the community distress that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] speaks about, or that it will increase their skill. It is notorious, Mr. Chairman, that the great doctors, the men whose skill has brought them to the top of their profession, the men who have done wonderful things in the way of healing, in discoveries in the field of medical science, are not the men who go into the military or naval service or other public organizations. The reward for such a man in private life far surpasses anything that can be given him officially. This resolution proposes to invade the States and municipalities and, out of hand, take them all, all of their officials, and convert them into a part of a Federal machine.

I ask my friends who represent States and parts of States and municipalities to consider for a moment the effect of such legislation. It is a further centralization of power at Washington. As a Democrat, as an American citizen who believes in the institutions of his country as they were founded and in those divisions of power that were made in its beginning, I am opposed to such a measure as this.

No doubt the framers of this measure considered carefully and made an accurate estimate of the temptation which was to be offered, which is a title and rank and uniform. I suppose that the certain pay of a commissioned officer of the United States Army, plus allowances that are provided for, which, perhaps, some physicians do not earn at home, are relied on to produce plenty of applications and thus build up the bureau.

Again, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said very pertinently and strongly that already the demands of the military and naval organizations of this country have drained the communities of their medical men.

Within the last year I personally have known communities in the district in which I reside to be left absolutely without doctors. They were mostly country doctors, but country people get sick. Country people have the same "hands, organs, dimensions, senses, and affections" as other people. They have the same weaknesses. If you prick them they bleed. They suffer as other men suffer, and they require the treatment of physicians when they are ill. But those communities have been drained, and they will be further drained by this measure. Rank and certain pay and the distinction of holding a Federal office will take them from the hardships and meager pay of country practice.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I had only five minutes, and I dare say I have only a minute left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like very much to yield to my distinguished friend, but I had it in mind—I certainly will not now have the time—to go over this bill by paragraphs and indicate my opposition to it.

Mr. LAZARO. I would like to ask a very brief question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am afraid I will not have time to answer it, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAZARO. Merely for information. For instance, in a community where as the result of the war there is now no doctor, and in a town a few miles away there are too many doctors, would it not be possible to get a doctor from the town where there are too many and send him to the place where there are none?

Mr. SLAYDEN. When the doctors where there are too many find out that there is a locality in which there are too few you can not keep them away.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield to the gentleman another minute.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Answering the question of my esteemed friend, whom I love and admire, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO], I will say that the law of supply and demand that ordinarily governs business, except when there is a war measure on, will apply in the case to which he refers, and that young physicians and old physicians who have an unremunerative practice will eagerly hasten to the community in which there are too few physicians.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not better finish my speech than by yielding to my colleague.

Mr. BLACK. Even if that situation arose it would not be corrected by this legislation, because the Public Health Service would not have any right to station a practicing physician in such a community unless possibly temporarily.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I hope the reply of my colleague [Mr. BLACK] is satisfactory to my friend from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen seem to get an idea that under this joint resolution the Government is going to commission a lot of doctors, put uniforms on them, and send them out through the country. Gentlemen were never more mistaken in their lives. Public Health officials do not wear uniforms, never have, and I hope they never will. They belong to the civilian population and to that portion of our people who are not expected to wear uniforms any more than anybody else.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I have only five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been informed by a representative of the Public Health Service that under the present regulations these men are privileged to wear the uniform with the one bar of a first lieutenant on the epaulets, and that the purpose of this bill is to allow them to wear uniforms indicating higher rank.

Mr. FOSTER. Anybody who knows anything about the Public Health Service knows that they do not wear uniforms. I do not know whether they can or not.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Even Dr. Blue, the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, does not wear a uniform, does he?

Mr. FOSTER. No; or any of the others. When we look back upon the history of the country, and of disease, and of the epidemics that the country has gone through, I am sorry anyone from the former yellow-fever section or any other part of the country, where epidemics occur, should stand on the floor opposing such a bill for the Public Health Service in time of need. Why, every man who lives in this country ought to call to mind what these men have done for the health of the people. When epidemics of yellow fever swept over the South and when whole communities and cities were driven from their homes through fear, hundreds and thousands of people lost their lives. To-day it is possible to prevent it. Typhoid, typhus, and many other diseases are preventable.

Mr. GORDON. They did it without commissions, too.

Mr. FOSTER. No; most of them were commissioned. Yet to-day we have men standing upon the floor of this House opposing this bill.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not a fact that in the histories which the children study in school credit is given to Gen. Goethals for the building of the Panama Canal, but not a word is said in those histories about the great scientists, Reed, Lazarre, and Carroll, who went to Cuba, the home of yellow fever, and submitted to inoculation to establish the fact that yellow fever and malaria were transmitted in a certain way, and blazed the way for Dr. Gorgas to go to Panama and make a sanitary zone, and make it possible for this country of ours to build the Panama Canal?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. There is no question about that. My colleague states it correctly.

Mr. LAZARO. And they did it without uniforms and without commissions.

Mr. FOSTER. They did it without uniforms. Now comes the Public Health Service that desires to commission these men, believing, as they do, that they may help them, that they may send them out to other parts of the country, giving them some reward for going from their homes, and they ought to have the right to do it. I do not know whether it will help this epidemic or not, but I am not one of those who will stand upon the floor of this House and oppose any bill that looks to the saving of human life and the mitigation of the distress and suffering of our people.

My friends, we paid the widows of the yellow-fever commission each $125 a month. I remember that Mrs. Lazarre came to my office before the law was passed and told me of the distress and the difficulty she had to live. She had no money, and we finally got through the House a bill paying these widows $125 a month, and one of the men who permitted himself to be experimented upon came from the district of my friend, the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], and we gave him $85 a month. When we think of what they did and what those who led the armies through the field of battle, when we think of these in the civilian service of the country who have done so much to save human life—when we think of that, and then the Public Health Service asking us to give them this additional legislation, it seems to me that men ought not to stand on the floor of this House and talk about these men trying to get in here because they want a commission, when it is only a temporary measure at best and expires by limitation. Ah, my friends, I hope I may never be one of those who will stand in the way of a measure to save the health of the people of my country by men who will do what they can to save human life and prevent disease.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I can not; my time is so short. I have no more interest in this than you have. Your people suffer as much as mine, but I am willing, if it costs a few thousand dollars, to vote for it when we expend hundreds of thousands of dollars for other purposes of possibly less importance—for hog cholera, cattle tick, and those things. I would not stand here and endeavor to quibble about a little matter that affects the public health of the people of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill was introduced long before the present epidemic came to this country. It was not introduced in anticipation that this country would be afflicted by such a scourge. It had been in contemplation even before it was introduced in June of last year. It seeks the creation of a reserve to serve in a national emergency whenever that national emergency might arise, and therefore not necessarily during a period of war.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; if the gentleman will make it brief.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not agree with the gentleman from Illinois that this is only a temporary matter. The gentleman's view is the correct view—that it is a permanent reserve.

Mr. FOSTER. There are limitations in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not desire any limitations. If we are going to create a reserve corps make it permanent.

Mr. ESCH. It says "in a time of national emergency." This emergency may recur; we can not tell but that five years hence the country may again be scourged by some such affliction as we are going through now. But the men who are appointed under these provisions to serve as a part of this reserve corps will serve but a temporary period under a commission which will terminate by its own terms. Therefore I do not fear that there will be created under this resolution a great permanent force.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the administration of the million and three hundred thousand dollar fund, how does the Public Health Service employ physicians and control the sanitary conditions about the country?

Mr. ESCH. I suppose they use the money to the best advantage.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the employment of physicians?

Mr. ESCH. I suppose they do employ sanitarians. This is largely for the purpose of employing sanitarians, because their duty really precedes the duty of the physician. If the sanitarian does his work well, there may be but little need of a physician. But gentlemen seem to think that the purpose of the bill is to create a lot of positions to satisfy the ambition of men who wish to wear shoulder straps. I suppose every one of you has gone down to the Quartermaster General's Department, The Adjutant General's Department, the Surgeon General's Department of both the Army and the Navy, and pleaded for the appointment and commissioning of some good constituent, because, forsooth, he was specially equipped in a certain line. Of course you did, and I do not blame you for doing it, but these men who want to get into this Public Health Service have the same right to aspire to a position as these constituents of yours have to aspire to a position in the Quartermaster General Reserve Corps, in the Ordnance Reserve Corps, in the Medical Reserve Corps of the Navy, and the Medical Reserve Corps of the Army.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; for a question.

Mr. LAZARO. Members speak of medical men wishing to wear uniforms and straps. Is it not a fact that all of the great scientists and medical men who have worked in laboratories where there was danger, who exposed their lives in order to establish certain facts, have done so in the calm of the night and the day without uniforms and without noise?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. GORDON. And without commissions, too.

Mr. LAZARO. And without commissions.

Mr. ESCH. They have, and they have done noble work. There is heroism in the laboratory of a physician that deserves recognition fully as much as does the heroism of the battle field, and these men, physicians and sanitarians, who will get these temporary commissions in this Public Health reserve can be just as brave, and doubtless will be just as brave, as men who have to fight the physical battles, because they will be subject to orders and they will be compelled to go where there is need, and that will be, in many cases, a place of danger, because these diseases which they will have to combat are dangerous and contagious diseases.

The records of the Public Health Service are filled with instances where men have given up their lives for the public good. Let me recount that up to 1912 there were 8 officers in the Public Health Service who contracted tuberculosis—8 commissioned officers out of a total force at that time of only 133. Eight of them contracted tuberculosis and three of them died. Fourteen contracted yellow fever, and six of them died. Four contracted typhoid, and two of them died, and one of them had the cholera. That is the record of the Public Health Service, with 133 commissioned officers. The Surgeon General is going to place these men in the Public Health reserve created by this resolution in places of like danger, and if they are so placed I am not one to deny them the simple requital of a commission. [Applause.] It is too small an argument to combat this bill because, forsooth, these men desire some recognition of their ability and of their patriotism. The least that we can do is to give these men in the Public Health reserve a commission commensurate with their ability and their service. Under the law as it is now, under the act of 1902, no man can enter the Public Health Service with a rank higher than that of an assistant surgeon. This bill would give the health authorities the right to grant rank higher than that—of past assistant surgeon, of surgeon, and Assistant Surgeon General. That is the line of promotion in the service, being assimilated with the service of the Medical Corps of the Navy, with which it has been related more or less since 1798. These men ask nothing unreasonable. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said this bill would simply draw away physicians from places where they are now needed. The purpose of the bill is to send men to places where they will be needed, and if it passes, by creating a personnel of two or three hundred of these men who pass examinations, who are skilled, and who have aptitude for these positions, will save many sections of the country from many a death, and the fears of the gentleman I know will not be realized.

It is unfortunate that just at this time, with this great disease spreading over this country, we are also at war. We are short of physicians and 50 per cent of our trained nurses are in the Army service, many of them across the sea. It is unfortunate that this disease should be coincident with the war, but these national emergencies are not always going to occur when we are at war. We want this reserve created to meet these national emergencies.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not a well-known fact that Japan's success in fighting Russia was due to the fact that Japan recognized the importance of efficient medical service and of giving the medical men rank in order to cope with that situation?

Mr. ESCH. I think the gentleman states that correctly.

Mr. LAZARO. Did they not blaze the way?

Mr. ESCH. It was due to that wonderful system established by the Japanese that the Japanese mortality rate was the least of any army in recent years.

Mr. LAZARO. She made the greatest progress ever known to mankind.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; and it was due to the sanitarians connected with the Japanese Army that there were so few cases of typhoid, whereas typhoid has been the army plague from the beginning. I think we ought to vote for this resolution, and I shall move to amend to make the limitation of time one year. I believe we can well afford also to put in a limitation that the pay shall be confined to the period of the active duty of the man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman agree to a limitation as to the number of men to be appointed?

Mr. ESCH. I doubt whether that would be wise. The thing to do is to have it flexible.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose there should be a heavy draft on overworked physicians in my district for this service and we should be left without physicians, as we are at present, does not the gentleman think there should be some restraint upon the appointing power, that there should be a distribution of these appointments?

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not the floor.

Mr. ESCH. I yield.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman think that the department here realizes the importance of taking care of the civil population, so that the civil population will produce what is necessary for the men on the firing line?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say that not one of these physicians in the Public Health Service will be available to go into the homes to relieve the distress there.

Mr. LAZARO. How can they take care of the civil population——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let us have a fair supply of physicians for domestic purposes.

Mr. LAZARO. Oh, they will see to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of debate be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate is fixed by the rule.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining upon this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I will try to get through in less than five minutes. I think every member of the committee must have been impressed by the striking want of harmony of the arguments of those who have opposed this resolution. One Member vociferously proclaimed that this is a scheme to create political jobs. Another opponent of the resolution made the declaration that if this should become the law there would be no addition to the Public Health Service. Of course, the question that naturally presents itself to the ordinary individual is, How, if the resolution will not increase the number of men in the service, can it add to the number of political jobs?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I can not yield just now. I have only five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not heard anyone here opposed to this resolution say that it would not lead to appointments. The statement was made that it would not give us any more doctors.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say to my friend from Wyoming that the statement has been repeatedly made on this floor that this resolution will be entirely inefficient to add to the present organization of the Public Health Service, and yet other gentlemen opposing the measure have said it is a scheme to create political jobs, and it reminds one of the statement that is often heard that if one is determined not to do a thing, why one excuse is just as good as another. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote very briefly from a memorandum prepared by the Public Health Service:

"Senate joint resolution No. 63 was passed by the Senate June 18, 1917, and favorably reported with amendments by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House of Representatives August 30, 1917.

"The purpose of this resolution is to establish a reserve corps in the United States Public Health Service. At present the service is operating under the act of 1889, which authorized a commissioned personnel but limited the appointments in this corps to the lowest grade, and further provided that medical officers should serve four years in this lowest grade prior to promotion. In view of the fact that the Army and Navy have practically taken into service all of the younger medical men it has been impossible for the Public Health Service to secure physicians for its regular commissioned corps. The resolution as proposed will authorize the commissioning of medical and sanitary personnel in the higher grades with commensurate rank.

"At the outbreak of the war there were about 140,000 doctors in the United States. Of this number somewhat less than 130,000 are in active practice. Up to the present time the Army has enrolled about 30,000 doctors for military duty, and the Navy several thousand. Further, the draft boards' examination requires practically all of the time of 15,000 to 20,000 physicians. In order to meet the needs of an army of 5,000,000 men it will be necessary for the Army to enroll 20,000 more physicians, provided the proportion of 10 doctors per thousand is maintained. At present, then, the available supply of doctors for the civil population is estimated at about 75,000 to 80,000. This number is being rapidly reduced by the daily enrollments of medical men in the Army Medical Corps.

"It will be seen that when the present epidemic of influenza began in the United States there was a serious shortage of doctors for the ordinary needs of the civil population. There was also a proportionate shortage in the nursing personnel of the country. Epidemic influenza was first reported along the Atlantic seaboard and has spread to practically every State in the Union. It has reached very serious proportions in many places, so that to meet the situation the Public Health Service, through the Volunteer Medical Service Corps of the Medical Section of the Council of National Defense, sent out a call to more than 1,000 doctors, and has succeeded in enrolling in epidemic service something more than 200 doctors. The reason why the proportion of acceptance in this service was so low is due to the fact that a large number of the doctors were seriously needed in their home towns and could not be spared, and a large number were already stricken with influenza. The Public Health Service wishes it clearly understood that it does not believe that the doctors of the country are refusing to accept epidemic service because they are not offered a commission, but it does believe that when these doctors leave their homes and enter a serious epidemic, such as influenza has proven to be, such service should be recognized and rewarded with a commission. The epidemic of influenza which has now spread through the country is without a parallel in the history of the United States. The most widespread epidemics of yellow fever which have swept over the Southern States have on no occasion equaled the number of deaths which have already occurred from influenza in this country. In 1878 the epidemic of yellow fever caused about 4,000 deaths in the city of New Orleans. Up to the present time there have been more than 2,000 deaths from influenza in Boston; New York reports about 400 deaths a day from influenza and pneumonia; Washington City, 74 deaths per day. In the Army the death rate has jumped from 4 per thousand per year to more than 81 per thousand per year on account of influenza; this means about 2,000 deaths in the Army from influenza for the week ended October 1, 1918.

"When the number of deaths from influenza are summed up they will undoubtedly be many thousand more than that of any other epidemic in the history of the country. The crying necessity of the hour is a mobile corps of physicians, nurses, and sanitarians who can be shifted from place to place to cope with this and similar national emergencies as they arise. There can be no doubt that by the time that winter comes the impress of this present epidemic upon national vitality will have become so deep that we may confidently expect its aftermath in the form of epidemics of cerebrospinal meningitis, pneumonia, and the like. For this reason it is all the more urgent to prepare for this situation while there is still time, and that in the future similar national disasters may not find us unprepared to meet them as fully as our resources will permit."

In that I heartily concur. Now, in answer to the question, how you are going to increase the number of men in the Public Health Service by this resolution, I say we propose to increase them in the same way we increase the surgeons and physicians in the Army and Navy to-day and in no other way. This is not a war measure. It is not put forth here as a war measure. There is no question that the necessity for its enactment has been emphasized by the prevailing epidemic, but, as pointed out by my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], we not only desire this legislation to cope with the present epidemic but we want to create a permanent force that will be prepared to meet the next epidemic, and no man in the world knows when that will come. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I will ask at the proper time to strike out all of the resolution as reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce after section 1, it having been agreed by practically all who are interested in the subject that by reason of legislation already enacted these additional sections will be unnecessary, and then I will ask to amend section 1 by inserting a proviso which will preserve the same proportion of rank as now exists and will limit the pay and allowances of these men to the time they are on active duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of securing a reserve for duty in the Public Health Service in time of national emergency there shall be organized, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe, a reserve of the Public Health Service. The President alone shall be authorized to appoint and commission as officers in the said reserve such citizens as, upon examination prescribed by the President, shall be found physically, mentally, and morally qualified to hold such commissions, and said commissions shall be in force for a period of five years, unless sooner terminated in the discretion of the President, but commission in said reserve shall not exempt the holder from military or naval service. Said officers shall consist of sanitarians, senior assistant sanitarians, and assistant sanitarians, and when ordered to active duty in the service of the United States shall receive the rank, pay, allowances, and leaves of absence of surgeons, passed assistant surgeons, and assistant surgeons, respectively.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it not be proper at this time now to move to strike out all——

Mr. DOREMUS. I would be very glad to offer that amendment if it is in order at this time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is a committee amendment pending which has not been disposed of.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman from Michigan ask unanimous consent that the House consider only section 1 of the Senate resolution and not consider section 2 of the Senate resolution, or the substitute reported by the committee?

Mr. DOREMUS. If it is in order I will be very glad to move to strike out all of the resolution after section 2 providing it does not foreclose my right to offer an amendment to section 1.

Mr. STAFFORD. The regular procedure would be for the committee first to consider the substitute recommended by the committee and to consider amendments to the substitute, and then after it has been amended either to reject or accept it, and the House is not disposed to act upon the committee substitute.

Mr. DOREMUS. I shall move to strike out of the resolution all after section 2.

Mr. STAFFORD. Ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 2 has not been read yet.

Mr. DOREMUS. I ask unanimous consent to strike out of the resolution all after section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 2——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman should now ask unanimous consent to consider section 1 of the Senate resolution, because the committee has recommended to strike it out.

Mr. DOREMUS. To strike out everything after section 1.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee has recommended the striking out of section 1 of the Senate resolution.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of section 1, on page 2, everything after and including line 3, page 2, and insert the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is a committee amendment pending to the Senate joint resolution which is to strike out section 1. Action has to be taken upon that first, and we can readily take action by voting it down and then amendments will be in order.

Mr. DOREMUS. I ask for a vote on the motion.

Mr. ROBBINS. State what the committee amendment is.

Mr. DOREMUS. To strike out section 1 of the Senate bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Section 1 and part of section 2?

Mr. DOREMUS. Strike out the italicized matter of section 1.

Mr. ROBBINS. Section 1 and part of section 2?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent, we have already stricken out all after section 2. Now, the question is to vote on the committee amendment striking out section 1 of the Senate amendment. So the question would be on that amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. The recommendation of the committee must be disposed of, and the recommendation of the committee is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert certain other matter.

Mr. DOREMUS. We want to vote down the committee amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I confess I am a little confused about this, there being so many counselors. I do not yet understand, I will say to the chairman, precisely what we are to vote on.

Mr. DOREMUS. We are to vote on, as I understand it, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, to strike out the committee amendment to section 1. We want that amendment sricken out so that it will leave the Senate resolution as it passed that body.

Mr. STAFFORD. You want the recommendation of the amendment of the committee disagreed to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The language in the italics is the amendment?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the House amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That has been stricken out?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; by unanimous consent. Now, the question is on voting on the committee amendment striking out section 1, and that we will vote down.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The only thing you have left in this whole resolution is section 2?

Mr. FOSTER. Section 1.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You might strike that out, too.

Mr. FOSTER. We may. We will try it, however.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORTON. I note from the report that the committee amendment here proposes that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and that the substitute be adopted. Is not that the committee amendment? Is not that the amendment that should be voted down, and then the Senate resolution will be before the House?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say to my friend that the committee has already by unanimous consent stricken out everything that is in the resolution after section 1.

Mr. MONDELL. Which was immaterial, I will suggest to my friend, because there was nothing in the resolution after section 2 until the House adopted it. There was simply a recommendation of the committee. But that does not matter. The motion now before the House is the recommendation of the committee. If that is voted down, then the Senate bill will remain as it passed the Senate.

Mr. DOREMUS. That is the proposition exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOREMUS. I have an amendment pending, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOREMUS: Page 2, after line 2, strike out the remainder of the paragraph, which reads as follows:

"Said officers shall consist of sanitarians, senior assistant sanitarians, and assistant sanitarians, and when ordered to active duty in the service of the United States shall receive the rank, pay, allowances, and leaves of absence of surgeons, passed assistant surgeons, and assistant surgeons, respectively."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That the officers commissioned under this act, none of whom shall have rank above that of Assistant Surgeon General, shall be distributed in the several grades in the same proportion as now obtains among the commissioned medical officers of the United States Public Health Service, and shall receive the same pay and allowances while on active duty as are now provided by law and regulation for the commissioned medical officers in the said regular commissioned Medical Corps."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to strike out the words in the amendment "while on active duty," and to insert in lieu thereof after the word "and" and before the word "shall," on page 2, line 5, the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL moves to amend the amendment by inserting in line 5 of the amendment, after the word "and" and before the word "shall," the words "shall at all times be subject to call to active duty by the Surgeon General, and when on such active duty," and strike out the words "while on active duty," on line 6, so that as amended the amendment shall read:

"Provided, That the officers commissioned under this act, none of whom shall have rank above that of Assistant Surgeon General, shall be distributed in the several grades in the same proportion as now obtains among the commissioned medical officers of the United States Public Health Service, and shall at all times be subject to call to active duty by the Surgeon General, and when on such active duty shall receive the same pay and allowances as are now provided by law and regulation for the commissioned medical officers of the said regular commissioned Medical Corps."

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we have any objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I notice that the amendment proposed by the committee is broader than the original Senate resolution in that it permits the Surgeon General to create two additional grades above the grade of surgeon, namely, Senior Surgeon and Assistant Surgeons General. I wish to inquire of the gentleman having the bill in charge what is the need of creating these two additional senior ranks? As originally passed by the Senate, the limit of grade that could be conferred on these temporary officers was that of surgeon, and now you provide that the highest rank shall be that of Assistant Surgeon General. I am informed that the Assistant Surgeon General receives $4,000, and the senior surgeon $3,500 per annum, and the surgeon $3,000. What is the necessity of going above the grade of surgeon? Why not provide in the gentleman's amendment that they shall not have any rank above that of surgeon?

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman from Wisconsin will observe that the amendment provides for preserving the same proportion in all these ranks that now exists in the present organization.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; and if you are going to extend the Public Health Service and multiply them by the needs of the occasion to the extent of the appropriation that has been voted of a million dollars, instead of to-day having four Assistant Surgeons General receiving a salary of $4,000 each and six assistant senior surgeons at $3,500 you are going to have many more than that number. It was originally understood, as I take it, that this bill was for the sole purpose of meeting conditions that might arise in this war, and now my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], says that it is to be a permanent force to meet future emergencies. The original resolution provided for a reserve "in time of national emergency." That has a well-accepted meaning. The War Department and the Committee on Military Affairs use the words "existing national emergency" as being that of the war. Now, what is the need of creating these additional grades of Assistant Surgeon General and senior surgeon? We are going pretty far when we are establishing the high rank of surgeon.

I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment and amend the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], in line 2 of the amendment, by striking out "Assistant Surgeon General" and inserting the word "surgeon."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to amend the Doremus amendment by striking out, in line 2, the words "Assistant Surgeon General" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "surgeon."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, just a word. That amendment conforms to the original resolution as passed by the Senate, and I believe as requested by the Public Health Service. What is the use in creating these very high ranks, entailing additional expense on the National Government?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I doubt whether the amendment of my colleague is really of sufficient importance to justify us in adopting it. In view of the fact that under the amendment as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan these officers are to be appointed in the certain proportion that now obtains in the Public Health Service, that proportion having heretofore been four assistant surgeons to the hundred appointees, and six senior surgeons to the hundred, the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan is for the purpose of preserving that proportion. Now, if you drop down to surgeon, as suggested by my colleague [Mr. STAFFORD], you would have to have a vastly greater number of surgeons to maintain the proportion that exists under the existing law, so that there would really be no saving in expenditure. In fact there would be a greater charge on the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The letter prepared by the Bureau of Public Health and read by the gentleman from Michigan stated that the purpose of this bill was to create commissions. Now, we have an organized force here in the Bureau of Public Health rated according to the gentleman's statement.

These physicians that are going to be employed for temporary service are in the field. There is no necessity of having that same force organized according to the same proportion. The only idea is what grade shall be given in commissioning these doctors to perform this temporary emergency service? I say it is high enough to go to the grade of surgeon, instead of the grade of Assistant Surgeon General and Senior Surgeon. We are not going to create divisions throughout the country with the same number in each respective grade.

Mr. ESCH. I simply wish to say in reply, Mr. Chairman, that to place a surgeon in charge of the field work, which may cover the whole Pacific slope, the man being paid $3,000, is not in my judgment the proper thing to do, and therefore an Assistant Surgeon General should be in charge of a whole region, having surgeons under him and passed assistant surgeons under him and assistant surgeons.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 2, following the Doremus amendment, insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 2. That hereafter there shall be in the Bureau of United States Public Health Service an additional division known and designated as the Division of Rural Sanitation, and said division shall be under the charge of a commissioned medical officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed by the Surgeon General, which officer while thus serving shall be an assistant surgeon general within the meaning of section 3 of the act approved July 1, 1902, entitled 'An act to increase the efficiency and change the name of the United States Marine-Hospital Service.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve or make a point of order, according to the wish of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. I hope the gentleman will reserve it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to accommodate the gentleman from Mississippi by a reservation of the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, when I took the floor a little while ago I called the attention of the gentlemen then present to the purpose of this amendment. I will state to my friend who reserved the point of order that this proposition has twice passed the House by unanimous consent. It has twice been discussed fully, and there has been no objection to it in the House. Now, if there is any emergency that justifies the passage of this bill at this time, there is just as much emergency that this amendment shall pass. The health of this country can not be segregated into the health of the city and the health of the rural districts. The health of the people of the country as a whole should be looked after. This amendment which I offer will not cost the Government a penny, unless an appropriation shall be made in some future bill. It simply gives to rural sanitation a position in the Government, where from time to time such appropriation as Congress may see fit and proper to make can be made to provide correct sanitation in the country.

All of the medical profession, whatever may be the school of medicine to which they belong, agree that there are certain communicable diseases which can be absolutely eradicated by sanitation. If there ever was a time in the history of the country when we might commit ourselves to this proposition it is now, because under the pressure of the epidemic of influenza the medical authorities of the Government are insisting upon the immediate passage of this bill. Why should we not make a complete bill of it? Why should we not carry into effect the work which the Government is attempting to do, and to give the Surgeon General the right to cooperate with all the State authorities and the county authorities and assist those gentlemen in carrying into effect proper sanitation throughout the rural districts? It is utterly impossible to make the cities healthy and to keep the country healthy throughout unless you have wholesome food and pure milk. The sanitation must not simply be confined to the cities, but it must go into the rural districts.

It is known that typhoid fever may become epidemic through milk. Some years ago in a town in Pennsylvania nearly everybody died of typhoid. The physicians of the city and the health authorities were utterly amazed and at a loss to account for it; but a bacteriologist made a search and found a little mountain stream which he followed up to its source. He found that a family several miles up the stream had had some deaths from typhoid fever. From the open privy of the home the infection got into the water, and so was carried into the city, and it was agreed that that was the source of the infection. So I might continue to enumerate hundreds of instances where such things have happened.

Now, since the House has twice passed this bill by unanimous consent after discussion, I see no reason why the point of order should be interposed by my friend to prevent this very much-needed legislation. I hope that my friend will withdraw the point of order and permit this to become a law. I do not concede that the point of order is good, because the amendment which I offer is germane to this bill, in my judgment. The purpose of this bill is to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service. If you take the whole scope of the bill, it deals with the health of the country generally. This is a proposition to enlarge the Public Health Service. I am offering an amendment to enlarge the Public Health Service so that a department that is now being operated without authority of law, solely because it is carried in appropriation bills, and has been so carried for three years, may become a part of this law. This creates a reserve corps of the United States Pubic Health Service, to be composed of officers of State, county, and municipal health organizations and other persons skilled in sanitary science. The amendment which I offer simply proposes that a department of rural sanitation shall be added as one of the various health agencies in addition to those herein enumerated. Therefore, in my judgment, it is not subject to a point of order because it is germane to this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is not germane to the subject matter of the bill under consideration. If the Chair has any doubt about it, I should like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the bill that we are now considering by unanimous consent is section 1.

Mr. SISSON. We are not considering it by unanimous consent. We are considering it under the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill that is now being considered in the committee is section 1. Everything else in the bill has been eliminated. Under the motion agreed to by unanimous consent, eliminating all of the resolution save section 1 the gentleman would have no right to offer amendments to fix the amount of an appropriation, because that has been eliminated from consideration. What, then, is before the committee for consideration? Only section 1. What does section 1 relate to? It provides for a reserve corps in the Public Health Service, an emergency creation. It is of a general character. Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is not a matter strange to me, because we have had it up in the Committee on Appropriations for many years past. I know how earnest and insistent the gentleman has been on this matter. There have been some who have opposed it in the committee who have not insisted on their opposition when the matter has come up in the House. So I am acquainted with the purpose of the amendment. His amendment provides for something relating to an organization in the Public Health Service, a permanent matter for all time, namely, a division of rural sanitation. This bill does not provide for any organization of a permanent character. It provides for a reserve corps during an emergency. You can not amend a bill providing for an organization only when an emergency exists by an amendment that provides for an organization always to be in existence. You can not amend a general bill of a temporary character by an amendment unless it is kindred and germane. Such is not the provision of the gentleman from Mississippi. Supposing a bill had been introduced creating one bureau. You could not offer an amendment creating another bureau, because the precedents are many that where a bill relates to one subject matter you can not amend it by another subject matter.

The prime purpose of the bill under consideration is to create an emergency, temporary, public-health reserve corps. This provides for a permanent division relating to the organization for all time of the Public Health Service. If the amendment is in order you could offer amendments reorganizing the entire Public Health Service. I could offer an amendment for a division relating to city sanitation, an amendment for a division for sanitation relating to the Army or to Army camps, or to the Isthmus of Panama. The fundamental purpose of the rule of germaneness is to permit the offering of only those amendments which have been considered by the committee or naturally arise from the consideration of the subject matter, so that Members can not offer amendments that have never been considered by the committee, so that only those amendments will be considered that are the result of matters that have received attention. This amendment has never received consideration of this body, certainly not in connection with this bill, and I insist that the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the gentleman's statement in stating that this amendment is not germane in that it only deals with temporary matters is valid. Look at the very language of this bill—

That there is hereby established a reserve corps of the United States Public Health Service to be composed of officers of State, county, and municipal health organizations and other persons skilled in sanitary science.

Mr. STAFFORD. But, if the gentleman will permit, that has been eliminated by unanimous consent of the House. I grant that if we were considering the original bill it might be different, but that has been eliminated.

Mr. SISSON. I was not in the Chamber when that portion was eliminated from the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know that I am in sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, but I am not prepared to subscribe to the parliamentary doctrine that has been laid down by the gentleman from Wisconsin, that because a certain part of the bill which is being considered under a special rule has been eliminated that therefore an amendment that would have been in order had it not been eliminated is not now in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is an important question. I grant the gentleman, but the committee by unanimous consent eliminated everything after section 1 to the original Senate joint resolution from the consideration of the committee and made it the rule of the committee only to consider section 1.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not agree to that parliamentary construction. The bill is being considered under a special rule which made it in order—every part and phase of it was in order—and any amendment that would be germane to any part of the original bill could not now be out of order simply because by unanimous consent a part has been eliminated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose we had considered the bill originally under the rule of the House whereby the amendment offered by the committee had been considered and it had been rejected, then we would return to the original Senate resolution. I wish to ask if after the committee amendment had been rejected by vote to which the gentleman's amendment might have been in order, whether it would then be in order to offer the amendment that would have only been germane before the amendment was rejected or the matter stricken out.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman is offering his amendment as a new section.

Mr. STAFFORD. He is trying to make it in order to that part which by action of the committee has already been stricken out.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think that would affect the parliamentary situation.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield? It is not necessary to sustain the contention of the gentleman from Wisconsin in order to sustain the point of order which he makes to the amendment. The question is whether it is germane to the bill at this particular point. It is neither germane to the bill as it passed the Senate or as reported in the House, nor to any part of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If it is not germane to the bill, the original act before the House for consideration under the rule, then, of course, it will not be in order. But I understood it to be conceded by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I made no admissions at all.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, yes; the gentleman did.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin did make a suggestion that might modify the situation; but, as a matter of fact, it does not modify the situation at all. Now, if he Chair will allow me——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield the floor.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is not germane to the bill, nor germane to the section of the bill where it was offered. Both points are good. This bill proposes the establishment of a reserve corps in the Public Health Service. That is its object and purpose. I do not agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is temporary, because at least as amended by the House it becomes a permanent reserve corps. But that does not alter the situation at all. To a bill proposing to create a reserve corps in the Public Health Service it is not germane to offer an amendment proposing an altogether different service, proposing to make provision whereby appropriation can be made for purpose for which appropriations could not be made under this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am mainly interested in the perliamentary question.

Mr. MONDELL. That is my only interest.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not wildly enthusiastic about the bill, but I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to section 6. Section 6 is as follows:

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the United States Public Health Service to cooperate with State, county, and municipal health organizations and with officials in charge of industrial establishments, with a view to coordinating the activities and making effective the work of the health organizations of the United States.

Does the gentleman mean to say that does not go beyond the mere matter of creating a reserve corps in the Health Department?

Mr. MONDELL. That portion of the bill, if we were ever to reach that for consideration, which we can not do under the action of the House, for it has been eliminated from the bill, is the portion of the bill to which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] would be most nearly germane, but his amendment would not be germane to that section, and that section is not in the bill.

As a matter of fact, it never was in the bill. That section was proposed by the committee, but by action of the House the committee's proposition was not agreed to, so that the provision is not in the bill and can not now be considered by the committee. The gentleman's amendment is not offered to that provision, because it is not now in the bill. He offered it as an amendment to section 1.

Mr. SISSON. I offered it as a new section.

Mr. MONDELL. As a new section following section 1; but had section 6 become a part of the bill and were it now before the committee, that would not justify the offering of an amendment providing for an entirely new class of work, activities not now authorized by law. Section 6 is a section relating only to cooperation.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. The committee does not fix the rule. The House fixed the rule.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not quite understand what the gentleman means.

Mr. SISSON. This committee by its action can not change the rule made by the House. The House made the rule for the consideration of this bill in Committee of the Whole and you can not change it in the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. My contention is that if the bill had been amended as proposed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and section 6 were in the bill, and the gentleman's amendment had been offered to section 6 or following section 6, it would not have been germane, because section 6 is simply a direction relative to cooperation. It is a suggestion and direction of cooperation between the Public Health Service and the local authorities in matters now within the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service, whereas the gentleman's amendment provides for a new type of activity under the Public Health Service and would lead to an organization to carry on those activities, something not contemplated by this bill, or any part of it, except as those activities might be undertaken if authorized by law by the reserve corps which the bill creates.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, may I say just a word, unless the Chair is ready to rule? The Chair must remember this, it seems to me, that all after section 1 is out of the bill. The rule provided for the consideration of this bill as amended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but the committee has removed all from the bill except the first section, and we are now considering the first section, and that is all we are considering. Whatever may follow the section can not be taken into consideration as to whether this is germane. This is being considered under the rules of the House governing the Committee of the Whole, and the special rule providing for the consideration of this bill does not give it any more privilege than it would have under the rules of the House governing the committee if there was no rule. It seems to me plain that the Chair should take into consideration just section 1. What does section 1 do—and I am not arguing this because I am opposed to rural sanitation, because I am for it—but section 1, which we are considering, and the only thing we are considering, creates a reserve in the Public Health Service; having that in view—the creation of a medical reserve in the Public Health Service—is an amendment creating a division of rural sanitation in order? It is a well-known fact, laid down by decision after decision, that if you report a bill for one public building you can not add another public building to that, for it is not germane, it is not within the rules of the House. This provides for the creation of a medical reserve corps, and now it is proposed to add an amendment creating a division on sanitation. That is not germane to the matter of creating a medical reserve corps, and it occurred to me that that is not germane to the first section of the bill. All after the first section is out of the bill and not to be taken into consideration by the Chair in making a ruling on this proposition.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think these gentlemen are going to be serious in contending that the action of this committee can possibly change the rule under which this bill was made in order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman point out the one thing in the rule which said more than this should be considered—that immediately after the adoption of the resolution the House should resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 63?

Mr. SISSON. I am not going to contend anything except what this rule says. Here is what the rule provides:

That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 63, entitled "Joint resolution to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service."

The gentleman brings into the House this whole resolution, Senate joint resolution 63.

Mr. FOSTER. But the gentleman did not read all of the resolution.

Mr. SISSON. That is all I want to read.

Mr. FOSTER. I know; but the gentleman ought to read the balance of it.

Mr. SISSON. I will read it all, then, Mr. Chairman, and I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me, for I do not think the gentleman can be serious in the contention he is now making.

Mr. FOSTER. I never was more serious in my life.

Mr. SISSON. Let me read the rest of the rule, and then I shall not yield any more at this time—that there shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate. At the conclusion of such general debate the resolution shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the resolution shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

It is here for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FOSTER. Have we not adopted an amendment?

Mr. SISSON. It does not make any difference.

Mr. FOSTER. That is one of the amendments that the committee has made.

Mr. SISSON. I decline to yield any more, and the gentleman himself is not at all serious.

Mr. FOSTER. I was never more serious in my life.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is not serious, and he knows he is out of order, although he is on the Rules Committee. I want to call attention, if the gentleman will be in order, to this bill.

It is Senate joint resolution No. 63. Now, all of that was made in order by this special rule of the House. Now, it is admitted and contended by those gentlemen that if all of this bill is before this House this amendment which I offer is in order. I offered it under the special rule of the House which gave this committee the right to consider this bill at all and under that rule it made Senate joint resolution No. 63 in order, and no action of this commitee by striking out a clause or putting in a clause can change a rule of the House. There is one way by which you could have disposed of this bill, and that is by striking out the enacting clause, and then there would have been nothing left of it.

Mr. WALSH. You can not do that under this rule.

Mr. SISSON. But that not being done, going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under this special rule, then if the bill would have been in order to any portion of this joint resolution, then the amendment which I offer now is in order and these gentlemen will not seriously consider that the action of the committee in adopting section 1 thereby prevented this being in order. If so, then the committee becomes superior to the House and can change and amend the rule of the House whereby you are now considering this bill, and I do not believe the Chair will hold that. And if there is a section of this Senate joint resolution 63 that makes this resolution in order then it is in order as a new section, although they may have stricken out the balance of it in the committee, because if we should take it into the House the Chair can not presume that the House will not restore every section of this bill. You can not say the House is going to adopt your recommendation. The House being the master and the committee being the servant, it obeys the rule of the House. If you take line 13, page 2, which broadens the Senate resolution beyond that of section 1—

That there is hereby established a reserve corps of the United States Public Health Service, to be composed of officers of State, county, and municipal health organizations and other persons skilled in sanitary science.

Why, it puts within the jurisdiction of this committee by the rule of the House all of your health organizations throughout the United States as may cooperate in the health of the country. Then, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], section 6—and I invite your attention to it in this bill—specifically says:

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the United States Public Health Service to cooperate with State, county, and municipal health organizations and with officials in charge of industrial establishments, with a view to coordinating the activities and making effective the work of the health organizations of the United States.

Now, this amendment which I offer is solely for the purpose of enabling the Federal Government to do that very thing. It enables them to cooperate with the health authorities, and whatever may be the action of the committee this bill did not contemplate simply an emergency measure.

This bill contemplated that which should become permanent law creating a reserve corps which whenever an emergency in the future might arise might be called into service. It is always in existence. This idea of saying that solely because they strike out all of this bill except section 1 that is the action of the committee, but in view of the fact that the whole matter is before the committee I have the right to say this particular amendment to this bill comes under the rule, because I am offering it as an amendment to Senate joint resolution No. 63 and not to that matter which the committee has specifically retained in the bill. Now, if the Chair should hold that solely because the committee adopts one amendment that everything that is offered shall be germane to that one amendment, then, indeed, you have repealed the rule under which we are considering this bill, and I do not believe the Chair will hold that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's argument is predicated on the alleged fact that it has been admitted that if the entire subject matter of the bill as it passed the Senate and was reported to the House were before the House his amendment would be germane. That is not true. The gentleman from Wisconsin did suggest that it would qualify the situation, but I take the position that it matters not whether we hold that the Senate bill alone is before the House or the Senate bill with the committee amendment. In either case the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is not germane to the bill or any part or section and is not in order, and I call the Chair's attention to some cases under Rule XVI relative to amendments, particularly to those cited under paragraph 778, page 344:

One individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition even though the two belong to the same class.

That is exactly what we have before us here. We have two propositions. They are scarcely in the same class, but admitting they were in the same class a new proposition can not be added to a proposition even though it may be of the same class.

Thus the following are not germane: To a bill proposing the admission of one Territory into the Union, an amendment for admission of another Territory.

Territories are in the same class. A bill for the admission of a Territory under the argument made by the gentleman from Mississippi might be indefinitely amended by adding Territories thereto. The Chair has held otherwise.

To a bill for the relief of one individual, an amendment proposing similar relief for another; to a resolution providing a special order for one bill, an amendment to include another bill; to a provision for extermination of the cotton boll weevil, an amendment including the gypsy moth.

There are two separate propositions. They are closely related but not in order under the rule as has been laid down.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest a thought to him?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that the House substitute would have been subject to the point of order had it reached that point where it had been offered?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not evidently made myself clear. I am insisting that, admitting for the sake of argument, there was now before the House the original Senate bill and the amendment proposed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the amendment would not be germane, and not in order because not germane.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I understood that to be the gentleman's insistence, but what I was anxious to get at was the gentleman's viewpoint as to whether the committee amendment had it reached that point and been offered would have been germane to the Senate bill. I speak now of the matter in italics.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, as that matter is not before us, I would not want to offer an opinion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I should say if——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is a much better parliamentarian than I have ever claimed or assumed to be——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not at all.

Mr. MONDELL. And I would be inclined to accept his judgment on that point. But assuming everything that is favorable to the contention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], so far as the bill and amendments to it are concerned, assuming that the proposal of the committee were germane, and part of it had been accepted—which is not the fact; it has all been stricken out—but assuming all that, still the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi would not be in order, because it is not germane. It proposes a new, novel, and separate line of action. It is scarcely in the same class with the provisions in the bill. And under all the rulings, even if it were in the same class—it is in fact a separate proposition not closely related or essential to the original provisions of the bill—it goes out.

There is not so very much difference between the cotton boll weevil and the gypsy moth. They are both insects that destroy agricultural crops, and yet in providing for the destruction of the boll weevil you can not give the very same bureau of the Government that is handling the boll weevil authority by amendment to experiment on the gypsy moth. The rule of the House in these cases has been close, and for a most excellent reason.

I do not know that I object to the gentleman's provision in the proper time and proper place. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I voted, with some mental reservation—considerable mental reservation—an appropriation for the work his amendment contemplates in an experimental way. But what I am interested in, and what the House is interested in, is to preserve the logical procedure of the House, so that a decision now made may not rise to plague us later. It is necessary if we legislate that we hold these bills to the proposition proposed by the committees that reported them. Otherwise we go far afield in every direction, and we never get anywhere, because there is no end to the amendments that may be offered and discussed and voted upon.

The Chair has those rulings in paragraph 778 before him, and I do not care to take up his time and the time of the committee further in regard to them, except to say that a number of the cases cited were related to amendments much more nearly related to the original subject matter than the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi is to the subject matter contained in this bill at any time.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, if you will just hear me a moment I wish to say that the authorities cited by my friend were, as I recall them, authorities where amendments were offered to appropriation bills upon which you could not legislate. If an appropriation carried in the bill by authority of law makes a provision or appropriation in reference to the cotton boll weevil, you could not amend that item of appropriation and make an appropriation for the gypsy moth unless it was authorized by law. But that is not the case here. This is a legislative bill itself. This bill is being considered under the rules of the House for the purpose of making legislation. Therefore the items he cites to the Chair are not on all fours with the question here, because this is itself an original bill. Now, if a legislative bill were up, reported from the proper committee, in reference to destroying insects that might destroy crops, and you had enumerated the cotton boll weevil and other insects, and some gentleman should offer an amendment to also include in another section the gypsy moth, that legislation would be in order on a legislative bill; whereas if the legislation had been made and the Appropriations Committee should report a bill without legislation authorizing an appropriation for the gypsy moth, and the gentleman should offer an amendment to appropriate money on an appropriation bill for that purpose, the Chair would very properly sustain the point of order against it. But this is a legislative bill, considered under this rule, and the gentleman says that nobody has contended the amendment I offered would not have been in order to this whole bill. But the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make that argument, and sincerely, that it is not germane to the House amendment.

Mr. SISSON. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to say——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I do; because I do not want to misquote the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I publicly stated I made no such admission. There is nothing in the committee amendment which can be used as a handle to create a division by permanent law as the gentleman is attempting.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Illinois and all the other gentlemen prided themselves, when they first commenced the argument, on the reason that it was not in order because all of the bill had been stricken out except section 1. Now, they come back here asking for a rehearing, because they find they were in error about that matter.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. If these gentlemen here want to interrupt me, I will always yield.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not make any such concession by any means. I maintain the gentleman's amendment is not germane to the committee amendment that is stricken out, and I make the further argument, which I sincerely believe in, that the amendment can not be considered, even if it were germane, because the committee has taken action upon those very sections and have eliminated them from further consideration.

Mr. SISSON. Now, if the gentleman wants to have a new hearing on this bill, I will be glad to hear from him.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not want any new hearing, and I am willing for the gentleman to have several hearings.

Mr. SISSON. I am endeavoring to present the argument to the committee that presented itself to me at the very beginning, that here was a rule making in order this reorganization, as it were, of the Public Health Service of the United States, to cooperate with the county and State authorities, and being made in order by special rule of this House, and I have a right to offer this as an amendment to this bill.

When I was first arguing the question I was called down upon the idea that all of this bill was stricken out except the first section, and upon that theory I understood they were proceeding. Now, Mr. Chairman, my contention is that it is in order, under this rule, because it presented for the consideration of this committee everything in Senate resolution 63. That being true, my amendment is in order, because here they specifically deal with State officers, county and municipal health organizations in the caption of the amendment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SISSON. In one moment. And section 6 specifically provides for a cooperation between all the officers created here and the health authorities throughout the United States. That being true, this amendment becomes in order under the language of the resolution from line 13, on page 2, down to line 16, inclusive, and under section 6 of this bill.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman contend that the committee is now considering anything but section 1?

Mr. SISSON. I am contending that you are now considering section 2, which I have offered. The fact that the committee struck out all the balance of the Senate resolution does not change the rule of the House. You can not change what it is provided the committee shall consider.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman claim that we are considering anything except this bill under the rules of the House?

Mr. SISSON. We are considering it under a special rule.

Mr. FOSTER. I will take back all I have said if you will say that.

Mr. SISSON. I call your attention to the House Rule 140. What did you bring that in for?

Mr. FOSTER. For the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SISSON. When you do that you take into consideration every clause in the bill, and you take in all these matters in section 3 which are before the House. Simply because the committee strikes out a section is no reason why you can not amend this bill except where it suits the committee itself.

Mr. FOSTER. Why do you not offer it where it is germane?

Mr. SISSON. I am offering it where it is germane.

Mr. FOSTER. All these other sections are out.

Mr. SISSON. I can give the gentleman my reasons, but I can not give him the power to see them.

Mr. FOSTER. Anybody can see them but the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is now becoming rather personal.

Mr. FOSTER. No; I will take back anything that is unpleasant to my friend.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman argues that solely because the committee has seen fit to strike out all of section 1 this amendment can not be offered. The House might at the very moment of its meeting put all back into the bill. Therefore the gentleman's contention is bound to be unsound.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr DUPRÉ. If I were opposed to a bill, could the gentleman see any better way to enable me to defeat it than to have a gentleman from the Committee on Rules come in and propose to emasculate the bill?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know any better way by which that can be done. But, Mr. Chairman, I insist that in view of the fact that all of Senate joint resolution 63 was presented under this rule by the House for consideration under the rule, and the House by its direction directed the committee to consider that whole joint resolution, we make all that joint resolution in order, make every section in order, and it does not lie in the mouth of any man in this committee to say that because the committee sees fit to strike out one section and two sections that thereby you change the rule. I offered this as a new section because it would have been in order and is in order, under the rule, if all these sections remain in the bill, even in the House, as provided by the rule.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that if the committee struck out all after the enacting clause and then moved to rise and report its recommendations to the House, that before that motion was carried the gentleman's amendment would be in order? Would your motion then be in order?

Mr. SISSON. If you were to strike out the enacting clause and make a motion to rise, my amendment certainly would not be in order then, because the committee decides to rise.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is dodging again.

Mr. SISSON. I am not dodging at all.

Mr. WALSH. Then why not answer my question?

Mr. SISSON. I am answering it.

Mr. WALSH. You did not answer the question that I asked.

Mr. SISSON. I did the best I could to answer your question. Let me ask the wise gentleman from Massachusetts once more, then: Was not your question this, That if the committee should strike out the enacting clause and move to rise——

Mr. WALSH. No. Leave out the motion to rise. I knew the gentleman either did not understand the question or was attempting to evade answering.

Mr. SISSON. I do not attempt to evade anything. I never did that in my life.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman allow me to state the question?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Would the gentleman contend that if the committee struck out all after the enacting clause his motion would then be in order in the committee?

Mr. SISSON. Is that the gentleman's question?

Mr. WALSH. That was the question I asked.

Mr. SISSON. I thought the gentleman before said "and made a motion to rise."

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but I eliminated that.

Mr. SISSON. I did not catch the elimination. I do not think if you struck out the enacting clause——

Mr. WALSH. I did not say "strike out the enacting clause," and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana. I had yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. WALSH. Without answering my question.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a substantive provision has been left in this bill. No enacting clause has been stricken out, no motion to rise has been made. Therefore, can not the gentleman from Mississippi seek to perfect the bill, following what is contained in the committee's proposition as embodied in section 1?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. That is my contention.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If you make a motion to strike out the enacting clause——

Mr. WALSH. That is not my question. It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SISSON. Well, all after the enacting clause. If you do that and stop there, under this special rule if I offered this amendment it would certainly be in order.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has answered my question, and I thank him exceedingly.

Mr. SISSON. It was my intention to answer it all the while, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman mildly insinuated that I was trying to dodge.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the Chair for his indulgence. I am sincere and earnest in my belief that the matter is in order.

Mr. MONDELL. One word more, Mr. Chairman. I have not argued the angles of this question that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has emphasized so much, because I have not felt it necessary to do so. I think it is true that the Chair must consider the question of germaneness from the standpoint of what is in the bill. The amendment proposed by the committee, having been adversely acted on by the House, it is not a part of the bill. If the gentleman had offered his amendment at the point at which he is now offering it, with the committee amendment standing unacted upon, he could not have claimed the provision was germane because it would be germane to some committee recommendation that had not been acted upon. The amendment must be germane to the bill. What is the bill? Why, the Senate bill. Everything else is a recommendation, and assuming that the House had not acted upon the committee recommendation one way or the other, the gentleman could not contend that this amendment was germane because, forsooth an amendment had been proposed which if adopted might have made his amendment germane.

Now, just one word more. The gentleman from Mississippi laid great emphasis upon the statement that one of the cases I referred to was an amendment to an appropriation bill. I do not know whether it was an amendment to an appropriation bill or not. But practically all the other cases cited were amendments to legislative bills. For instance:

To a bill prohibiting importation of goods "made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor," an amendment prohibiting importation of goods made by child labor was held not germane on the ground that labor described in bill constituted a distinct class of labor.

Either way the Chair holds, whether that it is a question of germaneness to the amendments to the Senate bill proposed by the committee or to the first section of the Senate bill, or to both the Senate bill and committee amendments, the amendment is not germane.

Mr. WALSH. If the Chair is ready to rule, I do not care to say anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask pardon for hastening the decision. [Laughter.] The Chair perhaps erred in hearing both sides and has become somewhat confused. [Laughter.] In whatever decision the Chair shall make he will not err more, he confidently believes, than some gentlemen must have erred in argument. [Laughter.] The Chair is of the opinion that the special rule was operative only for the purpose of bringing the resolution before the House and putting the House into Committee of the Whole for its consideration. The ordinary rules of the House, as applied to proceedings in the Committee of the Whole, must still be regarded as controlling. The special rule did not, and could not, limit what the committee would do with the resolution. The committee early in the consideration of the proposed resolution eliminated by unanimous consent everything after section 1. The Chair is of opinion that the committee could do that, and having done so all the portions of the resolution which were eliminated became inoperative for any purpose. Clearly the eliminated portion of the resolution could not be referred to, as the Chair believes, to make proposed amendments germane when otherwise such amendments would not be in order. The Chair, without citing the authorities, although many are at hand, is of the opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is not germane to the resolution as it now stands before the Committee of the Whole, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert a new section as section 2:
"Officers of State, county, and municipal health organizations shall not be commissioned in said reserve corps without the assent of the proper executive officers of their respective States, counties, or municipalities."

Mr. DOREMUS. To that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to section 1, and this is to section 2.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no section 2.

Mr. GORDON. My amendment is to perfect the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan makes or reserves the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. DOREMUS. I make the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the ruling of the Chair has some bearing on this proposed amendment. If the Chair will examine the bill, he will find that the amendment embodies the language in the amendment in section 3, page 3, and is entirely germane to the subject matter of the bill as it now stands. It contemplates a limitation upon the power of appointment and is intended to preserve the rights of the States, counties, and municipalities where epidemics may prevail and where it may be necessary to hold a certain number of physicians to meet the distressing needs of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman's amendment simply contain the language found on page 3, lines 12 to 16?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; literally, as to so much of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's amendment is in order.

Mr. WALSH. It has been eliminated from the bill once.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the point advanced or the argument advanced that matters that were contained in the original committee amendment have been acted upon and therefore that amendments germane at that time were eliminated from consideration, then the logic of the Chair's ruling would compel the Chair to hold that the amendment was out of order, but otherwise it is certainly germane if it had not been for the action of the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to concede that this is precisely the same language that was in the committee amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a part of that language.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the same words.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In so far as it goes it is literally the same.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I submit to the Chair that that has been voted on—that is, it went out by unanimous consent—and that this, in the very same language, is merely a repetition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not the whole matter which went out of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; but then it is included in it and is a substantive part of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is included in that which was stricken out, but it is not the whole of that which was stricken out. However, the language I have used is literally the same so far as it goes.

The CHAIRMAN. But for the fact that the language had been stricken out, the Chair would be of the opinion that this amendment would be germane. It is simply a limitation on the first section. But since it is the exact language which has been stricken out by the committee, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. GORDON. I renew my parliamentary inquiry. This amendment relates to the creation of a new section. I have an amendment which I wish to offer to perfect section 1 before that section is left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will be recognized to submit his amendment.

Mr. GORDON. I move——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have offered an amendment, which has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps it had better be read. It may be an amendment to perfect the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Insert at the end of the bill a new section——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio first.

Mr. GORDON. I move to amend the bill in line 4 by striking out the words "in time of national emergency" and inserting in lieu thereof "during the present emergency."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GORDON: Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "in time of national emergency" and insert in lieu thereof "during the present emergency."

Mr. GORDON. And at the bottom of page 1, in lines 12 and 13, strike out "for the period of five years" and insert in lieu thereof "during the present emergency."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GORDON: Page 1, line 12, after the word "force," strike out the words "for a period of five years" and insert in lieu thereof "during the present emergency."

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal about this bill that did not really go to the merits of it. In fact, we have heard very little in excuse or justification or explanation of the really vital thing in the bill. What does it propose to do? It starts in to create a civil list of commissioned officers. That is what it does. You may camouflage it all you please, but that is what it means. It proposes a law issuing commissions all over the country to a lot of men in civil life; it may be to a lot of young squirts just out of medical college, or a lot of old, superannuated physicians who want to get on the pay roll will try to come down here and get commissions in the Public Health Service. Of course, the issuance of the commissions creates the national emergency. There you have it. Oh, but they say, this will never be done except in times of national emergency. Well, who determines the national emergency? Whenever the President passes out these commissions that is a determination by him that there is a national emergency. There has been a protest against the idea that they were going to wear uniforms. If they are going to be commissioned and put on the pay roll, with salaries up to $4,000 a year, they ought to wear uniforms. They ought to be identified in the community. [Laughter.] I do not believe you ought to commission people in private life without letting everyone know that they are on the pay rolls drawing these salaries even when doing nothing. Now, of course, Dr. Foster made a speech here that almost made us weep when he told about the great sacrifices that have been made by men in the medical profession in the past, but that had absolutely nothing to do with this bill, because those sacrifices were made by men who were not commissioned, by men who were in private life. It had absolutely nothing to do with this emergency. He did not approach the terms of the bill itself. I do not know whether the House will adopt this amendment or not. They have called this a war measure, and the minds and ears and eyes of everybody are closed to any discussion of the real merits or demerits of a measure so designated. Now, why not limit it to the present emergency? Of course, we have an emergency existing at this time; an epidemic of Spanish influenza is raging; and if in the judgment of the Public Health Service and of the President, in the absence of a great number of physicians who are in the military service, there is a consequent shortage of physicians, all of those reasons apply only to this emergency and probably would not apply again in the history of the country. If that is the purpose of this bill why not limit it to the present emergency. That is all I have to say upon the subject. It seems to me if the Members of this House would use just a little common sense and reason they would appreciate the fact that they are authorizing the President of the United States to issue commissions ad libitum all over the United States either now or at any other time that they may be able to convince him that an emergency has arisen or is about to arise. It seems to me the amendment ought to be agreed to by the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this is not wholly an emergency measure—that is, it is not a measure applying only to the particular present emergency. It has been urged on the claim that it is going to be very helpful in this present emergency, but I doubt if anyone really believes that the legislation will be especially and particularly helpful in the emergency now upon us. On the other hand, since I spoke earlier in the day, the bill has been amended, and is now in the form in which it should be if it is wise to establish a permanent reserve in the Public Health Service to meet emergencies as they come along.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. If I understand this bill, the President will not commission these officials except in time of national emergency.

Mr. MONDELL. If that is the view the President takes of it, the President will make a great mistake, and the President will not be accomplishing the good which could be accomplished under the bill.

Mr. BLACK. What does the bill mean if that is not what it says?

Mr. MONDELL. This is what it means: It means that we are to establish a permanent Public Health Service reserve of men scattered about the country who are willing to accept commissions in this reserve, holding themselves in readiness to serve when an emergency arises, to be paid when called into active service by the Surgeon General, in such an emergency. In my opinion there is much merit in such a proposition. I did not see much merit in the bill as presented, on the theory that it was intended to meet this emergency of influenza, because this emergency is well under way and in hand, and I take it that every surgeon in the country is doing his duty, and he is doing his duty as well as he could under this bill. It may, of course, be possible to do some good in the present influenza emergency under the bill. Under the amendments that have been adopted we are proposing a permanent Public Health Service reserve. The men commissioned are not, it is true, commissioned permanently. They are commissioned for five years, but they could be recommissioned immediately if it was deemed wise to do so. What ought to be done is to make these appointments without regard to emergency, to fill up this reserve in time when there is no emergency, and to have these men commissioned in various sections of the country, subject to call when emergency arises.

That was the original theory of the legislation. That was modified some by the recommendation of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in its report. It was still further modified by the amendment which the committee first proposed to the last part of section 2, but as section 2 has now been adopted these commissions will in normal times be granted from time to time without regard to an emergency at the time the commission is issued, and men will receive no pay until they are ordered into active service at the call of the Surgeon General when an emergency arises.

Mr. GORDON. That is true; but the bill recites in section 1 that these men are to be employed in the present emergency or in some other national emergency.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman is not quoting the provisions with his usual accuracy, because what the bill provides is, "That for the purpose of securing a reserve for duty in the Public Health Service in time of national emergency," and so forth.

Mr. GORDON. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. In other words, to build up a reserve in normal times that may be used in time of emergency. Of course, any commissions issued during this present emergency would be for services for the emergency, but when the emergency was over the officers commissioned would go on the inactive list ready to be called when the next emergency arose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio. The Chair understands that without objection both amendments will be voted upon at once.

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOREMUS) there were—ayes 23, noes 9.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming demands tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Six Members; not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following as a new section:
"SEC. 2. During the prevalence of an epidemic no practicing physician shall be appointed to the reserve corps without the consent of the State, county, or municipal authorities in which he resides."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered with the expectation that the committee will sympathize with it because of the present emergency. The amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] have been adopted, limiting the operation of this bill to the present epidemic. I voted for those amendments, because I believed that we need relief, and we need relief now, not after our people have died and after we find that we have no physicians to treat them and no nurses to care for them and no undertakers to bury them. The emergency is here, and if this bill is to be effective it should be effective while the emergency is on.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it logical to commission men for five years only to serve in the present emergency, which may last three weeks?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I opposed the five years' tenure, because I believe that matter should be left to other times.

This bill would not have been brought in had it not been for the present emergency. It came in under cover of the public excitement and distress which now prevails. Otherwise it would not have been here at all.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does the gentleman think if it had come in under the auspices of its friends he would have favored it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I question whether I would if it came under the auspices of any party.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I ask if the supposed champions of this bill are really in favor of it——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the champions——

Mr. DUPRÉ. I said supposed champions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, the gentleman is putting an interpretation upon the motives of the gentlemen who brought in the bill that I shall not indorse, but the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the one great physician in this House, although there are others——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Indiana?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Illinois—laid considerable stress upon the fact that in times gone by some physicians had risen to heroic proportions and had had monuments erected in their memory, and, therefore, that this bill creating a lot of new offices should be passed. I was not in favor of that kind of a program at this time because men and women are now dying in my city for want of physicians' care, and this bill proposes to draw upon these physicians, take them away from the homes, and put them in this special service, where they may not be so much needed as they are in their districts at the present time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. If the gentleman will yield further, can the gentleman conceive under the terms of this bill how anyone can be commissioned without his consent to serve?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He would first have to apply for a commission.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Therefore how can this physician be taken away from the gentleman's city, where the gentleman says he is so much needed?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not want a discussion of politics, but there are ways of picking particular men when you have the power to pick them. If the gentleman wants any further information on that, since this bill has come in under cover of an epidemic, I will refer him to the manner in which appointments are made in several of the war services just now, where it appears "the general rule" is applied to everybody, but somebody's particular friend gets in notwithstanding, and it may happen again.

Mr. DUPRÉ. If the gentleman wants to smear the medical profession in that way——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The medical profession should have all the honor which either the gentleman or any other Member of the House would bestow upon it. I will carry to the monuments erected over the graves of these heroic physicians as many wreaths as will the gentleman from Illinois, but I will not carry them into this House every time I want to get a bill through creating a lot of new offices and requiring an increased taxation of the people to bear the burden, and I will not do it particularly at a time when a crisis exists in my community and in other communities, because we do not have physicians to attend to the sick.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I can not because my five minutes are nearly up. If the gentleman will give me five more I will be glad——

Mr. DUPRÉ. I would be glad to ask it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will ask for it——

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to suggest to the gentleman he might not be able to carry any wreaths to the graves of these heroic physicians unless he allows the physician to attend him and others who are ill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If I am sick in my city or in Washington, as many people are in my city now, and I send for my family physician and he is gone, or I send for a physician around the corner or down the road and he is in the Government service, and I send for the last man I know who is capable of ministering to me and I find he has just got a commission in the Public Health Service to wear a uniform, then I am not in favor——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Then I would repeat what I suggested, that the gentleman is smearing the medical profession and instead of serving humanity——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am trying to serve humanity by keeping the physician where persons are ill and need care. I would not have physicians leave sick-bed sides to go put on a uniform at the port of New York, for instance, in a crisis like this.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will stop a physician from doing that who is a reputable physician.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He is registered under the laws of the State, and I imagine the home authorities can tell whether they have enough physicians to attend the sick——

Mr. LAZARO. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman does not mean to create the impression by this that the Public Health Service will bring about a condition that will deprive the civilian population of medical attention in this crisis?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will take the gentleman's own district. The gentleman is a physician and an eminent one. Suppose what has happened in my district is happening in the gentleman's district, that hundreds and thousands of people are lying sick and helpless, as some of them are to-day, and they are sending for nurses and can not find any nurses, because they are overworked in the hospitals or in the service of the Army, and they send for physicians and can find none, because the physicians are overworked or in the Army. In such a crisis would not the gentleman, as the representative of his district, say, "Stop these physicians we have from going away to wear shoulder straps; we have particular need of their medical services; or, at least, let them remain here until the epidemic is over"?

Mr. LAZARO. I hope the gentleman will understand that physicians are not looking for shoulder straps. They want to render efficient service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, they want some authority; they want a little more recognition than they are getting now. They want to be known when they go into the community on Government business as being Government officials. That is what they want. They do not want to wear shoulder straps when they enter my house when my child is sick, and they are not likely to come into my house when they have got shoulder straps on——

Mr. LAZARO. That is not the point.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that is the point. You take my physician and put him in the Army service.

Mr. LAZARO. It makes no difference what law we enact to-day to relieve the situation, we can not increase the number of doctors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But you can reduce the number available for an epidemic, and that is what I am complaining of.

Mr. LAZARO. You can not increase or reduce the number of doctors. It is a question of where the doctor can render the most efficient service. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then would the gentleman say——

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman must understand that the doctors are not looking for uniforms or shoulder straps. They merely want to render efficient service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; and I want them to render efficient service. I agree with the gentleman as to that. But I will state the case on this proposition: Would the gentleman think as a physician that he was rendering the most efficient service at the bedside of a dying friend who had no one in the world to call on but him, or by taking a Government commission to inspect certain institutions out in the State of Indiana, for instance? Which would be the most efficient service in the name of humanity?

Mr. LAZARO. I take it that this Government is big enough, and that the medical service is big enough, to look into this situation thoroughly and to see that every physician, whether he is relieving the situation among the civilian population or anywhere else, can render the best service where he is needed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is too good a friend for me to insist on a categorical answer as to the ethics, but I will ask the gentleman, when we take a man out of private practice in an emergency like that which prevails and put him into public life, if we do not take him away from the bedside where he is needed and really give him a political job?

Mr. LAZARO. I take it that the Government and the medical service is too big a proposition to consider this from a political standpoint, and that the Government understands——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman accept my statement as to the fact that we do not have enough physicians in Philadelphia to meet the demand, and the poor people are going about crying, as they did in the days of old, for some one to come and relieve them in their distress?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute in order to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. That does not interfere with my recognition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman think that the Government understands the importance of conserving the health of the civil population engaged in the industries necessary to furnish the things essential for the men on the firing line? And does not the gentleman think the Government understands the seriousness and importance of conserving their health and will look into that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope so; but I am saying to the gentleman that the Government has not met the situation in my city, did not meet it in Boston, did not meet the situation in New York, and is not meeting the situation in Washington. It depends upon the local authorities, who find themselves very short-handed in the emergency.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I am seeking recognition.

Mr. FOSTER. I already have it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there are physicians anywhere who would leave their homes when they are badly needed to accept a commission in the Public Health Service. He would consider his first duty to his community; but if he could be spared with safety, he would go to some other community where they could not get medical help. That he should do. I do not believe every man in the medical profession is a saint, by any means, but I believe there are many honest and conscientious physicians.

A man that is not conscientious ought not to be a physician. He is dealing with human life. He is dealing with flesh and blood. He is not dealing with a few thousand dollars that may be made or lost to-day or to-morrow. The medical profession is a great profession, and any man who goes into that profession with any other idea than that he is to do noble service to everybody is unfit to remain in it. He does not enter it only because he is to get $100 or $1,000 as a fee, but he goes into it because he can do some good to the people with whom he comes in contact in their distress.

Now, these physicians who are in the Public Health Service are expected to go where there is an epidemic. They are expected to go wherever there is suffering. A doctor as such only goes where there is suffering.

People do not call a doctor when they are well. They have no use for him then as a doctor. They need him only when they are in distress, and the man who is practicing medicine in any place in this Union that is not conscientious enough to realize that the life of the person he is attending is in his hands is unfit to be a doctor.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

Mr. VESTAL. Is it not the purpose of this bill, if it becomes a law, not to take doctors away from such a district as that represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], but if there happens to be a district that is affected with some disease to send doctors into that district instead of taking doctors away?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. VESTAL. And would it not operate in this case, in the district represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there would be more physicians there than there are at this time?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. The gentleman is entirely right about it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania spoke of the city of Boston. I happen to know a little about that. They have had an awful epidemic there, and hundreds of people have lost their lives. The Public Health Service did send men to Boston and help in that epidemic. Take the city of Oswego, N. Y. The Public Health Service sent doctors that they could spare to that city in order that they might help. I do not know to what city it will come next, or where they will next be needed; but we do know this, that if the epidemic has passed Boston and it becomes practically normal again, if there are places in the State of Illinois affected by it I hope that we may avail ourselves of the physicians of Boston who might come out there and help our people. That is what I hope may be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If this epidemic should, unfortunately, strike Illinois——

Mr. FOSTER. It is there now——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the physicians of Illinois will labor as industriously, faithfully, and devotedly as have the physicians who have remained in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt they will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No more devoted body of men exists in the country than those that remain in the city of Philadelphia. They are among the noblest men on earth, and in this emergency are doing heroic work.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt there are many good, conscientious doctors in that city.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I still adhere to the contention that to take them away at this particular time would be very unfortunate.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman spoke of taking away from Philadelphia physicians to another part of the country and leaving that city without sufficient help. This bill does not contemplate such a thing and it would not be done.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Suppose the epidemic is over in the city of the gentleman from Pennsylvania before it is over in the city represented by the gentleman from Illinois. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it would not be reasonable as a war measure to ask physicians in the city represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to relieve the situation in other cities?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would be a splendid thing to do, and it ought to be done. But my point was that the gentlemen who go into this Medical Reserve Corps now will not be the men who will go into the homes to relieve that particular situation. They will rather investigate and advise together to see that the epidemic does not spread.

Mr. FOSTER. They have done it and they are doing it now in some cities when the doctors are gone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the effect of the gentlemen's amendment would simply be to take the power of commissioning these physicians out of the hands of the President and invest it in the hands of the State, county, or municipal authorities, because if we say to the President, "You may commission these physicians in the Public Health Service provided the governor gives his consent," it puts it into the hands of the governor to say what physician shall receive this commission, and it is rather an unusual power, or rather an unusual condition, to attach to this executive function which we are about to impose upon the President.

I noticed that it was contained in the House substitute for the Senate resolution, but I do not think, in view of the action of the committee which reported the measure and the action of the committee this afternoon which has treated that substitute by kicking it downstairs—I do not think that the fact that that language is in there would be considered persuasive.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I believe the House substitute provided that no officer of a State should be used without State authority.

Mr. WALSH. I believe that was the limitation there. But for us to say to the President of the United States, "You can commission this physician in the city of Philadelphia provided the mayor gives his permission," seems to me to be verging upon the border of unconstitutionality, and certainly is unwise. And I do not think, while I have not been overenthusiastic for this legislation, that we ought to encumber it with any such amendment as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the committee rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HILLIARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOREMUS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is recognized for 40 minutes under a prior order of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-six Members present, not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, if the point of order is insisted on I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has announced that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SEARS. May I propound an inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of no quorum having been made and sustained, the Chair does not think it is in order. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 16, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations for improvement of marine hospitals at Baltimore, Md.; Boston, Mass.; New Orleans, La.; New York (Stapleton), N. Y.; San Francisco, Cal.; and Savannah, Ga. (H. Doc. No. 1329), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLANTON: A bill (H. R. 13077) providing for the completion of the construction of a bridge across the San Juan River at Shiprock, N. Mex., on the Navajo Indian Reservation; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MORIN: A bill (H. R. 13078) providing a working fund for the treasurer of the United States Military Academy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. VARE: A bill (H. R. 13079) to provide for the construction of a bridge over the Delaware River between the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey; to the Committtee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SCULLY: Resolution (H. Res. 444) for the appointment of a committee to investigate the causes and ascertain the losses sustained by the recent explosion at Morgan, N. J.; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CROSSER: A bill (H. R. 13080) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles V. Wells; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 13081) granting an increase of pension to William M. Nourse; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOSTER: A bill (H. R. 13082) granting an increase of pension to William Oakley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13083) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Hiram C. Hall; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 13084) granting a pension to Mary Marley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOORES of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 13085) granting a pension to Emily F. Washburn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petition of Springport Grange, No. 1184, of Cayuga County, N. Y., protesting against the zone postal rate on second-class mail matter; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the board of directors of the Albany Chamber of Commerce, favoring widening and deepening the channel of the upper Hudson River in the interest of the development of inland waterways; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, urging Congress to evolve a well-balanced and financially sound revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 16, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for the sublime faith in Thee, which manifests itself in a thousand deeds of heroism on the field of carnage and in the sacrifices exhibited by all classes, especially the physicians and nurses who are devoting themselves to the preservation of life, the alleviation of suffering, in the terrible scourge which has come upon the people.

Give wisdom to those in authority, courage to those who are battling for the right, that the Christ spirit may be victorious over the foes of liberty and over the terrible scourge which is robbing homes of their dear ones and making desolate the hearts of thousands. Comfort them in the blessed hope of the immortality of the soul and the eternal goodness of God; through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the House was kind enough yesterday to give me 40 minutes in which to address the House. If I may get unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I do not care to take up that time, and I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Postmaster General and strictures made upon him. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, in view of the character of the address I do not feel that consent should be given——

Mr. BLANTON. I will state that there is nothing personal in my address.

Mr. MONDELL. And therefore I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TAGUE, indefinitely, as he is contesting his nomination before the Ballot Law Commission of Massachusetts; and

To Mr. LUNN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 13086; H. Rept. 830) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, which was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STAFFORD reserved all points of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent of the House to take up the bill just reported, notwithstanding the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman certain that there is any rule that prohibits the gentleman from taking it up immediately?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not; but it has been a rule of custom, and I would not want to do it over the protest of the membership of the House. But if the House desires, I am prepared to present the bill to the House to-day for consideration.

Mr. NORTON. Has the bill been printed, and is it available for Members?

Mr. SHERLEY. The bill has been printed, and I understand copies will be available for the Members of the House. The hearings are also available.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Kentucky serving notice or asking unanimous consent?

Mr. SHERLEY. I make that request, but the gentleman from Florida desires to present a matter, and I am willing to wait a minute or two for that purpose.

INFLUENZA IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for not exceeding five minutes, and I ask to have two letters read, which I send to the desk in further support of the remarks I made the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for not exceeding five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a minute about a matter of health.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the fresh air abounds in the Hall of the House. In the street cars, the passenger cars, the hotels generally, the windows are open to admit the fresh air. My observation has been, and my experience is, that with an epidemic of this kind raging, after you get the fresh air you are more subject to the epidemic by the cold draft coming into your face or striking you in the back than you would be without the fresh air. I want to draw the attention of the Members of the House to it in the hope that if the House agrees to it the windows may be closed except when it is necessary to have additional fresh air.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to make a statement. The other morning the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asked unanimous consent that the galleries be closed and that the Speaker be directed to have them closed. Unanimous consent was granted, and the Speaker had them closed. Yesterday several Members came to the Speaker, protesting that by having the windows and doors shut up it made an intolerable condition in the House. So the Speaker, with the Doorkeeper, devised a scheme to obviate that condition. That was to put guards at the foot of the stairs so that persons could not get up to the galleries, and open the doors to admit the fresh air. Where doctors disagree, the Chair does not know what to do.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I spoke of the importance of keeping calm and avoiding hysteria and cooperating with the health authorities in order to control this epidemic. In this epidemic, as in everything else, the middle ground is the safe course. To give you an idea of mistakes that can be made when we are trying to do the right thing, let me say that on a street car the other day it began to rain. It was raining hard and the wind was blowing. They said they could not put the windows down because they had been ordered up. I said: "Well, choose between the two evils. The people were getting wet. Close some windows. Do not let these women and children get wet to the skin, for it may be an hour or two before they get home." It shows that in an epidemic of this kind people are liable to lose their heads and do the wrong thing. The safe thing is to keep the middle ground and avoid extremes.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. What is the gentleman's advice? He is a physician.

Mr. LAZARO. I would advise that we have air in here all of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] is recognized.

Mr. SEARS rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not want to be placed in the attitude of waiving the time which has been allotted me by not objecting. I presume that time is not waived by not objecting.

The SPEAKER. This has nothing to do with the gentleman's time. Is there objection to the gentleman from Florida proceeding for not to exceed five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, as the Members will recall, I took up the question of additional help being brought to Washington. I did this because, as I stated then, I felt I would be guilty of criminal negligence unless I did all in my power to prevent further congestion. I believe the Members of the House agree with my statement that conditions demand prompt action. I want to commend the newspapers of the city of Washington for the stand they have taken in urging the departments not to bring additional help here. At the time I made the statement before the House I said unless some relief was given I would introduce a resolution, but desiring to be absolutely fair I first wrote the Civil Service Commission and will read the two letters which they sent me, one of them being a copy of a letter which was sent to the heads of the several departments:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., October 14, 1918.

Hon. WM. J. SEARS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SEARS: In reply to your suggestion of October 12 that the commission issue an order restricting appointments of employees for service in Washington on account of the prevailing epidemic, your attention is invited to the inclosed identical letter addressed to heads of departments and appointing officers generally.

Very truly, yours,

J. A. MCILHENNY, President.

OCTOBER 14, 1918.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

SIR: Upon the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Public Health Service, and the District Health Service that appointments of Government employees be restricted in view of the prevailing epidemic of influenza, the commission has the honor to suggest that the department make requisition upon the commission only for those clerks and other employees absolutely necessary at this time for the maintenance of the war program.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully, J. A. MCILHENNY, President.

Mr. Speaker, this does not reach the end that I had in view. If it is left to the heads of the departments to make requests for additional employees, I fear employees will continue to be brought to the District. Not naming the department, while visiting some of the departments yesterday I heard the chief of one of them talking about the additional help they expected to bring in at once or in the near future. Certainly they do not understand conditions prevailing here and the already overcrowded condition which exists. I absolutely agree with the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO] that we should not let hysteria carry us off our feet, and that the best way to fight disease is not to become frightened. Perhaps fright causes more deaths than anything else. Since making my remarks on the floor of this House I had occasion to go out and look up a young lady from my home town, having been informed that she was suffering from the disease. I went to the house at which she was stopping and was informed that they had four cases there, Government workers, one of them very low and not expected to live until night. Everywhere we turned on the streets we met funeral processions. I really believe it will be criminal for the Members of Congress to permit additional help to come to Washington until the epidemic is over and adequate accommodations can be secured. Some weeks ago my wife spent the entire afternoon going over the city in our automobile in an effort to secure comfortable rooms for some young ladies from my district but was not successful. Since then, however, they have secured nice rooms.

In view of the above, to permit other girls to come here, with no home to go to, with no heat in the homes which they finally secure rooms in, with no medical attention if they should get sick, is certainly not fair to them. I sincerely trust the heads of the departments will take into consideration the almost impossible task of securing rooms, the appalling death rate, the overcrowded conditions now existing, and that they will not ask for any additional help. If they persist in it, which I am positive they will not do, I shall introduce a resolution. In fact, I shall take the question up with the President to-day and urge him to issue a proclamation stopping further importation of clerical help to the city until the epidemic is passed and the crowded condition is relieved.

I was told yesterday by a reliable citizen that one day this week a father had to build the coffin for his own child; that two brothers had to dig the grave and bury their brother. If that does not show conditions in the District deserve and should receive at our hands some radical action I am greatly mistaken. I do not care to take up more of the time of the House. I sincerely trust the papers will continue their present fight and that the Members, as I shall do, will urge upon the boys and girls in their districts not to be persuaded entirely through patriotism to come here until they can at least be assured they will be properly cared for. I desire also to commend the Civil Service Commission for the stand taken by them, and also their prompt action.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes on the aircraft production and in regard to producing spruce timber which is absolutely needed by the Government at the present time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, there will probably be an opportunity when we reach some item in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill to speak on anything that is germane to the aircraft production.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall not yield right now. I believe that the House desires to take up this urgent deficiency appropriation bill right now. [Applause.] I have, as the servant of the House, in order to bring it forward, worked every night for the past two weeks until midnight, Sunday included. I am prepared to go forward with the bill if the House is [applause], and now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BLANTON. To either insist upon my time or, first, to prefer a request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I ask for my time.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to cooperate with the wishes of the House, but this is what the Aircraft Board desires——

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday I was granted time by the House. Yesterday it was agreed by the House that immediately after the termination of the bill then under consideration I should be granted 40 minutes. I ask if it is not in order at this time that the 40 minutes allotted me be granted under the order of the House?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, was not that order predicated upon the idea that it was the order of the day?

Mr. BLANTON. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. And not the order of a subsequent day—the order for Monday, the calendar day?

Mr. BLANTON. No; the RECORD will show that it was to follow immediately at the conclusion of the bill then under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday the House made a special order modifying the old order that when the bill that was under consideration yesterday was concluded the gentleman from Texas should have 40 minutes in which to address the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. Will the Chair permit an observation?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Yesterday the gentleman from Texas had the privilege of addressing the House for 40 minutes after the reading of the Journal. A question arose after the Journal was read as to whether or not the gentleman from Texas should immediately proceed, the previous question having been ordered on the Public Health Service reserve measure, and then the gentleman from Texas asked that instead of proceeding, in the absence of any decision by the Chair upon the question which arose, that he might proceed following the disposition of the Public Health Service bill. The original order was for yesterday, and the transfer of his time simply from after the approval of the Journal to after the disposition of the Public Health Service bill, I submit, would not carry the time over to a subsequent day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, whatever the thought may have been the order is this:

The SPEAKER——

The SPEAKER. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Page 11267 of the RECORD of yesterday, October 15:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 40 minutes after the matter which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has in charge is disposed of. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The last item of business yesterday afternoon was the passage of the bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] had charge of, and I submit that that having been the last business conducted the gentleman is entitled to his 40 minutes, and he was recognized on yesterday and only prevented from proceeding by the absence of a quorum. I ask, Mr. Speaker, again that the gentleman from Texas may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject he has indicated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Postmaster General and the strictures which have been made upon him. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in spite of the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee I still have doubt as to whether the gentleman is entitled to time at this time. The gentleman from Texas has had permission before upon two occasions to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Upon one of those occasions it gave rise to serious controversy with his own colleague. Upon the other occasion he peculiarly used the privilege by inserting matters which had nothing to do with the subject for which permission was granted to extend his remarks, and I do not think, in view of that and upon this particular partisan matter which has arisen and which has subsided as far as the House is concerned, that the House ought to permit him to extend his remarks. The House is responsible for this situation, and the House knew when it gave him permission yesterday to transfer the time that this peculiar complication might arise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman stated just now, as I understood, that the matter had subsided——

Mr. WALSH. As far as he knew, as far as the House was concerned.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the gentleman any information as to whether the assault upon the Postmaster General made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is being officially circulated?

Mr. WALSH. In reply to the gentleman, I would say I have no information whether the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota attacking certain happenings in which the Postmaster General seemed to have been implicated has been circulated, nor do I know whether either the reply made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the gentleman's colleague, or the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], has been circulated. I have no information upon the subject, but I do submit that the incident, as far as the House is concerned, is closed. We had that dispute the other day. The charges were made, and they were replied to, and it seems to me that this attempt now for an insertion in the RECORD of a supplemental defense by the gentleman from Texas ought not to be approved by the House, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on the question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the plain language of the order that was read indicates that it should follow the business that day then before the House. It does not make it a continuing order of the House. There is not a word said that makes it a continuing order of the House. I have no desire to interfere with the gentleman from Texas, but I think it is due the House that we proceed with a matter of such great importance as this deficiency bill as early as possible.

The SPEAKER. Now, the Chair thoroughly sympathizes with the gentleman from Kentucky in his position and in his statement, but the House is entirely too loose about making these special orders and unanimous consents. Now, when the gentleman from Texas asked the last time yesterday the Chair was very slow in putting the request, because he wanted to give everybody plenty of chance to object, but nobody objected. It is a unanimous-consent order that when we got through with the bill which the gentleman from Illinois had in charge that the gentleman from Texas should have 40 minutes. Now, there were a hundred men here, and any one of them could have objected, but they all held their peace. The gentleman from Texas.

THE ATTACK AGAINST THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on September 12 the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], in a prepared typewritten speech read on the floor of this House, made against the Postmaster General very grave charges, which, if true, convicted the Postmaster General of being a heartless, cruel, selfish, inefficient, dishonest wretch, and warranted his expulsion from public office for all time to come. By reason of his being an important member of our war Cabinet, and a personal friend and close confidential adviser of the President of the United States, I do not believe that such charges should remain unanswered in every detail.

Notwithstanding his speech was carefully prepared, typewritten, and by him read from manuscript, and he refused all requests to yield to questions seeking at the time to correct his statements, the gentleman before beginning his speech asked for and obtained consent to revise his remarks, which privilege he exercised, by revising his speech before publishing same in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two days later.

The gentleman began by saying:

To win this war completely and speedily should be the sole purpose and the sole endeavor of every American citizen—

Leading us to expect at least that the words he was about to utter would give some inspiration to our armies abroad. But continuing, he said:

At this time—at any time—criticism of a public official is justified only when the public welfare requires it. Especially is this true respecting one who has attained great heights of power The condition to which our Postal Service has been brought—forced there by the unrelenting and oppressive hand of Albert S. Burleson, the Postmaster General (changed in the revision to read: As it appears by an unrelenting and oppressive system inaugurated by the present Postmaster General)—has become a menace to the Nation's business, to the well-being of our people, and to the welfare of the several hundred thousand employees in his charge.

The occasion of his speech and real purpose of his criticism were gradually unfolded and made manifest as he proceeded, but not until he reached the final paragraph did it appear conclusively that he was merely indulging in cheap politics. I quote it from his original manuscript as read by him, procured from the Public Printer, as follows:

Such is the Burleson attitude toward those who are so unfortunate as to have to work. There has now been placed in his hands the fortunes of 400,000 workers of the telephone and telegraph systems of the country. What is to be their fate? I for one am ready to resolve that the backs of these workers shall never be bared to receive the lash of this modern Simon Legree. There is but one way to stay the hand of this tyrant. Elect this fall a Republican Congress, and that Congress will change the Burleson system, or at least check its further extension. I know of no other way that efficiency may be restored to the great Post Office Department, the well-being of our people served, and three-quarters of a million workers saved from industrial bondage.

Let me read you the following additional excerpts of his speech, from his original manuscript:

From almost the beginning of the Burleson administration we have known something was wrong in the Post Office Department. Recent evidence discloses that conditions there have become critical. The mail system that serves every business, every humble fireside, every brave soldier boy at the front has steadily declined in efficiency, and further demoralization is in progress. Letters sent either fail to arrive or arrive after exasperating delay. It is an everyday, a common occurrence, for letters once posted never to be heard of again. * * * And yet on every hand I find business men complaining of the mail service; families have tried in vain to communicate with absent members; and many a soldier boy in the land "over there" has gone to battle, into that hell of bursting shell, exploding bomb, and deadly machine gun; into that inferno of where the earth beneath him heaves and crumbles, death falls in the track of a thousand volcanoes, and the very air he breathes is poison; gone into battle and died "somewhere in France," and never received the message of love from a praying mother way back home, a message that her old hand penned and tremblingly placed in the mail with a prayer—one Mr. Burleson's system failed to deliver. * * * Investigation discloses that the mail service is demoralized, a demoralization that results from a tyrannical, even brutal, treatment of 300,000 postal employees by the Postmaster General, and from certain policies adopted that seem to ignore all consideration of efficiency. We who knew Mr. Burleson before he became Postmaster General expected that he would administer the office along the narrowest and most bitterly partisan lines. We were in no sense disappointed. He is the arch politician of the time. He can see no proposition except in a bitterly partisan way.

Thus ignoring the fact that we are in war, with our 2,000,000 brave soldiers fighting over scattered battle fronts 3,000 miles away, many of whom scarcely wrote or received letters before the war began but all of whom now write, and have written to them, many letters from relatives and friends, thus increasing the volume of our mails to enormous and unprecedented proportions, and after saddling upon the Postmaster General the responsibilitiy for all delays, without crediting him with any extenuating circumstances whatever, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] presented against the Postmaster General the following 18 additional indictments:

(1) That Mr. Burleson immediately after assuming office falsely asserted through the press that there was a deficit of $732,301.90 left by Mr. Hitchcock, when in fact there was a surplus of $219,118.12, being the first time in the history of the country that the Postal Service was self-supporting.

(2) That Mr. Burleson removed all Republican postmasters from office, and then falsely asserted that the department would be conducted on a purely business and nonpartisan basis.

(3) That the President's order which went into effect on April 1, 1917, taking all postmasters out of politics and placing them upon the merit system based upon competitive civil-service examinations, was a mere pretense and make-believe.

(4) That Burleson's system required the Civil Service Commission to place a representative of Burleson on the examining board of three to dominate the board, and that Burleson prescribed the method of marking the percentage to be given for this, that, and the other, enabling the Postmaster General to keep the appointments well in hand.

(5) That the Civil Service Commission has been made an agency of the Postmaster General, its freedom destroyed, and its capacity to act justly and fairly taken away.

(6) That the greatest cause of inefficiency in the Postal Service is Burleson's treatment of his employees. The Burleson mind is the tyrant's mind; the Burleson system the tyrant's system. Almost at once Burleson attacked the workers under him with the fury of a tyrant. Apparently to see workers well paid, contented, and in high spirit, doing their best, drives him to frenzy. There is no length he will not go to prevent it, no height he will not climb, no depth he will not descend.

(7) That Burleson contemptuously ignores acts of Congress; that a few years ago he robbed the rural mail carriers out of the $100 increase given them by Congress, amounting to $3,000,000.

(8) That Burleson arbitrarily reduced the salaries of collectors in the City Delivery Service from $1,200 to $1,000, and continued the practice even after ordered by Congress to restore it.

(9) That Burleson took from the boys delivering special-delivery letters the 8 cents remuneration they had been in the habit of receiving and put the boys on a miserly salary, or one of his favorite contract systems, as he couldn't endure seeing a boy earn the whole 8 cents the patron had placed on the letter for that purpose.

(10) That substitutes for carriers, who had been hanging between life and starvation, getting 30 cents an hour when they worked, were shoved a little nearer starvation by Burleson, who cut their scanty wages to 27½ cents per hour.

(11) That a cheap labor contract system, without regard to efficiency, always looks good to Burleson, and he has tried his best to have established such a system in the place of the present rural carrier system.

(12) That repressive measures of all kinds have been put into effect; privileges enjoyed by employees, making their work more agreeable and life more pleasant, have all been taken away, and now men are chained to their work, cowed and browbeaten.

(13) That when the National Guard were sent to the border in 1916, Burleson required the many members in the Postal Service to resign their places, depriving their families of means of subsistence.

(14) That Burleson refused to permit a letter carrier to attend his father's funeral.

(15) That Burleson has made it almost a capital offense for a postmaster to be on good terms with the employees of his office, and showers smiling favor upon them for harsh and exacting treatment of employees.

(16) That Burleson hates labor unions, and during five years has not permitted much to remain of the organizations of his employees; that he refused to permit Mr. E. J. Gainor, president of an organization, to attend a convention, and his attitude is important because he is the political dictator of this administration, directing the administration's policies in this regard, and thus likely to affect millions of workers in the land.

(17) That Mr. Burleson is a man of great wealth—perhaps the wealthiest man in this Cabinet—inheriting a large quantity of land in Texas.

(18) That Burleson, with his brother-in-law, operated a farm of several thousand acres in Texas with convict labor hired from the State, and conditions became so unspeakable and, in a legislative investigation, were found to be so monstrous on the Burleson and other farms that all Texas was horrified and the legislature forever prohibited such practice in the future; that the poor wretches who were to toil and suffer to enrich the great Burleson were the young lads whose feet had strayed for the first time and the old men whose faltering steps would soon lead them to the grave, and to these were added those suffering from sickness or bodily infirmity, and the treatment of whom [for which Mr. Burleson was held responsible by the gentleman from Minnesota] was the following: Convicts worked in the morning as early as the guard could see, and returned to buildings between sundown and dark; excessive work and general bad treatment, making wrecks of many strong men; requiring men to run to and from their work from 1 to 3 miles, and while worked pushed excessively; convicts often whipped, using a short handle of wood to which were fastened several straps 5 feet long, each above an inch wide, under which cruel lash the naked flesh was cut and torn, and in many instances the poor sufferer died; B. F. Luce punished 18 licks for laziness, and Joe Oliver 17 licks. Picture, if you can, these tender youths in their teens, these tottering old men, these sick and infirm, with bared backs, receiving the lash for laziness. Little wonder they sank and died. J. C. Zachery forced to wade the river in cold weather of all kinds; P. Hubbard afraid to tell of bad treatment because the punishment would be more severe than he could stand. J. B. Maurice heard the inspector tell the men, "I have turned you all over to Capt. Brooks, and if 20 licks won't do I'll give orders for 120; and if that don't do, by the eternal gods, I will give 1,020. J. S. Lowery knew of guards whipping Foster four or five times a day, and they beat him up until they saw he was going to die, and placed him in a tree infested with ants, which got on him. Behold that picture, if you can. This man, with naked body, torn by lash and bleeding from a score of wounds, compelled to stand on an old stump while ants swarmed over him, crawled into his wounds, and stung his quivering flesh into a frenzy of pain. Three other men murdered there, one that couldn't keep up with the squad, and the guard tied a rope around his neck and tied it to the horn of his saddle. He lived three days. Another, named Dunn, was beaten to death. A Mexican, whipped with Dunn, died this same night. The guard whipped them till they gave out and then tied them down in the field with their faces up to the sun. Mr. Chairman, hell can have no terrors for convicts that toiled and suffered on the Burleson farm. Such is the Burleson attitude toward those who are so unfortunate as to have to work. There has now been placed in his hands the fortunes of 400,000 workers of the telephone and telegraph systems of the country. What is to be their fate? I, for one, am ready to resolve that the backs of these workers shall never be bared to receive the lash of this modern Simon Legree.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have quoted the foregoing excerpts from the gentleman's speech as actually made here on the floor, copying same from his manuscript, because his revision published two days later was materially changed.

Who is this Postmaster General whom the gentleman has so viciously condemned? A member of a family in Texas honorable for generations. He was the assistant city attorney of Austin, the capital of Texas, from 1885 to 1890; was attorney of the twenty-sixth judicial district of Texas from 1891 to 1896; each time without any opposition in his own party he was elected to the Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, Sixtieth, Sixty-first, Sixty-second, and Sixty-third Congresses, and while serving in such honored capacity he became the Postmaster General of the United States.

CONVICT LABOR ON BURLESON FARM.

In what manner was Mr. Burleson connected with or responsible for the unpardonable cruelties alleged against him? In what manner did he sin? To utilize its convicts, the State of Texas leased from owners a number of farms, among which was one owned partly by Mr. Burleson. While reciting his condemnation, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] had in his pocket a copy of this lease contract—now printed on pages 10256, 10257, and 11120, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—which, by its specific recitations, proves conclusively that the States of Texas had absolute custody, control, and management of its convicts, worked them under its own guards, fed them, clothed them, disciplined them, and had exclusive operation and care of them, and that neither Mr. Burleson nor any other owner of the land had anything whatever to do with such convicts. No matter how deservedly certain State officials may have merited censure, why should Mr. Burleson be condemned, when he had no knowledge of or connection with the matter, and was wholly innocent of any wrongdoing? He, with another, merely leased their farm to the State of Texas. Mr. Burleson in Washington attending to his official duties had nothing whatever to do with the method the State of Texas used in working its leased land with its convicts.

During his speech, when the gentleman refused to yield to a question seeking to correct his unwarranted accusations against the Postmaster General, I caused a quorum of the House ordered to hear his assertions, because I knew the facts would not support them. Since then I have gone to the trouble to procure from the chief clerk of the Post Office Department the following facts connected with each criticism in detail, and in presenting same, furnished me upon request by the chief clerk of the Post Office Department, I can assure you that said chief clerk vouches for the correctness of each statement made.

TRANSMISSION OF DOMESTIC MAILS.

Reports of the daily operations of the Postal Service show that the mail, though presented in greater volume than ever before in the history of the country, is being handled much more expeditiously than in previous years.

That there has been delay, sometimes quite serious, in the transmission of the mails is a matter of public knowledge, and while it is regretted that there are such delays the public generally thoroughly understands that they are for the most part unavoidable because of conditions growing out of the war and are not due to inefficiency, as some would have the public believe. All of us have experienced some inconvenience. Letters have been delayed and have even miscarried altogether. Who has not expected it, with 2,000,000 soldiers scattered abroad and millions of men and women in America away from their homes laboring in strange places, daily striving to help win the war. With an ordinary laborer earning several times as much as Congress pays to postal employees, almost every department of the Postal Service has had its working force depleted. Many experienced employees have been sent abroad. We should all be patriotic enough to adapt ourselves to war-time conditions and be able to comprehend the difficulties under which every branch of the Government service and every line of business is working, giving all the strength that is in them toward the successful prosecution of the war. The great majority of you patriotic Republicans will not contend that the Postal Service is "inefficient." In order to gain political office and win back the control of this House is it necessary for you Republicans to publicly proclaim to our deadly enemies in Germany and Austria, to our battling allies, and to our brave soldiers in France that a leading Member of the Cabinet of the United States, selected by the great President of this Nation, the confidential adviser of the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, is a heartless, cruel, selfish, inefficient, unreliable, deceitful, dishonest, oppressive, murderous tyrant? Will the loyal, patriotic Republicans of this Nation who are standing behind the President to win this war, approve of such action in this critical emergency by rewarding you with their vote? It can not be expected that the Postal Service will be as perfect or as highly efficient during war times, with all the obstacles and handicaps growing out of the war, as it is under normal conditions.

In spite of the efficient administration of the Government service at this time, or how much money may be expended, it is utterly impracticable to entirely eliminate such delays, whether they may affect the Postal Establishment or some other branch of the Government service, and it is the part of all loyal Americans to adapt themselves to war conditions and cooperate with the Government and to frown upon the faultfinders.

The people have the right to criticize any branch of the Government, but in war time especially such criticisms to be justified should not only be required by the public welfare, as the gentleman stated, but should be made in good faith, and should be intelligent, honest, reasonable, and just.

SOLDIERS' MAIL.

No responsibility rests, or has rested, with the Post Office Department for delays in soldiers' mail. The Post Office Department established a postal service in France to facilitate the delivery of mail for our Expeditionary Forces. On account of objection on the part of military authorities information as to the location of troops and facilities for the transmission of mail were withheld from the civil postal officials to such an extent as to cause delays in the mail. To overcome this all responsibility for the delivery of mail to the Expeditionary Force in France after leaving the American port was transferred to the Army. The delays that occurred in delivering soldiers' mail when the Post Office Department had charge of it in France was due to the fact that the military authorities felt that the civilian postal employees should not be given military information as to the location of troops, and so forth. In justice to the Post Office Department it must be stated that the War Department, when it did take over the delivery of soldiers' mail in France, had to give to the people who handled the mail identically the same information that they had theretofore declined to give to the Post Office Department. This fact is not to be taken as any criticism of the War Department or the Post Office Department, but simply to explain a condition, namely, that it was finally determined that it was absolutely necessary for the people handling the mail to have this information before it could be delivered promptly. All of this is explained fully in the statement of Capt. Frank E. Frazier, United States Army, which following my remarks I would like to insert in the RECORD as Exhibit A.

POSTAL REVENUES.

Under the administration of Postmaster General Hitchcock—Republican—there was an audited postal deficit of $1,785,523.10 for the year ending June 30, 1912, the year next preceding that in which Mr. Burleson assumed charge of the Post Office Department.

The audited postal surplus June 30, 1913, during the first year of Mr. Burleson's administration, was $4,510,650.91; in 1914 the surplus was $4,376,463.05.

For the fiscal year 1915 postal receipts remained practically stationary, due largely to war conditions, whereas normally the increase of receipts each year is about 7.21 per cent. The normal increase would have added about $21,000,000 to the receipts of the department. In the absence of any increase in the receipts normally to be counted upon naturally there was a deficit that year of $1,133,308.97.

For the fiscal year 1916 there was an audited surplus of $5,829,236.07. For the year 1917 Postmaster General Burleson showed there was an audited surplus of $9,836,211.90.

From 1883, when Postmaster General Gresham—a Democrat under Cleveland's administration—reported an audited surplus of $2,181,352.57, until 1911 there was a deficit every year during Republican administrations, the smallest deficit being $2,961,169.91, and ranging from that to a deficit of $16,910,278.99 in 1908 and a deficit of $17,479,770.47 in 1909.

For the year 1911 Postmaster General Hitchcock—Republican—reported an apparent—not real—surplus of $219,118.12. This was a small saving compared with the surpluses of 1882 and 1883, when Postmaster General Gresham—Democrat—reported surpluses of $1,253,923.57 and $2,181,352.57, respectively. Since these surpluses, accomplished under a Democratic administration in the years 1882 and 1883, there has been a deficit every year since 1865 until the advent of the Democratic administration of Woodrow Wilson and Postmaster General Burleson, when the several large surpluses hereinbefore specified have been brought about, and at the same time when the Postal Service of the United States is recognized perhaps as the finest of any country in the world.

ONE REASON FOR BURLESON'S UNPOPULARITY—POSTAGE RATES ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The estimated loss to the Government in the difference between the revenue and the cost for transportation for carrying second-class matter was, in round numbers, $77,000,000 in 1913, $79,000,000 in 1914, $81,000,000 in 1915, and $88,000,000 in 1916, which large sums of money represented a virtual subsidy to publishers. Under the law advocated by Mr. Burleson which became effective July 1, 1918, known as the postal-zone law, the rate of postage on second-class matter was increased, thereby reducing to a considerable extent the tremendous loss of revenue which had been sustained by the Government, to the benefit of rich publishers, so many years through the handling of this heavy mail matter. If publishers were required to pay the whole cost of handling their publications through the mail, it would easily permit us to adopt a 1-cent basis for letter postage.

REAPPOINTED REPUBLICAN POSTMASTER.

It so happens that in my old home town of Albany, Tex., four years ago Postmaster General Burleson reappointed as postmaster Frank K. Sterrett, a lifelong Republican, who within the last 60 days has been reappointed the second time.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Neither the Postmaster General nor what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], in his revised speech, has termed the Post Office Department "system" intrudes upon nor seeks to destroy the freedom of action of the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission for its own convenience and to facilitate the determination of efficiency selects from branches of the Government service for which examinations are to be held one examiner from that branch of the service having special knowledge of the requirements of the service. This selection is by the Civil Service Commission and is entirely a matter of their system of efficiency and is their usual custom and rule. From a full explanation of the matter, which following my remarks I would like to insert in the RECORD as "Exhibit B," I quote the following:

The post-office inspector is an examiner designated by the Civil Service Commission, and in that capacity he acts solely under the commission's direction and control. He does not take part in any way in marking. The inspector makes no report to the Post Office Department. The only report made is a joint report by the representative of the commission and the inspector to the commission. This report is a mere report of facts and contains no recommendations.

The marking is made by the commission at Washington, just as is done in other nonassembled examinations, and is based upon the facts set forth by the applicants in statements of their careers, and the supplemental report of facts set forth in the report by the representative of the commission and the inspector.

There are nearly 3,000 of these boards of examiners required by law, composed of persons already in the service of the United States.

PAY OF RURAL CARRIERS.

Postmaster General Burleson did not ignore or disregard a law with reference to an increase of rural carriers' pay from $1,100 to $1,200. On the contrary he has always insisted that Government employees should be justly compensated and the Government should be a model employer. This applies to rural carriers as it does to all other postal employees. The act of March 9, 1914, provided "that on and after July 1, 1914, letter carriers of Rural Delivery Service shall receive a salary not to exceed $1,200 per annum." The Post Office Department made an adjustment of salaries under this law on the basis of service rendered, which included no reductions in compensation and which made increases based on service rendered as measured by distance of the route, the number of pieces of mail handled, and the number of pounds of matter carried. The increases on this basis, which is believed to be a fair and equitable basis of pay, ranged from $100 to $452, as measured by service. Following my remarks I would like to insert in the RECORD as "Exhibit C" an illustration of how this worked out.

While the Postmaster General felt that arbitrary horizontal increases of pay to rural carriers based on mileage alone, without taking into account the nature and amount of service rendered by such rural carriers, was not equitable or fair to the Government, he did not oppose temporary war-time increases.

PAY OF COLLECTORS—CITY DELIVERY SERVICE.

The Post Office Department at no time reduced letter carriers from $1,200 to $1,000 for the reason that they were performing collection service only. Letter carriers were reduced from $1,200 to $1,100 on account of their inability to perform a reasonable day's work as delivery carriers. In nearly every case in which reduction was made the carrier voluntarily consented to this reduction. In nearly all cases of reduction, it was a question of either reducing and paying a salary commensurate to the work performed or removing the carrier from the service on account of inefficiency. Following my remarks I would like to insert into the RECORD as Exhibits "D," "E," and "F" documents verifying the above.

SPECIAL DELIVERY MESSENGERS.

Special delivery messengers receive 8 cents for each piece of mail so delivered. Experiments were made at several post offices to determine whether or not better service could be given and at the same time easier and better working conditions obtained for the messengers by placing them on a per diem basis rather than on a piece basis, but this did not work out satisfactorily. A few days after hearing the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] assert "that the Postmaster General could not endure seeing a boy earn the whole 8 cents, hence took from the boys delivering special delivery letters the 8 cents and put them on a miserly salary," a messenger came in my office to deliver a letter, and upon request, he gave me the following statement of facts as they exist, to wit:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 17, 1918.

I, Harry Perskin, state that I am 16 years of age, and reside at 508 Virginia Avenue SE., Washington, D. C., where I have lived during the past three years, having lived in Washington practically all of my life. I am employed by the Post Office Department to deliver special delivery letters in Washington, D. C. During the whole time I have been so employed I have received as remuneration 8 cents for each and every letter I deliver. I work eight hours a day, and am allowed to work overtime if I want to do so to earn extra compensation, but that is left optional with me. I make on an average of $5 per day. I have always been treated courteously by department officials, and am perfectly satisfied with my job.

HARRY PERSKIN.

SUBSTITUTE CARRIERS' PAY.

The law in effect prior to July 1, 1918, fixed the compensation of substitute carriers at 35 cents and 40 cents per hour. The 35-cent rate was paid to carriers performing auxiliary service—that is, service in addition to that performed by regular carriers. The 40-cent rate was paid for substitute service where the carrier for whom substitution was made was absent without pay. The department at no time during the years that law was in effect paid a rate less than 35 and 40 cents an hour for the respective service. Therefore, any statement that the pay of substitute carriers was cut down from 30 cents to 27½ cents per hour is incorrect and without foundation in fact.

WORKING CONDITIONS FOR EMPLOYEES.

No special privileges for enjoying and making agreeable the work of employees were taken from them, nor has there been any browbeating, chaining, or cowing of employees. Any statement that the department has permitted or condoned such practices is without foundation.

MILITARY LEAVE.

No record was kept of the number of employees who resigned in 1916 to do service in the National Guard on the Mexican border, but all who did so were reinstated upon request after their return. These men were dropped from the rolls temporarily in order that the department might be able to appoint some person to take their places during their absence, thereby preventing the Postal Service from suffering due to the lack of men.

No person has suffered any injustice or unfair treatment by reason of the action taken in this matter. It is not only the desire but the firm purpose of the department to recognize in the most substantial and practical way possible the loyalty and unselfishness of everyone of its employees who offered his services to his country in active military duty as some of those men did on the Mexican border, and as other of our brave sons are doing at the front in France.

LEAVE FOR EMPLOYEES.

The department has no record of refusing to grant a letter carrier leave of absence to attend his father's funeral, and the statement to that effect is unwarranted. The order of the Postmaster General mentioned in No. 13, while denying absence without pay to employees, the practice of the department has been to grant such leave in exceptionally meritorious cases, such as sickness or death in the immediate family. This practice has been followed by the department in every instance, and the department's records show many cases where leave has been granted not only to allow employees to attend a relative's funeral but in instances where it was necessary for a carrier to take his wife or relative to a sanatorium or to a State remote. The department is following this practice at the present time.

TREATMENT OF EMPLOYEES.

Postmasters have never been influenced to mistreat their employees. On the contrary, as stated in No. 15, every possible effort has been made, and will continue to be made by the department, to accord to the employees the fairest and most considerate treatment that is possible. Any statement to the contrary is unwarranted.

POSTAL ORGANIZATIONS.

The department has never at any time opposed organizations of postal employees where their aims have been unselfish and for the improvement and betterment of the Postal Service, but in a few instances where certain organizations, and especially their leaders, misguided, or actuated by selfish motives, have sought to interfere with the proper discipline and administration in the Government service, the department has expressed its disapproval of their conduct. "They should," the Postmaster General has said, "be permitted to form organizations for their social and moral welfare, appear before committees in Congress, when requested, and give any information concerning the Postal Service of which they may have knowledge." Following my remarks, I would like to insert in the RECORD as "Exhibit G" such recommendations on pages 31 to 35 of the Annual Report of the Postmaster General for 1917. In a few minutes I hope to revert to this subject and show that the Postmaster General's prophecy was well founded.

LEAVE CASE OF E. J. GAINOR.

No discrimination was made against Mr. E. J. Gainor in refusing him leave of absence. His case came within the general order previously issued which was essential to the efficiency of the Postal Service and which order, in fairness and justice, had to be applied alike without fear or favoritism to all employees. The order of the Postmaster General dated April 6, 1917, reads:

Owing to the many unusual duties which of necessity will be imposed on the Postal Service because of the existence of a state of war with Germany, it is imperative that the department utilize to the fullest extent the services of its experienced employees. It has heretofore been the practice not only to grant employees leave of absence with pay, as authorized by law, but leave of absence without pay when the service would not be seriously impaired. However, owing to the emergency which now confronts us it becomes necessary to cancel all leaves of absence except those granted to employees with pay, those to employees on military duty, and those to employees absent on account of sickness. All other employees on leave without pay are hereby directed to report to their respective posts of duty immediately.

Hereafter leaves of absence will not be granted except for the purposes mentioned above, and all regulations in conflict with this order are hereby rescinded until further notice.

BETTER WORKING CONDITIONS AND SALARIES.

As a matter of fact, postal employees get just whatever salaries Congress provides for them, and the Post Office Department is compelled, under the law, to pay the salaries appropriated by Congress.

In this connection it is proper to emphasize the fact that postal employees are receiving much larger salaries and are enjoying much better working conditions than was ever true under any Republican administration. In addition to the regular and automatic increases in salaries that have come to employees in the Government service under the Democratic administration, Congress has generously appropriated money for horizontal increases. Many instances could be cited where the Democratic administration has provided material benefits for Government employees, among which may be mentioned the employees' compensation act. This does not take into account the very general policy throughout every branch of the service, including the Post Office Department, to improve and make easier the conditions under which the employees work; looking to cleaner and better sanitary conditions, the safeguarding of their health, the protection of their lives, and to making their hours of work easier, more equitable, and just. Never in the history of the department has there been such generous and sympathetic consideration of the employees in the Postal Service as has been brought about under the administration of Woodrow Wilson and Postmaster General Burleson.

HOURS OF WORK, SALARIES, ETC.

The employees of the Postal Service divided into groups, showing the number in each group and the salaries and the number of hours they work, are as follows:

CITY LETTER CARRIERS AND POST-OFFICE CLERKS.

City letter carriers and collectors. Not subdivided: 34,543.

[NOTE.—All salaries of post-office employees, during the fiscal year, of $2,200 and less are increased $200, and above that 5 per cent.]

Post-office clerks and supervisory officers.

New grades:	Number of employees.
$1,000	8,112
$1,100	2,398
$1,200	2,310
$1,300	5,203
$1,400	16,474
$1,500	5,180
$1,600	1,692
$1,700	876
$1,800	287
$1,900	176
$2,000	156
$2,200	173
$2,400	33
$2,400	55
$2,500	33
$2,600	27
$2,700	21
$3,000	14
$3,200	10

In regard to the hours worked by city carriers, postmasters in all cases have been directed to schedule these employees on an 8 in 10 hour schedule. That schedule applies to delivery carriers, collectors, and clerks. In some instances postmasters have exercised their right under the law and with the sanction of this bureau to work clerks and carriers overtime in cases of emergency. That law did not permit, however, to schedule these employees for a day in excess of 8 in 10 hours, and where it is necessary to work a carrier a greater number of hours, the employee is paid for such overtime at a rate proportioned to his salary.

Emergencies have always arisen wherein it was necessary to employ carriers and clerks more than eight hours a day, and such emergencies will continue so long as the service continues. In most cases clerks and carriers have asked for the privilege of making overtime, but unless it can be shown that this overtime is absolutely necessary and can not be performed by substitutes the requests have been denied.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Grade 3, $1,300	96
Grade 2, $1,200	34
Grade 1, $1,100	1,907
Laborers ($780, plus 20 per cent), $936	109
Joint employees, $300 or less	15

HOURS OF DUTY.

The terminal railway post offices and transfer offices in railroad stations are organized on the basis of eight hours a day six days a week.

The railway post-office trains are classified into three classes with reference to the work performed, responsibility, and so forth, viz, class 1, light; class 2, medium; class 3, heavy. In many cases, owing to the varying conditions of train service the needs of the service require that clerks on the trains shall work more than eight hours on the days when they are on duty, and they are therefore given compensatory time off duty. In organizing the clerical force in the railway post-office trains the department endeavors to approximate a daily average of hours of work on the basis of figures six days a week of seven and one-half hours for class A, light; seven hours for class B, medium; six and one-half hours for class C, heavy.

RURAL DELIVERY AND STAR ROUTE SERVICE.

There were 43,335 rural carriers in the service on July 1, 1918, receiving the following salaries:

It is impossible to determine exactly the time each one of these carriers is employed, as a schedule is fixed for each route varying from 3 to 9 hours.

On the same date there were 10,910 star-route contractors being paid in accordance with contracts and schedule fixed for each route.

THE GENTLEMAN FROM MINNESOTA NOT WITH THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

On June 29, 1918, the President of the United States vetoed the Post Office bill because it contained the retention of the pneumatic-tube system, stating in his veto message:

I am convinced that there is no moral or legal obligation resting on the Government to continue the use of these tubes by rental. * * * There are many reasons why the present pneumatic-tube systems are not efficient devices for the transmission of mail. Among these reasons is their limited capacity, which makes it impossible to use them to meet conditions of emergency. Furthermore, experience has demonstrated that the tubes are unreliable, because of breakdowns and stoppages. During such breakdowns they cease operation for hours, and even for days together, and it is often necessary to dig up the streets to obtain the mail clogged in the tubes. When these breakdowns occur it is necessary immediately to substitute vehicular service, which results in a confusion of schedules and disorganization of the transportation and delivery service and the delay in the forwarding of large numbers of letters. Not only are letters delayed in this way but because of defects in tubes, carelessness on the part of the operators, and accidents of various sorts the tubes soil or damage many thousand letters and in some instances destroy them.

Against the big lobby maintained and pneumatic-tube propaganda circulated here the Postmaster General had dared to recommend the discontinuance of tubes, which immediately made him unpopular with all parties interested in same. On final vote the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], together with many other prominent Republicans, voted to override the President's veto and to continue to expend millions of dollars of the people's money for these inefficient and expensive tubes. Thus in this instance we find the gentleman lined up against the President.

Again, when the President vetoed the Agricultural appropriation bill, because in same the price of wheat had been increased above the sum the President had fixed, on July 13, 1918, we find the gentleman from Minnesota, together with other prominent Republicans, lining up against the President and voting to override him by passing the wheat raise over his veto.

Again, when the President sent his message to Congress on July 1, 1918, stating that he had felt constrained to veto the legislative appropriation bill because it increased the hours of work for Government employees from seven to eight hours, we find the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who has expressed so much apprehension about this administration not giving the laboring man a square deal, lining up against the President and against organized labor by voting to override the President and to pass the increase of hours' provision over the President's veto. Yet he condemns Mr. Burleson simply because he recommended a policy that would prevent Government employees from striking against the Government. When Congress passed this Borland amendment, requiring the 240,000 Government employees to work eight instead of seven hours, Mr. Gompers and other labor leaders demanded its repeal, and demand was made upon the President to veto the provision, and through the press the employees in war time threatened to walk out and resign their jobs, leaving their Government helpless, just what Mr. Burleson had prophesied against. Though he himself was lined up against organized labor when the crucial test vote came on this proposition, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] found the Democratic President of the United States standing firmly behind the laboring man.

In the Federal Employee, the official magazine of the National Federation of Federal Employees, for June, 1918, the vote cast by each Congressman on the Borland amendment, requiring the 240,000 Government employees to work eight instead of only seven hours per day, is given, with the following comment:

If a Congressman's votes and policies have been against the interests of employees this fact should be made known throughout his district, and if he has shown an attitude offensive toward organized labor every voter in his district should know it.

And this red-flag admonition to all organized labor voters was sent broadcast into the districts of the various Congressmen who had dared to vote to require employees to work eight hours a day during war times.

Again, from the September issue of the Federal Employee I quote:

THE DEFEAT OF REPRESENTATIVE BORLAND, AS TOLD BY ONE OF OUR BRETHREN WHO WAS IN THE FRAY—A REMARKBLE DEMONSTRATION OF THE VALUE OF UNION SOLIDARITY AND AFFILIATION.

[By Gilbert E. Hyatt, president of National Federation of Postal Employees.]

Those ultraconservative members of the civil service who have not realized the value of organization, particularly in its inevitable and most beneficial aspect, that of affiliation with the other great organized agencies under the banner of the American Federation of Labor, have been given a demonstration so plain that he who runs may read of what these things mean and of the real spirit of unionism.

No Federal employee is ignorant of the constant persecution of his brothers in the District of Columbia under the guise of establishing what Mr. BORLAND was pleased to name an eight-hour day. The single-minded persistence of the advocate of this measure, culminating in the veto by President Wilson of the appropriation bill carrying the amendment in question, is too well known in all details to need repetition, but the story of BORLAND'S rebuke and defeat by organized labor simply on this ground is a lesson that every member of the civil service should ponder on, for in it is contained the secret of any future defense that they will make and of any future gains for their cause. * * *

An appeal was made to organized labor and every legislative agent in Washington responded. President Gompers sent a scathing telegram to the Central Labor Union of Kansas City (BORLAND'S home), and the legislative agents of the railroad brotherhoods went on record in the plainest language. The writer of this article had the honor, as a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of bearing their personal message to the railroad men of Kansas City. As a result the Kansas City central body passed a resolution without a dissenting word or vote at a crowded meeting condemning BORLAND and instructing their legislative committee to organize the campaign for his defeat. A joint committee of railroad men was formed to do a like service for their members, and the outcome was the overwhelming defeat now passed into history. * * *

It should be fully appreciated by the civil-service employees that these men had not one iota of personal interest in the point at issue, and that they had no personal contact with the class of workers attacked. * * * Mr. BORLAND had done many favors of a personal nature for members of organized labor in his district, and many of the men who worked for his defeat expressed friendship for him, but factional alignments, craft divisions, and personal friendships were thrown aside to fight for a basic standard of their doctrine.

I quote the concluding paragraph of the said telegram sent by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, also published in this magazine, which is as follows:

Let the inspiring word go forth, "We stand by our friends," and administer a stinging rebuke to men of any party who are either indifferent or hostile.

What was Congressman BORLAND'S crime committed for which his office was taken away from him as a punishment? He merely asked that Government employees in war times work eight instead of seven hours per day. He conscientiously believed that when we required our soldier boys to work sometimes 24 hours out of the 24, sometimes in trenches drenched and knee deep in mud, on $33 per month, who, if he momentarily slept from exhaustion or should demand a single dollar more pay, would be stood up against a wall and shot in eternal dishonor, that it was not unreasonable to demand of Government employees, many of whom were filling the jobs vacated by these soldier boys, and who were working under pleasant surroundings and safe environments, that in war times especially they should work eight instead of seven hours. By a roll-call vote the House of Representatives twice went on record supporting Mr. BORLAND in his contention.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is discussing a matter wholly irrelevant to the subject for which he got permission to address the House. He is talking about the defeat of one of his Democratic colleagues from the great State of Missouri, and is not discussing the attack made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] upon the Post Office Department and the Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. Has what the gentleman is saying anything to do with the Postmaster General?

Mr. BLANTON. In this way, that the gentleman who wrote this article is the president of the National Federation of Postal Employees, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] stated in his denunciation of the Postmaster General that the Postmaster General was the enemy of all such organizations, and I am showing that the gentleman from Minnesota himself voted this very same vote against these postal employees which was denounced by the president of this organization.

The SPEAKER. I know; but what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] quoted had nothing to do with the subject matter——

Mr. BLANTON. But it has this connection, Mr. Speaker: The gentleman from Minnesota stated that the Postmaster General was an enemy to all organizations of labor for several reasons, and mentioned them. One of those reasons——

The SPEAKER. But what has Mr. BORLAND'S defeat to do with the Postmaster General or with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]?

Mr. BLANTON. One of the reasons given by the Postmaster General in his annual report—I do not presume this is being taken out of my time, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. BLANTON. One of the reasons intimated by the Postmaster General in his annual report, and as condemned by the gentleman from Minnesota, why a postal clerk should not be permitted to join labor unions or federated unions in any way, was that they would attack Members of Congress for their vote on the floor of the House; that they were engaged in political activities here and in the districts of the Congressmen; that they would attempt to defeat Members of Congress and Senators who were against their demands.

The SPEAKER. Granting all that, what has the race that Mr. BORLAND made, ending in his defeat, to do with the Postmaster General?

Mr. BLANTON. It shows that the Postmaster General was correct, because the president of the Federation of Postal Employees states that he went into the district of Mr. BORLAND himself; that he gloated over the fact that not only he did it, but the president of the American Federation of Labor sent a denunciatory telegram into that district that caused the defeat of the Member of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is getting farther into the forest, Mr. Speaker; and I submit that the gentleman ought not, when he gets permission to address the House and reply to the attack made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], to then take opportunity to gloat or to comment upon the felicitory articles and telegrams upon the defeat of one of his Democratic colleagues.

Mr. BLANTON. I approve of the action of Mr. BORLAND. I am not gloating over his defeat. I do not think he should have been defeated on that ground.

The SPEAKER. I know; but what happened to Mr. BORLAND or did not happen to him had nothing to do with the controversy that was precipitated by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] touching the Postmaster General.

Mr. BLANTON. The point I was trying to make, Mr. Speaker, was that the prediction and prophecy of the Postmaster General came true, in that the heads of these organizations did violate the law concerning political activity by civil-service employees and did go into congressional districts.

The SPEAKER. I know; but that leads up to an entirely different subject, and one that has no limits to it.

Mr. BLANTON. That was a subject matter that was discussed on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]—the action of the Postmaster General, specifically—and it was claimed in his speech that he was an enemy to organized labor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the campaign in the Jackson County district in Missouri has anything to do on earth with this controversy.

Mr. BLANTON. I was through with that subject, anyway.

The SPEAKER. Well, leave that out and proceed.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Speaker hold that as far as I have gone is——

The SPEAKER. Whatever you read goes into the RECORD, unless somebody moves to strike it out to-morrow.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike it out in so far as the gentleman's remarks pertain to my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The SPEAKER. The very thing he is doing is answering the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. That is what he got permission for.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], with other leading Members on the Republican side, supported this amendment. Coupled with it in the same bill was a provision granting an increase in salary of $120 to each and every one of the 240,000 Government employees, and of course organized labor made no objection to the increase in salary, and it remained in the bill. Yet, notwithstanding that the law prohibits civil-service employees from engaging in political activity, we find Mr. Hyatt, the president of the National Federation of Postal Employees, in the official magazine of the National Federation of Federal Employees, gloating over his successful political campaign.

Has it been this warning given Congressmen by organized labor which has so suddenly caused the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to repent of having voted against organized labor, even to the extent of attempting to override the President's veto, and to attempt to make proper atonement to their wrath by heaping infamy upon the Postmaster General of the United States? Are they after the gentleman in his Minnesota district? If they are, this appeal for an armistice will not avail him; he will have to make an unconditional surrender to organized labor.

Was the Postmaster General's warning against political and legislative activity untimely?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BLANTON. When I get through I will, gladly. I have had a hard time getting this time.

Since war was declared on April 6, 1917, there have been 2,700 strikes in the United States by organized labor.

THE MAIN REASON OF HIS UNPOPULARITY.

On April 1, 1917, the President's order taking postmasters out of politics and placing them upon the merit system, giving to the applicant making the highest grade on competitive civil-service examination the appointment, was put into effect, which was a recommendation made by the Postmaster General. This order has taken our political patronage away from us, and some of us feel chagrined. While such a merit plan was a plank in my platform, still it is a little inconvenient when made an ironclad rule. Since coming here I have asked of the Postmaster General only two favors, both of which were denied. I requested that my particular friend, Mr. W. E. Olive, be appointed postmaster at Slaton, and that my particular friend, Mr. W. B. Martin, be appointed postmaster at Fort Stockton. Both requests were turned down, because the Postmaster General said he must adhere to the rule of giving the appointment to the first eligible certified to by the civil service. [Applause.]

During this war I am for the Postmaster General and every other United States official in whom our President has sufficient confidence to retain in his war Cabinet, whether he does exactly like I want him to do or not, and I am going to try to be patriotic enough myself, and to ask my constituents to be patriotic enough, patiently and uncomplainingly to stand delays and to bear inconveniences, and not to find fault, until we have everlastingly whipped the very "stuffin" out of Germany and her allied military autocracies. [Applause.]

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13086.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the deficiency bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13086, the war deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for an hour.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill is a war bill. It is presented to the House in order that the Government of the United States may continue to prosecute with the utmost vigor and dispatch the present war in which it is now engaged. In its consideration the committee has taken no thought of recent events, important and momentous though they be. We have prepared the bill with the idea of furnishing the Government the funds for the continuous prosecution of this war with its utmost vigor, and while I shall undertake to explain to the committee cuts that have been made that are large in magnitude, I desire to emphasize the fact that there has not been a denial of moneys anywhere that it was believed were necessary for the prosecution of the war. The committee will be prepared to present reasons justifying every cut that has been made in connection with the estimates that have been submitted to the House. If we have erred at all, we have erred on the side of safety of appropriation, because where there has been a question as to the advisability of voting moneys we have voted them rather than in any way interfere with the continued prosecution of the war.

The estimates that were submitted to the committee total $8,886,131,651.49. The amounts recommended in the bill total $6,345,755,666.04, or a total reduction in estimates of $2,540,375,985.45. These reductions are distributed as follows:

In the Military Establishment and War Department, $2,447,826,894.86.

In the Naval Establishment and Navy Department, $17,846,823.

In the civil services, including $64,000,000 for payment of military and naval family allowances, $74,702,267.50.

Before undertaking to explain just the nature of these various reductions, it may be well to give to the House a brief summary as to the basis that was used by the departments in submitting these estimates. As the committee is aware, estimates were submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs and to the Committee on Appropriations, looking to the supplying of three armies, roughly spoken of as armies of a million men each; more accurately, perhaps, armies of 1,200,000 men each. The present deficiency estimates were to provide for a fourth army, and contemplate in the service of the United States a total force of 4,850,000 men by June 30, 1919.

It is the present known program of the War Department to have in France by July 1 of next year 80 divisions, and to have in the United States 18 divisions, and there will be called also from time to time such additional men as may be necessary to maintain at their full strength those 80 divisions abroad and the 18 divisions at home, and the estimates are predicated upon that general program.

In order properly to consider these estimates it was necessary to review in large measure some of the appropriations made by the Congress heretofore for the fiscal year 1919, because many of those appropriations were granted after a very brief—necessarily brief—hearing touching the estimates that were submitted. As I shall have occasion later to call attention to a number of overestimates and overappropriations carried in the Army act for 1919, I desire to say now that in making reference to those cases I do not mean in any way to reflect upon the judgment or the industry with which the Committee on Military Affairs performed its work in making the appropriations for the Army. I have had too much experience with the difficulty of the task involved in connection with estimates to be prone to criticize any other committee, and the House will recall that just about the time the Committee on Military Affairs were prepared to report the Army bill there came to them new estimates for the very greatly enlarged program of the War Department, and it was therefore necessary for that committee, within a very few days, to report a bill very much in excess of the detailed estimates that had been presented in the first instance and considered by it; and as a result of that, of necessity they had to accept at their face value many estimates that were submitted and that upon more time for examination it has been determined were in excess of the requirements of the Army.

The quartermaster's estimates as submitted totaled $2,825,000,000. There has been a reduction made in the quartermaster's estimates of $1,189,674,774. That reduction is so very large that I feel that the House is entitled to know the reasons why it was made.

Under the head of "Pay of the Army and Commutation of Quarters" there was a reduction of $18,879,446.80, part of which was made voluntarily by the Quartermaster Department and part as a result of the hearings. Under the law the department has the right to incur deficiencies to any extent necessary to meet the pay of the Army in accordance with its authorized strength and rates of pay. That also applies to subsistence, clothing, and transportation for the Army. The estimates which they submitted for pay of the Army, in connection with what they had heretofore received, have now been revised, with a reduction of nearly $19,000,000. That reduction results from the following facts: One million five hundred thousand dollars of it is represented by the discontinuance after December 31, 1918, of all extra pay for qualification in marksmanship; $12,890,760 is a reduction in the item for the pay of nurses, due to the fact that they will not have in the schools for the training of nurses during the entire year the total number that they estimated would be there and for which they computed the pay. Provision was made in the estimates as submitted for one year's pay for 43,000 nurses, the maximum number required, instead of making it for the average number throughout the year. The House will readily understand—and it is worth bearing in mind, because it has a marked relationship to other items that I will speak of later—that in estimating maintenance—whether in pay or in subsistence or in other things—in order to be accurate a weighted average of the number of people that are to be in the service for the time for which you are providing should be taken, rather than the maximum that may be in the service at any one time in the year. Take, for instance, the case which is at hand. Forty-three thousand nurses might be in the service at the end of July, but manifestly it does not follow that you need to ask and receive pay for 43,000 nurses for 12 months, because at the beginning of July, 1918, the Nurses' Corps consisted of only 12,384, and it will only grow up to the maximum during the course of the year. So that a weighted average of the number of nurses that will probably be in the service has been estimated at 27,692, and it is that number of nurses for which you need to figure pay for 12 months rather than the 43,000 that will represent the maximum number that will be in the service. It results from this that there has been a reduction, as I have stated, of very nearly $13,000,000 in this item.

There were various other small miscellaneous items in connection with the pay of the Army that upon an agreement with the Quartermaster Corps resulted in bringing the total reduction up to the amount I have stated of $18,879,446.80.

Now, in subsistence of the Army there has been a cut of $108,107,935.50, and the explanation of that cut is found in the following facts: There is a reduction of $15,870,496.50 largely due to the fact that the Navy now has in its charge the vessels used in the transportation of the Army overseas. The estimate was predicated upon the assumption that the Army would have to subsist the masters, officers, crews, and other employees of transports. Inasmuch as that will be paid for out of the Navy funds, it ought to be and is subtracted from the estimates for subsistence of the Army. Then it was estimated by Gen. Lord that $91,987,439 would not be drawn from the Treasury during the fiscal year 1919; and inasmuch as this bill is, touching the Quartermaster's estimates, predicated upon furnishing only the moneys that are necessary to meet bills payable during the fiscal year, that agreed reduction could be had.

In addition to that there is a small cut of $250,000 made from an estimate of $500,000 submitted for the purpose of using the available land at camps and cantonments for the raising of forage and other crops. There is considerable land that the Government now leases or owns in connection with the various camps and cantonments that it is believed can be used in the production of hay and other crops to the great benefit of the country. The labor for this will come, in a large measure, from conscientious objectors who are in the service and can be put at such work, from German prisoners that may be here, from men in the service who have violated some military order or rule and are subject to punishment for a brief period of time, and from men who are at various camps pending the period when it is determined whether they will or will not be made into soldiers and used as men in the service, who can be employed in such work.

The committee felt, however, as this was more or less a matter that could be abused, that instead of voting $500,000 for that purpose we would vote $250,000. We carry a provision in the bill suspending during the fiscal year the law passed by Congress July 16, 1892, prohibiting gardens at Army posts. In years past abuses grew up in connection with gardens that were at posts, and largely in connection with officers' quarters. Congress saw fit to prohibit such gardens. In view of the changed situation and that we now have acres of land running up into the hundreds of thousands that can be cultivated, it was felt that we could afford to suspend the law for the present fiscal year and see what results will follow from the use of the land, some of which is of high character and capable of extensive cultivation.

In the item "Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps," the department asked for $69,914,105.34. The hearings have developed the fact that they not only do not need that $69,000,000, but that they have obtained from the Army act $108,376,182.81 more than then they need for regular supplies. We therefore eliminate from the estimates that $69,000,000, and we take as a credit the $108,000,000 and apply it to the item of clothing, that I will reach later.

That means that the estimates as they were submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, in connection with the estimates that were submitted to the Military Committee and the moneys voted, were in excess of the actual needs in regard to the regular supplies by $178,290,288.

It may be interesting to the House if I point out some of the items that go to make up this huge difference between what the Army estimated it needed and what it now admits it needs. In the matter of field ranges there was an overestimate of about $2,000,000. In the matter of repair of heating stoves, $945,000. In regard to matches, there was an estimate of $9,000,000. They got from the Army act $6,691,384. They now revise it to a need of $2,000,000. So that there is a total saving on that item of $7,000,000. Of that $7,000,000 a credit of $4,691,384 comes from the fund carried in the Army act. The estimate of $9,000,000 was based on four-fifths of a box for each man a day at three-quarters of a cent a box, which would have made 1,200,000,000 boxes of matches.

There is a revision in fuel that effects a saving of $33,008,000. In forage, they estimate a need of $214,806,648. They actually receive from the Army act $224,820,760. Their revised estimate on forage is $103,405,428. So there is thus obtained a credit on the estimates of $121,415,347.

This was brought about by this fact, which bears upon what I said a while ago touching the weighted averages: The estimate was predicated upon there being in the service some 1,200,000 animals, including horses, for the entire fiscal year. The testimony shows that, due to changes in connection with the number of animals required, the motorization of a good many vehicles formerly estimated to be horse drawn, and the added needs of conserving supplies aboard transports that there will be in the service 827,500 animals. That will be the peak, and the average number of such animals will be 626,000. So instead of providing forage for 1,200,000 animals for the year, what should be provided is forage for 626,000 animals for the year.

This same erroneous calculation runs not only through the matter of forage, but it runs through items of bedding, horseshoes, transportation of animals, purchase of animals, harness and its parts, and the care of the animals.

A rough calculation indicates that this erroneous basis of computation made $220,000,000 of excess with reference to animals, their subsistence, transportation, and so forth.

In bedding, the difference is shown in the fact that they estimated a need of $14,516,832, and their revised estimates show that they need $3,663,936. They obtained from the Army act $3,122,424. So that they have now need of a deficiency of $541,512, in place of $11,394,408 that they submitted.

In straw for soldiers' bedding they estimated a total requirement for the year of $13,511,998. Their revised estimates show that they now consider they need $7,431,589. They obtained from the Army act $9,139,600, so that instead of there being a deficiency of $4,382,389, there is an actual credit of $1,698,011.

In stationery they estimated they needed $16,687,878, and they obtained that sum from the Army act. They now estimate that they will need about $10,000,000 for stationery, so that there is a credit of $6,687,878.

In typewriters they obtained from the Army act $6,556,651, and they now say they need $1,280,694, so that there is a credit on typewriters of $5,275,957.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman care to be interrupted now or would he prefer to proceed until he is through?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to have the gentleman explain to the House why they make a difference of over $5,000,000 in typewriters in their estimates, if he knows and can give it briefly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that I can explain that particular item now, but most of these errors have come about through taking an arbitrary table of organization and figuring so many of various kinds of materials for a certain organization and then using a multiple and arriving at the total number, which, multiplied by the cost, reaches the total amount asked. Revision of those figures frequently shows the original basis was a basis that had no real facts to stand upon, and reorganizations and rearrangements of the Army result in changes. In these instances about the only answer I can give is that somebody made the estimate who did not have all the facts necessary to make an accurate estimate.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman speaks of revisions. Have those revisions been made by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SHERLEY. Some of them have and some of them have been done by the Quartermaster Department. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question, because it enables me to say two things that ought to be said in view of the facts that I am developing. One is that fortunately purchases are not being made on the basis of estimates made. In other words, purchases are bearing very much closer relationship to the actual requirements from week to week and month to month than the estimates do. Second, the Quartermaster Department now has at the head of the division of finance, appropriations, and of estimates Gen. Lord. Gen. Lord years ago was the clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House. He was clerk of that committee at the time, as I recall, that the Dingley bill was reported. He was commissioned an officer in the Army by President McKinley and has brought order out of a good deal of chaos in connection with the quartermaster estimates. It is due to his work and the organization that he has instituted that the committee was able to obtain the information that enabled the cuts to be made. Many of them he brought to the attention of the committee himself, saying that the estimates submitted would not stand analysis, and that upon examination he had determined that reductions ought to be made. Some of them were developed by bringing to the attention of himself and his associates changed factors in connection with the Army program that very largely affected the basis for calculation, and that only illustrates the proposition which I have urged a number of times upon this floor, that it is of the highest importance that there be one central agency in the War Department that shall have the supervision and preparation of all estimates for all branches of the War Department. At the table of the Committee on Appropriations only comes information touching every angle of the war program, and only there is brought together every angle of the war that enables men somewhat loosely of necessity to see the bearing that one particular estimate or activity of one department may have upon another and how a change in one regard affects very materially changes somewhere else. The illustration I used in regard to animals is a pertinent one. The change there came about for very good reasons. It came about because of the need to conserve tonnage space in transportation. It came about further by the fact that we were going to purchase certain animals abroad, and it came about further by the motorization of many vehicles that were formerly known as horse-drawn vehicles. Those things necessarily affect many, many items and I have mentioned a number here, such as bedding, forage, horseshoes, and things of that kind, and unless there is this broad survey and a constant daily matching up of changes in program in one particular to see how it affects another, there will inevitably follow an inaccurate estimate following such change. But I desire to emphasize again that the purchasing that is being done is not being done upon the basis of estimates submitted, but there is an effort to match the purchases with the weekly and monthly requirements that come from overseas, together with the program for the building up of reserves abroad.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman from Kentucky has given us very interesting information as to how some of these items came to be scaled down into practical figures for appropriations. I think his always characteristic modesty, however, has prevented his suggesting to the committee what some of us know, that a very large, a very serious, and a very important part of the scrutiny of this bill which has resulted in those savings for the Government was performed by the chairman of the committee, Mr. SHERLEY, personally, through long and wearisome labor and application. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As the gentleman has reviewed the items, it occurred to me that in nearly every item the cut that has been made in the estimate is from 50 to 75 per cent. I was impressed with the idea that a large estimate might be submitted to the committee, with the expectation that it would be reduced to a certain amount. I was wondering if that impression was in any way made upon the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. In regard to the War and the Navy Departments I think that is not true. Every now and then we find some small civil service which undertakes to pad an estimate upon the supposition that they are going to get a certain cut, and that thereby they will get what they want. After we find that happens once it rarely happens again in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There has been some pretty good cutting made in the estimates I should say.

Mr. SHERLEY. In regard to incidental expenses, Quartermaster Corps, there is a cut of $6,498,570.92. Some of that is represented by a reduction of $102,200 in postage. They admit that the estimate they made for postage and which they had obtained money for was probably excessive to the extent I have indicated. In regard to office furniture, they received from the Army act $2,883,978, and they estimate now they will need but a million dollars, so there is a credit of $1,883,978. In the recruiting service they received from the Army act $280,620, and their needs for the year as figured indicate $46,770, a saving of $233,850. In the apprehension of deserters they estimated the requirements for the year of $2,400,000. They received in the Army act $1,253,903, and they asked a deficiency of $1,146,000, which they now abandon as unnecessary, so there is a saving of that sum. In horseshoes the estimated requirement for the year was $8,129,425. They received in the Army act $4,736,790, and they asked for the difference between this amount as a deficiency of $3,292,635, which they now abandon, stating that the amount they received in the Army act would be sufficient.

In transportation of the Army there is a cut of $835,907,988, and that resulted from the following facts: First, they had an estimate for $53,430,000 for boats to be built as transports for the Army and as harbor craft of various kinds. We have voted nearly three billion dollars to the Emergency Fleet Corporation for the construction of a great many boats, both transport, cargo carriers, and various subsidiary craft. We appropriated that money in the past with the understood supposition that it was to take care of Army needs, but whether it be sufficient to take care of Army needs or not it represents a sum of money that practically uses the entire facilities of the country in shipbuilding. Now, if this additional money were to be now voted for construction it would either have to displace to that extent the program now under way by the Shipping Board for the construction of ships, or it would have to await the completion of the program or part of it before it can be spent, and inasmuch as the Shipping Board advises us that they are using the facilities of the country in their program and are building these ships and turning them over for the use of the Army and Navy as fast as it is possible to provide them, we felt there was no necessity for voting $53,430,000 for a shipbuilding program for the Army Transport Service in order that they might have as a part of their service, with the title in the Army Transport Service, that number of ships. When this war is over we will have one of the great merchant marines of the world, and we will have been using during the prosecution of the war these various ships for the very purposes for which this money was asked. For that reason the committee felt that it would be unjustified in undertaking to vote that amount of money.

Now, in connection with charter hire this situation exists. The Emergency Fleet Corporation charters boats from many sources. It has chartered all of the vessels, sea-going vessels, which were obtainable. Some of them, as the House is aware, have come from our ally, the British Government. Some have been boats owned by citizens of Holland; some have been boats owned by citizens of other countries, and some of them have been boats owned by citizens of America. Some of them are the boats that we took and now own which were interned vessels originally belonging to Germany and Austria. Some are boats we have constructed. As to the vessels we do not own the Emergency Fleet Corporation pays the charter hire necessary for their use. They are then put to the use of the Army, and the Army is charged by the Shipping Board with the charter hire that they have to pay out plus the necessary cost of administration which the Army pays for out of funds appropriated under the item of transportation for the Army. But, in making their estimate for transportation of the Army, they estimate not only for the charter hire of such boats but they estimate for the charter hire of the boats that the Government already owns on the basis of paying to the United States Shipping Corporation for those vessels.

The United States Shipping Board was anxious that that might be done as well as the Army, in order that they might keep their fund as big as their original appropriation and not have it reduced by virtue of the use of these ships, but it occurred to the committee that there was no reason why the Government of the United States should be appropriating moneys to one department to be paid to another department, and there were a great many reasons why it should not, as these things, while they make no difference in actual expenditure, make it very great in the total of appropriations and of moneys that are spent by different departments and makes considerable additional to be paid in connection with bookkeeping and adjustment of accounts. We also believed that inasmuch as the Shipping Board furnished these chartered ships that they had to pay money for that they were in a better position to estimate just what the charter hire for the next fiscal year would amount to than the Army, and we therefore asked them to get in consultation with the Army Transport Service and estimate exactly how much money was necessary for charter hire for vessels, excluding any money for Government-owned ships. They accordingly did so, and as a result of that they revised the estimate from $342,432,000 to $153,174,840, or a reduction of $189,257,160. Similarly, we asked the Shipping Board to figure on the Army estimate for maintenance of the vessels that they would use in the transportation of troops and supplies. The result of revising these figures for maintenance and operation of ships which the Government owns is to reduce the estimate from $400,890,400 to $357,588,000, or a reduction of $43,302,400.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman concluded as to the Shipping Board? I wanted to inquire about section K, on page 4, before the gentleman leaves that subject. That subparagraph, which in giving the additional power to the Shipping Board——

Mr. SHERLEY. I will be glad to discuss that later, but it bears no relationship to this. The items I am speaking of now are not Shipping Board items at all. They are items for the transportation of the Army—for moneys paid to the Shipping Board for expenditures made by it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I only called it up because I thought the gentleman was leaving the subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, in addition to what I have enumerated, there were some cuts made in transportation of signal stores. They received out of the Army act $12,800,400 for the transportation of signal stores. They estimate now for only $9,000,000, which makes a saving of $3,800,400. In Engineering stores, similarly, they reduce the money for that by $849,500. In packing and crating supplies of packages there is a saving on the revision of estimates of $858,000. The estimate was $1,980,000, and the amount received in the former act was $1,122,000, which is now estimated to be sufficient. So there are a number of smaller items in connection with this. For travel allowance to enlisted men on discharge they estimated and received in the Army act $9,000,000. They say they now need only $3,000,000, which makes a saving of $6,000,000. I have already alluded to the fact that in regard to the transportation of animals, due to an estimate upon the number of animals that will not be the property of the Government, and that makes a saving of $11,400,000. For miscellaneous Quartermaster stores they estimated for the year, $180,040,000. They now estimate $115,787,417, which makes the need of a deficiency of $79,807,417 as against a submitted estimate of deficiency of $144,060,000, or a saving of $64,252,583.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Do the estimates the committee considered include the increased use of cavalry in France?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and as a result of that the estimates in regard to horses, as originally made, on an examination of the program are found to be $5,948,742 short, and so we increased it by that amount. The estimate on pack animals was about $46,000,000 too big, so that there is a net saving of $40,000,000 on animals of all kinds.

For the purchase of harness and parts of harness the needs for the entire year were stated as $42,859,796. There was given in the Army act $33,084,770, and a deficiency was requested therefor of $9,775,026. The revised estimate for the year is $18,709,057. This results in an abandonment of the deficiency of $9,775,026 and a saving on the amount heretofore appropriated of $14,375,713, or a total of $24,150,739.

For supplies for the care of animals the requirements for the year were fixed at $15,105,406 and that sum was granted in the Army act. The recent revision reduces that need to $5,035,150 and a consequent reduction in the amount previously given of $10,070,256.

Now, in the estimates for the purchase of motor trucks there is a reduction of $381,597,504, and that is due to the fact that the Quartermaster submitted an estimate for motor trucks for the Engineer Corps, the Signal Corps, the Medical Department, and the Division of Military Aeronautics, and each of these corps had also submitted their estimates. The result was that there was a duplication, which the Quartermaster's Department called to the attention of the committee, and it resulted in the reduction that I have noted.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I understood when abroad that we had something like 60,000 motor trucks over there. Is the gentleman at liberty to state if that number is anywhere near the correct one?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will give in a moment the number of trucks we have provided and have over there. And in that connection I want to say this to the House: It was physically impossible to go into the question of production, except to a limited degree, and I have available here tables touching the Quartermaster's Department as to most of the things they have on hand or, at least, that they have received money for, and which, from a legislative standpoint, presumably exist or the money to get them is available. But the committee did not undertake to go into all the details of production. It would have been physically impossible to have done it, and to have gotten information of value short of two or three months of additional work, and the need of reporting this bill preventing our doing more than undertaking to dig into the financial phase of it, except as incidentally there came out matters touching production. And the hearings will throw a good deal of light on that. I want to say this in connection with the estimates not only for motors but the estimates for motorcycles and bicycles: They are very large, not so large in money, though the money is considerable, but large in numbers. They are so large in numbers that figuring the motorcycles that they have as an initial issue, and for maintenance, and the bicycles, and so forth, it would seem as if 1 man in every 40 could be either mounted on a motorcycle or in a side car in the entire Army of the United States. And if you include bicycles the number would be considerably less than that. I have stated it very liberally.

The American Army will have overseas, counting those overseas as of July 1, those in factories, depots, and ports, and ordered with 1918 appropriations, 7,216 ambulances, 10,542 bicycles, 12,065 motorcycles, 5,255 motor cars, and 72,379 trucks.

The Quartermaster's Department called our attention to a very great overestimate in connection with gasoline, oils, and lubricants for aeroplanes. They received in the Army act $70,785,000. Their revised estimate of requirements is $20,532,973, a saving of $50,252,027.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman has already shown that he has cut the estimates on horse-drawn vehicles, and so forth, by motorization. I can not understand why the estimate for gasoline should be so decreased also.

Mr. SHERLEY. Gasoline was for aeroplanes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. How does the gentleman account for such a discrepancy between that which the committee found was actually needed and the enormous estimate made by the department?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know. The Quartermaster, Gen. Lord, very frankly said that he did not know how they came to submit such an estimate as $70,000,000 for the need of gasoline; that that figure had been furnished, as I recall the testimony, to the Quartermaster Department by the Aircraft Division; that their estimate now of what they would need, after an examination into the matter, was $20,500,000, or a difference of fifty-odd millions that I have spoken of.

Mr. SLOAN. The reduction was 250 per cent of the base.

Mr. SHERLEY. The reduction is what the figures indicate.

In clothing and camp equipment there is an apparent reduction of $119,564,398, but there is an actual reduction in their estimate of $11,188,216.35, the difference being accounted for by the $108,376,182.81 which we picked up from regular supplies, that being an excess that they had under that total and carried over to clothing, as I explained a while ago.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I noticed in the hearings that the committee considered an estimate of $9,000,000 for matches.

Mr. SHERLEY. We heard it; we did not consider it.

Mr. WALSH. You heard an estimate, and the statement was made that the subsistence could get along with the amount already appropriated. Would the gentleman state what that amount is?

Mr. SHERLEY. I did state it a while ago.

Mr. WALSH. I regret I did not hear it. I was probably at lunch at that time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Two million dollars they now think they need.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have such further time as he desires to complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may have such further time as he desires to complete his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether there are shown in the hearings somewhere the amounts appropriated as contrasted with the amounts estimated? Is there such a table?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is shown generally. In the hearings in most instances are tables of revised estimates, and against those are the amounts of money that were appropriated in the Army act, and the differences represent either the deficiencies asked or a surplus which is available for other purposes. In other words, the first column of the table would show the amount of the estimated total requirements for the year. As a credit to that is the amount appropriated. But I am sorry to say there is not in the hearings the original detail of the estimates submitted, although the differences appear as you read and as I have undertaken to explain. But I will say to the gentleman in passing that he will find that it would take quite a bit of time if he undertakes to check up what I have tried to give to the House in a summary which is the result of a great many days' work on the part of myself and the clerk of the committee. I think these figures are all accurate. They have been checked back, and we are prepared to defend the accuracy of them. When we come to the individual items I shall be glad, if anybody desires, to turn to the basis of calculation and explain why the change was made if the hearings have developed the reasons.

I have already spoken of the fact that in the estimates for horses for cavalry it was found necessary to revise that up by $5,948,742 over the estimate that they submitted, due to the fact that there were a number of cavalry organizations and other needs for horses that had not been figured in the original estimate.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I understood at one time that they used hardly any cavalry over there, and that later they changed their policy.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that in a measure is true. Reverting for a moment to the item for Incidental Expenses. The sum of $54,000,000 is carried there for the expense and tuition of students who, under the new draft law, are to be educated and trained at the various colleges of the country. That includes their expenses other than subsistence, which is carried under the head of subsistence, and as I recall the figures, they estimate that there will be a cost of about $1.52 a day for these students at the various colleges. Of that sum $1 per day for 200,000 men for nine months makes the $54,000,000, and the 52 cents per day is for rations and comes from subsistence. There is a statement, as full as we were able to get it, touching the entire program, which the Members will find in the hearings.

We come now to the item for Hospital Construction. The bed capacity for taking care of troops returning from overseas is figured on 3½ per cent of the total strength that is overseas for a year, or as they usually speak of it, 7 per cent, on the theory that the individual soldier who comes to the hospital will not average over six months' use of a bed, and therefore for the entire year it makes a 3½ per cent provision. This is entirely apart from the hospital and bed capacity that is to be provided and has been provided in America in connection with our troops here, and relates only to what is now spoken of as general hospitals, and is also in addition to such field hospitals as may be abroad. They figure that for an Army of 80 divisions that are to be abroad there should be provision made for 135,000 beds. They have already obtained the money for 20,000 beds, leaving 115,000 beds to be provided for. They estimate that 15,000 of these 115,000 beds will not be established and not be paid for until after the 1st day of July, so that we have carried in this act moneys to furnish 100,000 beds and contract authorization for 15,000 additional beds, which, with the 20,000 already provided for will make their complete total of 135,000 beds. The committee have not wanted in any way to deny any moneys that were needed by the Medical Department in any regard. There have been estimates submitted that if they related to matters other than the care of the sick and wounded might not have met with the acquiescence of the committee, but inasmuch as they did relate to the sick and wounded, we have given in each instance every dollar that they have said they wanted and needed.

There have been some reductions in hospital construction estimates, because they themselves figured a reduction in cost for procurement of some of these beds, and because it developed in the hearing that they had not charged themselves with the $12,970,000 carried in the Army act and with $4,460,000 available for hospitals at various Army posts, and at camps that were intended for the use of over-seas troops returning from abroad.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did not your appropriations provide for the building of the hospitals as well as for their equipment?

Mr. SHERLEY. I assumed that gentlemen were familiar with the fact that in speaking of hospital construction we speak in terms of bed capacity, and when I speak of the money which we are carrying to supply a given number of beds, I mean the hospitals with that bed capacity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is a bill now pending before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds asking for a large appropriation to construct hospitals.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suspect that that bill bears relationship to a program looking to the care of soldiers after their discharge from the service, or that it bears relationship to some civilian needs, because the provisions for the hospitals for the Army are not made by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but are carried as a regular estimate submitted by the Quartermaster General touching hospital construction, and by the Medical Department touching medical and other things needed.

In hospital construction we find an estimate of $5,500,000 for veterinary hospitals. It is estimated that 15 per cent of the animals that are bought by the Army are not available for service, due to sickness and defects that develop, and that there is a loss of 15 per cent. That does not necessarily mean a loss of the entire cost of the animal, but it does mean that that animal is not fit for the purpose for which it was obtained. I made a rough estimate that, figuring the number of animals we will have in the service this year and their value, of the number we would buy there would be somewhere about $17,000,000 worth that would be declared unfit for service. The committee did not feel warranted in spending $5,500,000 for hospital construction for undertaking to cure $17,000,000 worth of animals, in view of the fact that there are some facilities existing now and that others could be supplied to the extent needed for less sums of money. The committee therefore reduced that estimate of $5,500,000 to $1,000,000, which makes a reduction in hospital construction of $4,500,000. Then there was an error in estimate of $3,633,612, a mathematical error, and a reduction that I spoke of in cost of beds of $2,030,000, which together with the credit from the Army appropriation explains the cut of $27,613,612.

I have been dealing with the Quartermaster estimates and trying in a very rough way to explain to you the reasons for a cut of $1,189,674,774.66 made in them. I believe that no cut was made that was not justifiable with the light that was before us, and I repeat that touching pay, subsistence, transportation, there exists under law power in the War Department to incur deficiencies to the extent of the needs so that there can be no harm resulting from that cut. Most of the other cuts are cuts which are acquiesced in by the Quartermaster Department as a result of their own revision and hearings that were developed at the table of the Committee on Appropriations.

The form in which these estimates were finally brought to us was one that is very commendable. It should be followed by a great many other departments, because there was an effort in each instance to show the total requirement for the year, the total stock on hand, the unit cost of the article, the basis on which the estimate had been made, and then explanatory notes, and it is desirable that similar information be brought here from the other departments.

In the estimates of the Medical Department itself, they submitted a deficiency estimate of $95,000,000, and we have allowed it all; but I think I should call the attention of the committee to the basis on which the estimate was originally made, and the basis on which it is now revised and made. In submitting their estimates they figured that there would be a total need for the fiscal year in the way of medical supplies and equipment, under the head of medical and hospital department, of $363,037,531. They obtained through the Army bill $267,408,948, leaving the deficiency which they estimated, and which as I have stated we allowed. But in making that deficiency it develops that they had obtained from the Army act for 1919 for veterinary supplies $42,068,000. They now estimate that they will need for veterinary supplies $4,225,000; so that they overestimated at the time they went before the Military Affairs Committee, and have obtained for the items of veterinary equipment and supplies, an overappropriation of nearly $38,000,000. They estimated in the Army act that they needed for surgical dressings $26,416,000, and that amount they got. They now come in and say that they need $92,988,621 for surgical dressings. In other words, when it develops that their allotment of the moneys that they got from the military appropriation act produced such glaring inconsistencies as $42,000,000 for veterinary supplies and $26,000,000 for surgical dressings, they revised their allotments, but without changing the total, and in revising their allotments they figured as I stated for surgical dressings $92,988,621. I want to read to the committee some of the details of the estimate that goes to make up that $92,000,000 for surgical dressings. This is the total requirement for 1919:

The committee will find in the hearings the tables I have read from, setting it out in detail. The Medical Department stated that they wanted this amount of money, and they stated that some of the estimates might seem excessive, but the committee gave them the amount of money they asked for.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was any statement made by those who appeared before the committee from the War Department as to what had been done with the bandages and other materials prepared by the women workers all over the country for the Red Cross?

Mr. SHERLEY. Largely they have gone for use in our own hospitals. The amount while it is large and speaks splendidly for the work and activity of the women of America, is relatively small in comparison with the figures I have read.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It struck me that the amount called for would supply the needs of the Army without using any of the material prepared by the women of the Red Cross. I do not understand that their work is for naught, because it has been done in strict conformity with the military requirements.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sure their work has been of value and has gone to Red Cross hospitals and been used there. Of course, this is true, that there are certain character of wounds, particularly where there is not an immediate healing, where the quantity of bandages mounts into tremendous figures. The Medical Department seems to think that this amount is large, but they do not feel that they had the right to reduce it. Of course, the committee will understand that the moneys which are voted do not have to be spent in the quantity that is indicated for various substances. They are for medical supplies, and if there is less needed for surgical dressings and more needed for some of the other supplies, they will correspondingly buy more of one and less of the other. I want to repeat again that purchases are not being made simply on the basis of estimates, but I thought it was of interest to the House to see the estimates that were submitted and which as I say, in connection with the Medical Department, have been allowed in their entirety.

For textiles, under hospital supplies, the table shows that they now figure for the entire year an expenditure of $70,682,673.73. They figure for 6,000,000 blankets, 1,062,899 mattresses, 2,810,840 pillows, 14,319,140 pillowcases, 17,584,200 sheets, 5,808,620 pajama suits, bath and hand towels, 2,534,904, and so on.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman kindly give the figures in relation to the supply of catgut for the surgeon's office? I was wondering whether I misunderstood the gentleman, or whether he gave the correct figures.

Mr. SHERLEY. I read that a moment ago. Catgut tubes 24,518,375 of one kind, and plain, 39,229,400. Then there are silk in three sizes of packages, 13,492,920.

Mr. DENISON. Was the committee furnished any information as to how that amount of money, $29,000,000 and $24,000,000, could be expended——

Mr. SHERLEY. That is not money, that is quantity—the number of them.

Mr. DENISON. I thought it was the amount of money the gentleman was giving.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the money is carried out in a table on the side. The amount of money is very much less. I started out by a statement that I would give the quantity. All the figures I have read of surgical dressings have been figures of quantity, and the total is $92,000,000.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. Has any money been appropriated for the purpose of marking the graves of soldiers over the seas, and the transportation of their bodies home?

Mr. SHERLEY. The graves are marked wherever the circumstances make it possible.

Mr. EMERSON. Is anything being done so that bodies can be returned to the United States, supposing the war continues for two or three years?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know as I can answer the gentleman whether anything is being done. The facts submitted show that when the soldier dies abroad, if circumstances permit, his grave is marked. Necessarily and unfortunately many boys give their lives under circumstances which make it impossible to give them a burial in a separately marked grave.

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman has seen himself on the other side graves marked by a cross and a little label consisting of an American flag and a wreath around a tinfoil tablet.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I saw many of them; that is done whenever the surrounding circumstances of the death make it possible.

Mr. SLOAN. As I understand, up to this time there has been no appropriation for the transportation of bodies across the seas.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not for those who die and are buried abroad. There is a provision carried in the sundry civil bill and a provision here for the transportation of the remains of officers and enlisted men.

Mr. EMERSON. I take it that the soldiers are not buried in coffins or caskets.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think in most of the instances where the death occurs it is with such circumstances surrounding it as make it impossible for a burial such as would take place if the soldier died here or back of the line.

In connection with the engineer operations in the field, there was a cut made of $8,750,000, due to an estimate of 25 seagoing tugs made by the Engineer Department which can and will be furnished by the Emergency Fleet Corporation out of the tugs that it is building. The rest of the estimate was given. Gen. Black, in his testimony, and Mr. Felton very frankly stated that it was impossible to give figures in any true sense of the word for much of what they were estimating for. Touching the amount of railroad equipment, locomotives, cars, rails, ties, and building and appliances in connection with the movement of men and supplies, the estimate was worked out upon the basis of railroad facilities necessary to move a given ton of freight, and as far as one not versed technically in the matter could judge, had been well worked out. I think Mr. Felton, who is a distinguished railroad man, has performed very valuable work, in that he knows pretty accurately what he needs and why he needs it. Touching a great deal of the rest of the estimate of the engineers, it is impossible to come to a conclusion. So much of what happens abroad determines the matter from day to day as to make any estimate more or less a guess, and particularly is it likely as we continue to drive the German Army back and our lines of communication and support are lengthened, that there will be heavier and heavier demands in connection with the Engineer Department.

I might mention a little instance that happened at the front some time ago, which shows the drain which may come at any time upon the supplies of a department like this. There was a certain area in a forest that was very swampy, where it was practically impossible for troops to march through without great delay and struggle, because of the character of the ground. It was necessary, however, that they go through. One of the engineer officers had the initiative, the wisdom practically to make a wire netting, spliced with sapplings and sticks, which was placed upon the underbrush and the dirt and mire of the swamp, which made a roadway over which an American division marched to one of their very recent victories. [Applause.] He used up a great deal of material, but it was material well spent, and it is because of those things that it is not fair for us to always be a bit sensitive and disturbed over the inability of the department to make accurate estimates. War is itself an agency of destruction, and the prosecution of it means a constant wastage and destruction of property of high value and cost, and we have to have a leeway and have amounts of material and supplies on hand that would not be necessary or tolerated in the prosecution of any peaceful pursuit. So, as I say, we have given the engineers the amount they have asked less the amount for these 25 tugs.

In connection with the Signal Corps we had an exceedingly difficult problem. They have estimated upon the basis of 105 divisions, with an initial equipment of 400 per cent for wastage, and 200 per cent of the 400 per cent for a three months' supply over in France, and a three months' supply in America, or, including the initial equipment, a 700 per cent basis for each division. They estimated on a basis of 105 divisions. They very frankly stated on the record, and informally off it, that it was difficult to say whether that estimate was all required, but that six months had to elapse between the date of an order and the procurement of much of the material; that when it was needed it was very badly needed; that they were buying only as requisitions abroad made it necessary, plus the reserve they must build up, and the committee, considering the whole of it, believed that as the program called for 98 divisions the seven-division equipment was not necessary to appropriate for at this time, in view of the fact that the whole 98 divisions would not have the wastage upon which the tables were predicated, and that there could easily be a safe reduction. We felt warranted in doing that, knowing that the Congress would at any time, as the need might develop, vote additional moneys for this purpose, and we submit what we have done touching the Signal Service as being sound judgment in view of the light given us. In speaking of the Signal Service, the committee will understand that it is now entirely separate and apart from the Aeronautic Service and that this material is material the Signal Corps use in the field in keeping up communications between the bases in the rear and the army at the front, and it is for that class of material.

In connection with the Chemical Warfare Service, the committee also had considerable difficulty in coming to a clear determination. That service has been conducted until very recently from funds that were carried with the Medical Corps funds and with the ordnance funds, and there were allotments made out of the medical fund and the ordnance funds for the maintenance of this Chemical Warfare Service. By Executive order of the President made recently, there was created a separate corps to be known as the Chemical Warfare Service, and Gen. Sibert, who was one of the men to assist Gen. Goethals in building the Panama Canal, was put at the head of that corps. We thought that in view of the fact that this corps had been created as a separate department, it was desirable, instead of having allotments of funds to be made from the Medical and Ordnance Departments, that the funds should be made directly to them. We have accordingly carried in the bill a provision appropriating directly to them the funds they estimate they need. They asked for $294,484,301. That included the moneys that they thought were necessary for both the defensive and offensive side of this Chemical Warfare Service. Of course, the defensive side, as you all know, is in the way of providing masks and other clothing—protective things—against the gas of the enemy.

The offensive side is in the preparation of shells and other material for firing gas and sending gas over into the enemy's ranks. Their estimates contained a number of items both on the offensive and defensive side looking to experimentation and to the development of new methods of warfare. They were frank in saying that much of this was so new they could not estimate the cost of it, and that a good deal of it represented what they hoped they might be able to do in development. The committee, all things considered, having in mind what they had already gotten out of the previous appropriation, what they were asking represented a sum considerably in excess of what it cost to build the Panama Canal and that the sum was to be expended during this fiscal year, thought that a reduction could be made, and accordingly it was reduced from the estimates by $44,484,301. I believe that this is not an extreme cut. Considerably more than that is represented under moneys that they may need in the event they make various developments both on the offensive and defensive sides, and we believe that certainly, with four months of the fiscal year gone, that there was not much leeway required in their estimate and that if upon a plain showing moneys were needed they would be promptly voted in the future. In their estimate there are certain increases in connection with the purchase of the American University property out here——

Mr. SLOAN. Before leaving the matter of gas, will the gentleman state how many gas masks were asked for; that is, if it is a matter of record? I ask this on account of my attention having been called to that particular thing, and I was interested to know in reference to the number of men we had in our Army.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not available the exact number just now, but the testimony shows it. In money they ask for $175,000,000 for respirators and $20,000,000 for more extra canisters. Two and a half millions miscellaneous extra parts for respirators. I think, if the gentleman will turn to page 1160, or a little ahead of that, in the hearings that he will find the statement—I can not just for the moment put my hand on it—as to the initial equipment and maintenance.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not desire the gentleman to spend any time on it. I will look the matter up myself.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course provision is made for every man who goes overseas having a gas mask and a certain amount for maintenance of those who are overseas, and then there is furnished to the men here for training purposes a gas mask each.

Mr. CANNON. There is 17 per cent wastage per month.

Mr. SHERLEY. The granting of a separate appropriation to this service has brought reductions in the estimates of the Ordnance Department, which had been submitted in the belief that they were to continue to furnish funds for the procurement of materials and the labor for filling shells for the Chemical Warfare Service during the remainder of the year. Such reductions were as follows: "Ordnance stores, ammunition," $6,903,750; "Ordnance stores and supplies," $3,000,000; and "field-artillery ammunition," $161,890,589; a total reduction of $171,794,339.

Mr. DENISON. Is the Government buying this American University property?

Mr. SHERLEY. I was about to speak of that. There is an estimate here looking to the purchase of the American University, and to the expenditure of a considerable amount of money out there. They were to furnish some information for the record touching the exact terms under which they have been occupying the property. At the time they were before the committee nobody seemed to be fully advised as to just what the conditions were. They seemed to have had maybe a written agreement or probably a verbal agreement with the bishop of the Methodist Church, I think it is, who is resident at the American University, touching the use of the property free, and then the right of the university to certain improvements that we were to make there. That was at a time when the activities there were not anything like they are now. They have now in here an estimate touching the purchase of the land, erection of various buildings in connection with the university there. Now, gentlemen, in connection with field artillery——

Mr. SLOAN. If the gentleman will yield right there, in the matter of the purchase of this university, is that purchase or lease or looking toward the continued ownership and control by this Government of that university and all the buildings, grounds, and so forth?

Mr. SHERLEY. There are not many buildings there, at least that the university ever had, but there is some ground there.

Mr. DENISON. There are three or four stone buildings there.

Mr. SHERLEY. There are two large buildings as I recall the testimony, stone buildings.

Touching the ordnance the estimates which were submitted to Congress by the Ordnance Department contemplated the providing of money necessary, in addition to what had previously been voted, for 120 divisions. The testimony of the Chief of Staff showed that the program called for 80 divisions abroad and 18 at home and of necessity the ordnance in estimating has to estimate beyond just the fiscal year due to the very great length of time in procurement, and they have figured that with the replacement of troops which would go to maintain the strength of the 80 abroad and 18 here, there should be provision for 120 divisions. In cross-examination it developed that they were only warranted in estimating for 112 divisions, and when it was suggested that a revision should be made in the estimates to the extent of the difference represented between the additional moneys needed for the total of 112 divisions and the total of 120 divisions, they stated that they had just learned that there had come over from France a new requirement as to artillery and ammunition for each division that would probably more than absorb the leeway which was represented by those additional 8 divisions, it being perfectly evident that the old estimates had been submitted simply on the basis that had been submitted in the first instance for an Army of a million men, and that they had only estimated for their fourth army with some additions.

So the committee suggested to the Ordnance Department that they take their estimates and rearrange them both as to guns and as to ammunition. They did rearrange them, and they brought back a table based upon an equipment for 112 divisions of the new strength of the artillery per division. That new strength is so much greater than the old program called for that, although the Congress voted moneys that it was believed were necessary for the equipment of 90 divisions of three armies in the previous fortification bills, under the new table of organization that would be sufficient for the equipment of, roughly speaking, about 69 divisions, and so instead of having need for 22 divisions additional on the old program over what they had received they actually had a need on the new program of the difference between 69 divisions and 112, or 43 divisions, roughly speaking.

The result was that they increased their estimates and sent in new estimates for field artillery and the ammunition therefor to the extent of over $1,155,000,000. Their old estimates were totally inadequate in view of the new requirements as to artillery strength and the ammunition for the guns.

Now, we have in connection with the field artillery proper allowed in contract authorization all that they have asked for except $114,375,000. We have allowed it because the need of continuing the supply of guns and ammunition is so great that we did not feel warranted in curtailing the amount, though personally I believe that it will require the utmost effort of this country to produce within the time figured the amount that we are providing for here. I question whether it is possible to do it; but in view of the fact that certain parts of it can and will be obtained in even larger measure than was originally provided for, by the help of England and France it is possible that the country may be able to produce the quantities estimated for. We cut, though, as I said, $114,375,000 out of the field artillery, and we cut that amount out because of the Neville Island project. The Neville Island project was undertaken some time ago, and was originally figured to be an expenditure in plant of about $40,000,000; and they obtained $40,000,000 for that purpose in the fortifications act, they having already undertaken it prior to the passage of that act or the submission of the estimate; and they also obtained for similar enlargement at Midvale $15,000,000. They have transferred $5,000,000 of the $15,000,000 that was intended for Midvale to Neville Island, so that they have now for that purpose $45,000,000. In point of fact, they have given commitments and undertaken work that represents about $46,000,000. They are asking an additional amount of $93,000,000 in order to very greatly enlarge this plant and give it a capacity to manufacture 14, 16, and 18 inch guns.

The testimony went to show that deliveries of these 14-inch guns, which they have planned to make there, the capacity of the plant for the 16 and 18 inch guns being intended to take care of future fortifications and Navy needs, was, for the first guns, probably the spring of 1920. Certain shell capacity would be produced in the winter of 1919. If this plant upon its now enlarged scale is to be undertaken, it will probably mean an expenditure of $29,000,000 for housing of employees in connection with the plant. So that there will be a total expenditure in connection with the plant of probably $167,000,000.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think or understand that the Government is going ahead with this program regardless of the outcome of the war?

Mr. SHERLEY. The Government has urged this program upon the committee as desirable in connection with some of its big-gun program relative to the war, and, as an additional reason, the creation of a plant there with such capacity as would enable the Government to supply 16 and 18 inch guns, there being no capacity in America now equal to that purpose.

Mr. DENISON. Now, in that connection, the general talk is, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, that one of the conditions of this peace when it is secured will be the reduction of all military armament to a point where it is simply necessary for preserving peace at home.

Mr. SHERLEY. My answer to that is simply this: This bill is not predicated on what may happen at a peace table. It is predicated on what the war needs from now on may be, and the Subcommittee on Appropriations did not recommend to the full committee an additional expenditure of $93,000,000 simply because, in its judgment, it did not bear that relationship to the prosecution of this war that would justify the expenditure under all circumstances. And the reason for that was this, that we have now undertaken a program that, in my judgment, is going to test the capacity of the country in steel and other materials, and in labor, in order to turn out the field guns and the ammunition that are necessary.

To superimpose upon that program this additional program of the enlargement of this plant for the purpose of getting guns as far in the future as I have indicated, meant, in my judgment, necessarily a slowing down of some of the other program to an extent that more than offsets the gain of having a plant at that time capable of producing the guns that this would be able to produce in the spring of 1920, and for that reason we eliminated it.

Now, so far as the "after the war" end of it, which was urged by them, is concerned, I think it is true that we will have need to make big guns for our coast fortifications, and we will have need to make guns for the Navy. It may be possible that the world in its wisdom will come to the point where armament by nations will either be done away with or greatly curtailed, but we have not reached that point yet, and no man that I know is wise enough to prophesy whether we ever will reach it. The probability in my judgment is that if we come to a league of nations there will be, as an incident of that league of nations to keep the peace of the world, a necessary armed force that will belong to the league and will be furnished in proportionate parts by the various nations, somewhat dependent upon their strength and importance in the world. If that should come to pass America will have her part to furnish, and I would not refuse this appropriation, because I thought we were going to do away with guns and ammunition and wars in the future. But the subcommittee has refused to recommend it to the full committee because it did not believe that, taken in connection with the existing program, it represented a wise expenditure at this time, and because we believed it might result more in slowing up than in enhancing the military program.

In that particular we have taken issue with the Chief of Staff and the War Department; the only instance in this bill in which we have taken issue with them. I personally would be very glad if some Member of the House, when we reached that paragraph, if he desires to test the opinion of the House, would offer an amendment to increase by $114,375,000 the amount that we carry in connection with guns. Then the House can go on record. The committee has no dogmatic view about the matter. It has tried to come to a judgment involving a very difficult thing and involving a very large expenditure of money. If the committee has erred the House can correct that error, and if the House errs the Senate can correct the action of the House.

That is the situation. In cutting out this $93,000,000 we also cut out certain estimates for guns predicated upon this large plant which amounted to $21,375,000, making a total of $114,375,000, and consequently there would go with it the elimination of a large sum of money which the Department of Labor will probably ask in connection with the housing of employees.

With respect to field-artillery ammunition, we insisted that the Ordnance Department should examine its estimates on a basis that would more clearly represent the needs than the rough estimates which they had originally submitted, and that method of estimate was to figure exactly the number of guns that were to be abroad at a given time and to divide the amount of ammunition that would be needed by those guns according to the active and inactive months; and on that calculation, which they agreed was a more scientific and better method of doing it, and on the calculation as to the movement of troops and guns abroad, they have presented their estimates not only for their requirements up to July but after that, and the committee has allowed them in the form of contract authorizations, which are satisfactory to the Ordnance Department, they not desiring cash except in one instance, in which we have given them $280,000,000 to meet contracts authorized in the last fortifications act which will become payable prior to March 31 in connection with field-artillery ammunition.

There was also an estimate for a nitrate plant, or a series of nitrate plants, amounting to $103,500,000, but the Ordnance Department did not press it, and stated that they had no desire to undertake the building of those nitrate plants at this time. The condition in regard to nitrates is better than it was some months ago. The supplies on hand of nitrates are greater than they were, and the ammonia nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals is just coming into production, and it is hoped and believed that in a few weeks the production from that source will be very greatly enlarged. There is also a reduction of $161,890,589 under field-artillery ammunition, due, as I have stated, to giving a separate fund to the Chemical Warfare Service.

We cut out by the voluntary statement of the Ordnance people considerable sums that were carried for the purpose of maintenance of ammunition for this fourth army and for practice ammunition; not that we wanted to slow down—and we do not slow down at all on practice ammunition—but because there will not be this fourth army in the field using this material during the whole fiscal year on the basis on which the original estimate was made. When these items are reached I shall be glad to go further into detail in connection with any of them that the committee may wish.

The committee hearings cover 1,380 pages, and we hope they give to the House as much information as was practicable to obtain and permissible to print. Of necessity there was certain information touching the movement of troops and touching organization that it was not desired should be made a matter of public record. But what could be printed has been, and the estimates in connection with the ordnance, I believe, represent a sum very much in excess of what can possibly be expended. But we felt that we were not warranted in slowing down their movement. They have practically authorized expenditures that wipe out all of the moneys and all of the contract authorizations that have been made heretofore, and it was necessary to give them this additional leeway if we were not to slow down this vastly complicated machinery for the production of these guns and ammunition. We were not willing to take the responsibility of slowing down. This is not a time for the Congress of the United States to slow down in connection with the preparation or the continuation of this war. [Applause.] There is no man in America who wants the Government of the United States to slow down its actual operations in the field or its operations here and elsewhere in supplying that Army in the field. Every man who has a heart wants peace to come again to the world, but every man who has a head wants that peace so to come that it will be a real and a lasting peace. [Applause.] Every sacrifice that has been made has been made in vain unless this war is so prosecuted as to bring about a real peace, a peace that shall come only as a result of a real whipping of our enemies, a peace that comes as a sincere realization on the part of Germany and the nations that have been allied with her that militarism does not pay and that her dream of world rule can not, will not, and shall not come true. [Applause.] It is for that reason that this Government has appropriated in the past sums without parallel. It is for that reason that we have sent the best of our blood abroad to be shed upon the battle fields of France. It is for that reason that we passed the new draft law. It is for that reason that this bill is now pending before this House. It is for that reason that we go forward with the enlargement of plants, with the enlargement of programs; and for my part I am not willing, and I do not believe the Congress is going to be willing by its action to slow by one hour the continuation of this war.

When peace does come, upon terms that make for real, final, lasting peace, a peace of justice and of righteousness, we as a peace-loving Nation will welcome it and rejoice in it; but we will not endanger it by halting in the ways half won. We will not endanger it by slowing our activities now. We will not endanger it by any deceptive pleas that may be made by the enemy because they are beginning to feel the force of the righteous indignation and might of the world. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, there is much in connection with this bill that ought to be stated, and yet I have now talked for some two hours, and I am feeling the fatigue of the work so much that I believe I can not perhaps with profit to the committee deal further with the matter in a general statement. The responsibility of preparing a bill of this kind is very great. In order that we may prosecute the war as I have expressed the belief that we should prosecute it, we must carefully husband our resources. We must see to it that expenditures are not made unnecessarily. Every dollar expended by the Government or by the citizens of America for purposes not necessary is just that much slowing down of the war program; and therefore the man best helps that program who tries to vote moneys intelligently for needs that are real, and prevents money being wasted, and—what is even more important—material and labor being wasted in the creation of things that are not necessary. Therefore it has been that the committee has worked day and night to try and sift much of these estimates, so as to eliminate some of the things that were not necessary and that the zeal or the ignorance of individual men had occasioned to be brought before the Congress.

The estimates submitted by the Navy Department for maintenance and operation of that department and for the Naval Establishment aggregated $125,064,601.26. The amount carried in the bill for the naval service is $107,217,778.26, a reduction under the estimates of $17,846,823. The largest single reduction is the sum of $14,891,000 in the item of ammunition for vessels, and represents practice ammunition which, in the judgment of Admiral Earle, safely could be eliminated. The sums of $1,793,000 for improvements at ordnance stations and $165,000 for fuel storage at Pearl Harbor were omitted on the statement that their consideration might be postponed until the regular naval bill for 1920.

The amount given the Navy is composed chiefly of four items in addition to the item of ammunition just mentioned. Fifteen million dollars is recommended for outfits on first enlistment, $11,185,301 for ordnance and ordnance stores, $26,529,464 for new batteries for ships of the Navy, and $2,856,080.61 for construction and equipment of training camps. The latter sum is a deficiency actually incurred and obligated without previous authorization of Congress, and there remains only the function of paying the bill.

There were submitted also in connection with this bill estimates from the various departments here in Washington for over $3,000,000 in salaries and increases in pay for clerks, and not a dollar of it has been recommended by the committee. [Applause.] It has not been recommended because we did not believe it was desirable in the interest of the prosecution of this war to add to the clerks that are here in Washington. The remedy for a shortage of clerks in any department is a readjustment of the allotment of clerks to the various departments. [Applause.] There are some departments that are short. There are a great many departments that have clerks who are in the way of one another, and, I repeat, the remedy is a rearrangement of those clerks. We have carried moneys here to take care of existing pay rolls. In some instances those pay rolls represent perhaps more than what they should; but we have denied requests for increases of clerks here, and particularly at this time we think that action is wise and justifiable.

We have also eliminated a great deal in the way of odds and ends that would be desirable in peace times, but are not desirable now. The Government of the United States is asking every day, and it is going to continue if this war goes on to ask more and more of the citizenship of America that they forego the doing of things that would be desirable in peace times, but that are not permissible now. We have stopped much of the building of the country by private interests. We ought to see to it that we do not do any building of our own that is unnecessary; and civil departments of the Government, instead of using the war as an excuse for asking additional moneys, ought to realize that they can best show their patriotism by curtailing their activities during these times. [Applause.] For my part I have reached the point where it is going to require a good deal of showing to warrant the undertaking of civil activities in the future, and I think it would be well if before an estimate is permitted to come to Congress there should be received from the War Industries Board a clearance for the material and the labor necessary to carry out the project that is asked. Unless these things are to be done we are going to have confusion worse confounded as the strain goes on and on.

This bill carries an affirmative proposal which I drafted and the committee were good enough to accept. It is a proposal for the creation of a salvage commission to study the problem of the disposition of war material after the war. A good many bills have been introduced in this body and in the Senate dealing with this subject. My friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], a member of the committee, introduced one bill which looked to the creation of a commission with power to dispose of governmental property.

The proposal that I have carried in this bill is built on a different line. It is a proposal for the creation of a commission that shall have no power except that of recommendation at this time. Personally I believe that Congress would not and should not give to any commission the power to dispose of Governmental property at this time or after the war until we have had some opportunity for an inventory of such property and a consideration of its uses. So the provision is written in simple language, with broad power of inquiry and of report, but with no power of final action. The President is authorized to appoint seven Members whose duty it shall be to make a survey of the property of the United States and particularly that acquired since the beginning of the war, and in order that they may better perform their functions it is made the duty of the various departments to make an inquiry and study of the property under their control, and what use can be made of that property or other Government property, and the departments or agents of the Government are required to furnish to the commission such information as the commission may from time to time require. The commission is to report to Congress at the first and each subsequent session of the next Congress, and is required to furnish to the President or to the Congress any other information that may be asked from time to time.

The idea is simply this, that we may get a body of men put to the task of surveying this vast accumulation of property. No matter whether the war ends in the immediate future or next year or two years from now there is bound to be a tremendous amount of property of great value if it is put to a right use, but which will be worthless beyond its value as junk unless there is a prevision, study, and understanding of uses to which it can be put. England has for a number of years had a number of commissions engaged in this study and so have the other nations at war. It is time we were taking some thought of those days that are to follow after the war; take thought of it, not with the idea of slowing the war activities but coincident with them, giving study to it, and, indeed, much of the study ought to have been at the time the investments were made in connection with the war in order that there might be provision made looking to the subsequent phase of the peace use of this property. Some departments have done that. I think the engineer department of the Army for one, in regard to terminal facilities, railways, and equipments had in mind the subsequent possible need, and in some instances have had contracts incident to the creation of facilities looking to their taking over by private interests.

But, anyway, we need this study. This is presented not as a final word on the subject, but as a method to an end. I believe that no one of us is wise enough now to write into rigid law just what power and duties shall pertain to any agency of the Government touching this property. I do not want to see any rigid law passed now touching the disposition of this property. I want a survey first as the basis of action afterwards. If men of the right caliber—and they ought to be big men, very big men; not necessarily men of great wealth, but big men in the true sense of bigness, whose vision reaches beyond the horizon and who would not permit things immediately in front of them to blot out that vision—are chosen, if we get a commission of that kind, we will get from them information that will be of value to the country, and I trust that this provision may prevail in the Committee of the Whole.

As I stated, when we come to the details of the bill I will be glad to call the attention to many items contained in it.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. As the gentleman knows, we have had no opportunity to read the bill, as it has just been reported, and it prompts Members to ask more questions than perhaps they otherwise would. I am pleased with the admirable statement made by the chairman of the committee and impressed with its force, and impressed with the work that has been done in connection with the prominent features of the bill just mentioned. I would like to ask if the committee in the bill has done anything toward organizing or providing for a committee with power to look over or look after the economies in the expenditures of these vast sums through the various departments during the period of the war?

Mr. SHERLEY. The committee has made no recommendation. As the gentleman knows, I have been one of the men who have believed for many years past that the Congress and the Government in its internal organization represented what in many ways was an archaic system. I still think it. I believe that we ought to have an independent audit that should be responsible to the Congress of the United States and not to the administrative body. We ought to have that irrespective of war or peace. I believe that the organization of committees in this House ought fundamentally and radically to be changed. This House will never have that voice in matters of first moment that it should have unless it ceases to waste its time in the consideration of little details. [Applause.] If we undertake always to curtail departmental activities simply by division and subdivision of items, we will simply spend in the future, as we so frequently have in the past, our time in debating matters that are relatively trivial. We frequently accomplish only the result of tying the hands of the conscientious and efficient administrator and give to the efficient one a new reason for exercising his ingenuity to avoid complying with the will of Congress.

We must have a system of bookkeeping that will give to an auditing organization knowledge of expenditures, and then we can hold rigidly accountable those who are responsible for extravagant expenditures.

Why do I not propose something of that kind now? First, because I have not the time—and those who know something of the labors of the committee can appreciate that that is a true statement—to work out a program that would be efficient, even if I had the ability; second, because you can not do it now in war times. I know that does not meet the concurrence of a great many men, but believe me when I say to you that the situation touching all the Governments at war is more or less the same.

The great contribution that Gladstone made to the parliamentary procedure when he brought about the reformation in the English Parliament was in the creation of an independent audit. But if anybody thinks that over in England to-day Parliament is undertaking to know and pass upon the expenditures that are being made by the British Government they are mistaken. Parliament can not do it in a time of war. The Admiralty comes to the ministry and says, "We want so many million pounds." The ministry says, "We think you ought not to have it. The condition is such that we do not feel like making that expenditure." "All right," says the Admiralty, "we say it is necessary in order that the fleet shall continue to do certain things. You take the responsibility, if you want to, of denying to the fleet the necessary money." And no ministry ever does that or ever will do it. The same is necessarily true of other countries. War is a game in which time is of the most importance, and you can not undertake to determine expenditures in the same way that you can in time of peace. That does not mean that there are not plenty of improvements that can be made in connection with the prosecution of the war. It does not mean that there are not plenty that have been made. I have stood here for some time talking about the estimates that came from the Quartermaster's Department. I would give a totally false picture if I did not again emphasize the fact that I believe Gen. Lord has brought into that organization now a method of estimate and procurement that will eliminate most of these erroneous, and in some instances absurd, estimates of the past, and it was because he has the matter in hand that my colleagues and I were able to dig out this information and present it to the House. If there had been nothing but confusion up there, we could have found some of it, but no committee operating simply through the process of examination of witnesses could have dug out this information to present to this Committee of the Whole if it had not been that there had already come into the conduct of estimate and procurement of the Quartermaster's Department order out of a great deal of disorder. The same thing is happening in a number of other departments.

I do not hold a brief for Army or Navy officers, and I do not hold a brief for administrative officers generally. The very position I hold makes me more or less the critic of administrative officers. A man fit to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations must occupy the attitude of the critic more or less of the administrative departments, and yet there is a great deal of criticism of individual men that is born of the ignorance of the problem those men are confronted with. It is usually the man who knows least about the difficulty of the problem who is most apt to be dogmatic about it, and to be dead sure as to how the thing should be remedied and just what he would be able to do if he had charge of the work. Take a matter like the estimate I spoke of for the Signal Corps, and suppose that upon you rests the responsibility now for having equipment in hand from time to time to go overseas, in order that the intelligence may be maintained between the men at the front and the men behind at either advance headquarters or general headquarters. The war shifts from day to day. There is a battle line that runs for a hundred or more miles, with every modern method of communication in vogue, and you have to plan for six weeks, six months, or a year ahead. You will not be upon that work many days before you will lose your dogmatism and get humble in the face of the difficulties of the problem.

Mistakes have been made, and they will continue to be made, but it has been a very wonderful achievement that this country has produced in the prosecution of this war. [Applause.] The time will come when we who are now actors upon the scene have passed away, when men will look from a sufficient distance to get some view of the whole scene, when it will be called the marvel of the world that a Nation should have put across the water in the time that we have done it the troops we have, equipped as they have been, fed as they have been, trained as they have been, and with the glorious courage and bravery and heroism that they have exhibited, whenever called into action. [Applause.]

I stand here before the committee to bring out the things that I think are wrong, because that is my duty, and I owe a duty to the House and to the country that is beyond any duty that may belong to a party, but I do not bring these things out, bad as some of them may be, and corrected as they should and will be, with the idea of belittling the achievements that have taken place upon the part of the people of America under the leadership of the President of the United States. It has been a glorious achievement. Its fruits are being seen every hour. News can not travel fast enough to carry the happenings of each moment that serve to add additional glory and luster to America and American soldiers and sailors. There were dark days in March, in April, in May, and in June even. Nobody can know who has not talked with some who were there how dark the days were in the spring and early summer in France. It was America that saved the civilization of the world, and she saved it within almost an hour of time. She saved it because there had been enough organization and enough work and enough preparation back here to make it possible to have there at that crucial hour the men who were there wearing the uniform of the United States prepared to give their splendid youth in order that civilization might not die. [Applause.] No one need apologize for the achievements of America in this war. No one need go out to the people anywhere and say to them that things have gone wrong and are awry. They are not. They are going forward, and every day is an advance, every day is an improvement. If I point out to you the things that are wrong it shows not that we are failing, but to the thoughtful, thinking man it shows the magnitude of the task that we have undertaken, and the wonder is not that mistakes have been made, but the wonder is that a people should suddenly turn from peaceful pursuits overnight and become the most formidable, powerful, military nation in the world, and that we are to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, after the lengthy and exceedingly able explanation of this large deficiency appropriation bill by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SHERLEY] I do not desire to take up much of the time of the committee. All that he has said about the labor connected with the preparation of the bill is true, and the half has not been told. While he sits on one side of the aisle and I sit on the other I feel that I would not perform my duty to the House and to the country if I did not say that under his leadership and the cooperation of all his colleagues in the preparation of the bill there has been but one motive in the committee, composed as it is of Members from different party organizations, and that is to present a bill under the operation of which, supplementing appropriations that have been made, peace will be brought to this country and to our allies. [Applause.] There has been no question of partisanship in the consideration of the bill. There has been no desire upon the part of any member of the committee other than to recommend all that is necessary to be given at this time for the successful prosecution of the war. There were many things to consider in the preparation of the bill. Gentlemen should stop to think a minute of what confronted us—the money that has been gathered by taxation up to this time, the money that is to be gathered by taxation under the pending revenue bill, the large amount used in financing our allies, the calling into existence and training of our Army and the furnishing it with arms, the building of ships to transport our products and Army, the building of destroyers, the construction of a larger and I might say a new Navy, and it is because of these things that we have been called upon to make these extraordinary appropriations and expenditures.

And I take pleasure here and now in saying that during my service of over 40 years in the National House of Representatives, so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, it has never had a chairman to lead it and to inform the House superior to the one it has to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we did not become a participant in this world war until Germany, while we were exercising our rights as a neutral, destroyed our ships on the high seas—the world's great highways.

Then we declared war. Since that time our people of both great parties have been a unit, cooperating with our allies to win the war and secure a victory that will prevent Germany from dominating the world.

Until victory is had questions of peace policies to be determined by majorities can not arise for the United States. In our country we are all for a successful winning of the war, whether we call ourselves Republicans, Democrats, or Independents. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes of my time to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, Representative MONDELL.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I feel like apologizing to the committee for taking even a brief time in the discussion of this bill after the very clear, lucid, informing, eminently fair, and accurate statement that has been made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. As one member of the minority, and expressing, I believe, the view of the entire minority of the committee, I can say that we approve the view and the attitude expressed by the gentleman from Kentucky touching this bill and indorse his statement of the views and policies that were adopted and carried out by the committee in the formulation of the bill. Personally I came into the preparation of this bill rather late in the game. I am not a member of the subcommittee having it originally in charge, but owing to illness in the families of other members, after hearings were well along I was asked to assist somewhat in the hearings and in the final preparation of the bill. So I speak, therefore, from the standpoint of one who has not as full and complete information with regard to the items of the bill as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE], who gave very much time and attention to the bill from the very beginning. I want at the outset to express my appreciation of the work of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in connection with this bill. He is an exceedingly modest man, and he gave in his statement much credit to others for the work of the committee which resulted in the very great reduction in the appropriations below the estimates, with the complete acquiescence of the representatives of the departments; but the fact is that all of this was very largely due to the work of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who brought his keen, analytical mind, his wide knowledge, and his mature judgment to bear in the investigation of all the questions that came before the committee in the preparation of the bill. [Applause.] He was very ably aided and assisted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has had knowledge of these matters time out of mind, and to whom the problems that are presented in connection with the consideration of an appropriation or a deficiency bill are very familiar.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE], with his wide business experience and his keen mind, was exceedingly useful and helpful in the preparation of the bill, as were the majority members, Messrs. BYRNS of Tennessee, SISSON, and EAGAN, all of whom gave a great deal of time and very close attention to the hearings and rendered valuable aid in the final make-up of the legislation. I desire in the few moments I shall consume to emphasize a few points touched on by the gentleman from Kentucky. In these days of war and when our victorious troops and those of our allies are constantly pressing the enemy backward all along that shifting, bloody battle line in France it is tremendously important that nowhere, either at home or abroad, shall there be anything said or done to create the impression that we are letting up in the least in the force, volume, or efficiency of our military preparations. One viewing the very great reductions made in the bill below the estimates, reductions amounting to $2,540,375,985, might receive the impression that the mind of the committee had to a degree been affected in arriving at its decisions by recent suggestions of a possible early peace. I want to emphasize the declaration of the gentleman from Kentucky that the committee passed upon these items as though there had been no talk of peace, and with the view that there could be no peace except the peace of absolute and conclusive victory. All the reductions in the estimates, save possibly the reduction in the Neville Island estimate and a very few others of a minor character, were made with the full acquiescence of the heads of the departments making the estimates. The members of the committee did not feel that they would be justified in asserting that it would be fair to the House for them to assert their own judgment against the final and conclusive judgment, after full consideration and discussion, of the men who are responsible for the estimates and for the expenditure of the moneys that are appropriated. The gentleman from Kentucky has called attention to the very marked and extraordinary reductions that were made below the estimates in a very considerable number of items, particularly those of certain branches of the War Department, and the gentleman has been good enough to absolve from the responsibility that one might reasonably insist rested upon the men making those estimates, a portion at least of that responsibility, by giving reasons or excuses for estimates made largely in excess of the sum finally determined to be necessary. I grant you it is true that in making up estimates hurriedly, making up estimates having to do with troops in the field engaged in war operations on an unprecedented scale, those who are responsible for making up those estimates should not be expected to trim them too closely.

It is their duty to estimate liberally. And yet, after all is said in excuse and extenuation, it does seem a little extraordinary that after several guesses the War Department should conclude it needed not $11,000,000 for matches, but $2,000,000. It does seem extraordinary that, after having twice estimated in the matter of veterinary supplies, the department should not have known that it needed only about $4,000,000 for these purposes and not $40,000,000. It does seem extraordinary and difficult to explain that the officials of the department should have overestimated, not once, but twice, their needs for forage for animals to the extent of $121,000,000. And it does seem extraordinary and almost beyond comprehension that men whose duty it was to know the needs of the service should have had so little information with regard to the necessities of the air service as to have estimated $70,000,000 for gasoline for airplanes and then have concluded that they only needed $20,000,000. I mention a few out of many glaring and very extraordinary evidences of either gross carelessness and indifference or very loose methods of calculation.

I hope it is true that we now have an organization in the War Department under which we shall not in the future have these extraordinary and grotesque estimates. I think, however, it is well to recall and remember the fact that if it were not for the labors of a committee of this House in the careful consideration of estimates this bill would have carried two and a half billion dollars more than it does carry, a sum sufficient to conduct the entire Government for two years prior to the war. It may be said thoughtlessly that even though the additional sums were appropriated no particular harm would be done, because they would not be expended. That is not a true or accurate statement of the situation; for while it is probably true that the War Department has not been contracting as wildly as it has estimated, it is true that the War Department or any other department, or any other aggregation of men anywhere, are to a certain extent governed in their expenditures by the money at their command and disposal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

And in these times it is not only the question of the useless expenditure of the public money; it is the question of the expenditure of the public money for purposes and uses that are unnecessary, resulting in the checking of enterprises that are essential to the winning of the war. The Nation is strained to the utmost to carry out the enormous military program provided for in this and former bills, and not a dollar and not a unit of man power should be diverted from the carrying out of the necessary and essential program.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This bill is purely a military bill and providing for war necessities. I see there is an appropriation of over $16,000,000 here for civil services. Would not that more properly come under a civil deficiency bill?

Mr. MONDELL. This is a general deficiency bill that includes deficiencies from all of the departments. The major part of the bill, the bulk of it, relates clearly and definitely to the Military Establishment. Of course there are some deficiencies in the other establishments of the Government, most of which, however, have some relation to the war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How does the Civil Service department connect this activity with the War Department?

Mr. MONDELL. The Civil Service Commission, if that is one of the items the gentleman has in mind, requires additional help above what was appropriated for, necessary for the holding of civil-service examinations of war workers throughout the country.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I note the gentleman's suggestion that there might be about the same flexibility and elasticity of expenditures in the War Department as there was in estimates. If that is true, or measurably true, would it not be wise policy to have a supervising or auditing committee to look after that expenditure?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think it might be very well to do that, but up to this time the administration has not been in favor of such an audit, and the Congress has followed the view of the administration in that matter.

Mr. Chairman, how much of my time has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, for just a moment I want to discuss the Neville Island project, and before I go to it I want to say this, that being called in rather late in the hearings on the bill I had considerable difficulty in making up my mind with regard to a number of items. Eventually there was complete agreement among the members of the committee, so that the bill as reported represents a unanimous decision. One of the very considerable items that we had to pass upon was that of a $93,000,000 increase in the plant at Neville Island, upon the top of which would be another item of $29,000,000 for housing. As I said a moment ago, that was the only item not appropriated for in favor of which there was insistence upon the part of the War Department. But let it be understood that that insistence upon the part of the War Department relative to Neville Island was not an insistence based wholly or principally upon war needs. It was an insistence upon the plant as a great gun-making concern, as Gen. March said, for all time, and without regard to the present emergency. The funds available, amounting to $45,000,000, will build a plant capable of manufacturing guns up to 18-inch, although the capacity was predicated on 14-inch guns. But a part of its productive capacity will be for 16 and 18 inch guns, even though we do not increase the capacity of the plant. So that, with the $45,000,000 now available we will have facilities for large guns of all classes and calibers up to the largest gun now made or proposed by anyone. To at this time add to that plant $93,000,000 of expenditure, and later on top of that $29,000,000 of expenditure for housing, was to strain to the breaking point the productive capacity of the country in steel, and in other materials of various kinds, and in man power.

At this time, when the War Industries Board is refusing authority to erect buildings and plants all over the country, when we are curtailing construction everywhere, it did not appear to the committee we were justified in going on with this great work, which under no circumstances can produce guns until well into the year 1920, and which can produce guns just as quickly but not as many of them with the smaller as under the larger program. Furthermore the Congress has never affirmatively given its assent to this great gun enterprise. We did appropriate in the fortification bill $40,000,000 for the original scheme, because the work was under way; but other than that the Congress has never authorized this great construction. The committee was therefore not only called upon to determine as to whether we should recommend $93,000,000 more for this plant, but whether the committee should take the responsibility on behalf of the House of now accepting as settled and determined upon the construction of the greatest gun plant in the world. If that were done the $29,000,000 housing plan would, of course, follow. If it seems wise to enlarge this plant later on, that can be done then at a very much less expense than at this time.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes, briefly.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman if one of the peace terms proposed by the President, which he said was essential, was not the reduction by international agreement of all military armament to the point necessary for domestic peace only?

Mr. MONDELL. That is true.

Mr. DENISON. Now, then, if we are going to insist upon that as a peace term, and Germany has agreed to it, are we not a little bit inconsistent in going ahead and making preparation here at home at the same time for a plant of that kind which will be of no benefit to us in this war?

Mr. MONDELL. I believe we would be very inconsistent if we adopted at this time the larger program. As to whether we are inconsistent in going on with the present program I am not prepared to say. Contracts are made and the work is under way, and that plant will produce some ammunition early in 1920, and some guns a little later in 1920, and it will be a great plant at that.

Mr. DENISON. I would not, of course, question anything that may be necessary to aid us to complete this war, but I am talking about the construction of this great plant for the future when we are at the same time saying to Germany, and presumably our allies agree with us in that, that one of the points we are going to insist on in the final peace arrangement is the disarmament of all nations by international agreement down to the point where it is necessary only to preserve domestic peace.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we all hope that much of that may be accomplished, although as one of the individuals who has dreamed dreams of world-wide peace more or less for a long time I am not so certain in regard to it now, I regret to say, as I once was. I am afraid we will always have to make some guns and probably some very big ones [applause], and we ought to have some preparation for making such guns. The committee declined to approve this larger program, as was clearly indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], purely on the ground that it would not, in our opinion, furnish material for this war unless the war should last longer than anyone estimates, and the meantime the carrying on of the enlarged program would shorten and interfere with the necessary and essential present program in the manufacture and production of those things that we must have.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It seems to me, in view of the statement that the gentleman has made in regard to this large appropriation, which was not approved, or this large estimate, that it is not a deficiency matter at all. The gentleman seemed to think that they might properly have put it in their bill if they had thought best. Does that mean that this bill, called a deficiency bill, provides for a large number of new projects and propositions and therefore is not really a deficiency bill?

Mr. MONDELL. This bill provides only for war necessities, and the statement the gentleman has made in a way emphasizes the wisdom of the committee in not approving the estimate for this enlargement at Neville Island.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If it is strictly a deficiency bill, is it not to make up some shortage, something that should have been appropriated in larger amounts before?

Mr. MONDELL. The argument might be made that this plant having been started without any definite limit of cost, there was a deficiency, because they did not have money enough available to build it as large as the War Department thought best. At any rate, the item is out of the bill for the present, and I hope it will not be placed in the bill by the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, the presentation of this bill by a committee united as to all of its items again emphasizes the unity of the American people and the Congress of the United States behind the President of the United States and his administration in the prosecution of this war to a final and conclusive victory. [Applause.]

This bill is brought in on the theory that we do not propose in the slightest degree to let up in our preparation for the continuation of the conflict until we have been victorious all along the line; that it is the will and judgment of the American people, as represented in this House, that there shall be no parley, that there shall be no armistice, that will give the enemy an opportunity to withdraw in force behind stronger lines in order that in a future day he may confront us with all of his forces augmented and defiant. It is presented on the theory that the western battle front, that fateful battle line on which hangs the hope of freedom and ordered liberty, shall continue to be a fighting line provided with every needed facility in abundance until we have driven the enemy back to his own territory, captured or destroyed his armies, and brought him to unconditional surrender. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating a resolution dealing with the reconstruction problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by incorporating a resolution dealing with reconstruction work. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is this a resolution that is pending before the House?

Mr. LONDON. A very brief resolution that I introduced some two weeks ago.

Mr. WALSH. There is no need of printing in the RECORD resolutions that are introduced. That is not customary. The resolution is printed in resolution form. I shall object to printing it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE MEEKER.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great regret that I rise to announce the death of our colleague, Hon. JACOB EDWIN MEEKER, of Missouri, who died early this morning at St. Louis. At some future time I shall ask the House to set aside a day upon which his colleagues may address the House upon his life and character. I now offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 445.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JACOB EDWIN MEEKER, a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That a committee of 20 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as the committee on the part of the House Mr. RUCKER, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. BORLAND, Mr. BOOHER, Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. HAMLIN, Mr. DICKINSON, Mr. RUBEY, Mr. HENSLEY, Mr. IGOE, Mr. DECKER, Mr. ROMJUE, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, Mr. DYER, Mr. RODENBERG, Mr. KNUTSON, Mr. WALSH, Mr. PURNELL, and Mr. MILLER of Washington.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 17, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SHERLEY: A bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

By Mr. GARD: A bill (H. R. 13087) providing for the taxation of articles of commerce in the production of which child labor is employed; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LONDON: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 55) defining the meaning of victory; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 13088) granting an increase of pension to Augustus G. Weissert; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ESCH: A bill (H. R. 13089) granting an increase of pension to William McFarlin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GARD: A bill (H. R. 13090) granting a pension to Julia M. Little; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13091) granting an increase of pension to Oscar Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. IGOE: A bill (H. R. 13092) granting a pension to Margaret E. Leonard; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OSBORNE: A bill (H. R. 13093) granting a pension to Samuel R. Hall; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH: A bill (H. R. 13094) granting a pension to Annie Casey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARY: Petition of the Catholic Young Men's Literary Society, protesting against the zone system as applied to periodical postage rates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CURRY of California: Petition of George W. Ashley and certain other farmers of Lodi, San Joaquin County, Cal., against extending the time for setting the clock ahead one hour beyond October 27, and stating reasons therefor; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee: Petition of citizens of Tennessee urging better care of our soldiers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Resolution of the Philadelphia Bourse, protesting against any change in the present daylight-saving law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 17, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray Thee to write Thy law upon our hearts and in our minds. Do Thou place in us Thine own thought, Thine own will, that we may render Thee loving obedience, that we may be glad to do Thy will. Let Thy loving favor rest upon us this day. Grant, we pray, that we may see and feel the onward spirit of the mighty God of righteousness and of truth, and that we may feel the inspiration of having a part with God in the establishment of the high ideals of a Christian civilization in the earth. We pray Thee to stay the ravages of this dread disease that has spread itself over all our land. Hasten the day, we pray Thee, for deliverance by the care and confidence of those who put their trust in Thee, that there may be an end of the disease, and out of it we may have learned that obedience and that trust which make us perfect. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., October 17, 1918.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD, a Senator from the State of Alabama, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

WILLARD SAULSBURY,
President pro tempore.

Mr. BANKHEAD thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday last, when, on request of Mr. KENYON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DISASTER AT MORGAN MUNITION PLANT.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, out of order I offer a resolution and ask that it be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 317) was read, as follows:

Whereas the recent disaster at the Morgan munitions plant, near Perth Amboy, N. J., October 4 and 5, resulted in the loss of scores of lives, the destruction of millions of dollars' worth of property belonging to the United States and to private owners, and the rendering homeless of thousands of citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate be, and it is hereby, instructed to make an inquiry into the causes which brought about said catastrophe, whether by accident or work of alien enemies or agents thereof; what precautions had been taken to prevent such an accident; what plans have been adopted, if any, with a view to the rebuilding of the plant upon a safer basis; what measures have been determined upon, if any, toward the protection of similar munition plants elsewhere.

Resolved further, That said Committee on Military Affairs be authorized and directed to subpœna witnesses and compel their attendance, to send for persons and papers, and to do such further acts as may be necessary to secure any and all information desired in the furtherance of this inquiry, and that a report of the finding of such committee shall, upon its conclusion, be made to the Senate not later than December 6, 1918.

Resolved further, That the sum of $5,000 be appropriated from the contingent fund of the Senate to cover the expenses incident to this inquiry.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I simply wish to state that while under the rules the resolution will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but such a very serious situation exists in the area around these munitions plants at the present time that no delay should exist in passing this resolution. The explosion killed over 150 people and damaged property within an area of 50 or 60 miles. It rendered homeless about 10,000 people, who for several days were refugees along the road. The explosion continued for about two days. Seventy-five hundred pounds of trinitrolithuol were blown up. Before the explosion the mayor of New York City ordered the subways closed, fearful of the result. The effect of the explosion was seen in New York City, nearly 40 miles away.

At the present time there are several other magazines at this plant containing 150,000 pounds and one containing 600,000 pounds of trinitrolithuol. Should an accident occur with the existing amount of explosives, it would not only mean the destruction of property within an area of 50 miles but within an area of 100 miles, and undoubtedly would seriously affect New York City as well.

The people there are in a state of terror. They are living outside of their homes. Two or three days ago there were 60 bodies in the morgue unburied because they had not coffins and the facilities for burying them. The situation at the present time should be investigated, and if this large amount of explosives is not properly safeguarded, if it is not properly distributed, and should another explosion occur, it would mean more destruction of life and property.

The object of the resolution is simply to have the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs make an inquiry to ascertain what the War Department is going to do. The Gillespie Co., who are running this plant, seem to ignore the fear and the protest of the people in that locality.

I hope the Committee on Contingent Expenses will make a prompt report in order that the resolution may go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so referred.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Under the circumstances I think I will ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule the resolution must be referred. That is required by statute.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer:

H. R. 10609. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the present Federal building site at Eatonton, Ga., for another site on the public square in said city; and

H. J. Res. 331. Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN. I present a communication from Hon. John W. Lacey, of Cheyenne, Wyo., expressing views relative to Germany's peace proposals, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHEYENNE, WYO., October 10, 1918.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It has occurred to me that the increasing victories of the allied armies may cause Germany to offer to retire within her own borders if permitted to do so peacefully, with a view to asking for an armistice under the President's answer to Germany's recent proposition.

Under the President's statement, coupled with what was said in his former statement as to Alsace-Lorraine, I think it within the suggestions of his recent answer that Alsace-Lorraine shall be considered a part of the invaded territory, and that the condition upon which the President will discuss an armistice requires retirement from Alsace-Lorraine the same as all other invaded territory. Any other construction than this would enable Germany to put us in an embarrassing position by the offer to retire within her own territories.

Yours, very truly, JOHN W. LACEY.

Mr. WARREN. I present a telegram from Hon. N. H. Loomis, general council, Union Pacific Railroad Co., of Omaha, Nebr., expressing views regarding Germany's peace proposals, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OMAHA, NEBR., October 14, 1918.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Nothing less than unconditional surrender will satisfy loyal people of this part of the country.

N. H. LOOMIS.

Mr. WARREN presented a memorial of the Johnson County Chapter of the American Defense Society, of Buffalo, Wyo., and a telegram in the nature of a memorial from sundry citizens of Riverton, Wyo., remonstrating against the negotiation of peace with the German Government, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOHNSON COUNTY CHAPTER OF THE AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY (INC.),
Buffalo, Wyo., October 9, 1918.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution has been adopted by the Johnson County Chapter, American Defense Society, and I have been instructed to forward a copy to you that you may know the sentiment of the members of our chapter:

Whereas Germany and her allies have recently made peace proposals; and

Whereas it is the unanimous opinion of the members of the Johnson County Chapter, American Defense Society, that said peace proposals are not sincere, but for the purpose of slowing up the military effort at the front and at home, and for the further purpose of hindering the fourth liberty loan and decreasing subscriptions: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to considering Germany's present peace proposals or any other except unconditional surrender.

Very respectfully, WILSON MCBRIDE, President.
R. O. WATKINS, Secretary.

RIVERTON, WYO., October 13, 1918.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of our entire community, which is 100 per cent patriotic, we extend congratulations upon war successes to date. We respectfully urge that no peace negotiations be considered until absolutely unconditional surrender of the enemy armies is accomplished and our victorious troops enter Berlin.

J. S. Delfelder, mayor; W. Nicholson, vice chairman Council of Defense; George F. Dobler, president American Red Cross; Mrs. Ray McLaughlin, president Women's Patriotic League; C. Wimpenny, president One Hundred Per Cent American Club; John T. Botsford, secretary Commercial Club.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of Local Grange No. 280, Patrons of Husbandry, of Morenci, Mich., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of the Vigilance Corps of the American Defense Society (Inc.), of Hamilton, Mont., praying for the suppression of newspapers printed in the German language, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ASHURST (for Mr. THOMPSON) presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the president of the Kansas City Branch of the Railway Mail Association of Kansas, praying for the passage of the McKellar retirement bill for aged Government employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. THOMPSON) presented a memorial from the Woman's Club of Seneca, Kans., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the census bill for the protection of civil-service appointments, which was referred to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. NELSON presented the memorial of William Danforth, of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on municipal, State, and county bonds, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of William A. Anderson, of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on oil, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Moline Plow Co., of St. Louis Park, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on automobiles, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4857) authorizing an Army account of advances for Army appropriations, and other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 592) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13037) to amend the fiftieth article of war, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 593) thereon.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12998) to amend section 3528 of the Revised Statutes, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, which was agreed to.

CORINNE LOWE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 313, submitted by himself on the 10th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Corinne Lowe, sister of James W. Lowe, late a carpenter in the employ of the United States Senate under the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4992) granting rations to Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps; and

A bill (S. 4993) to provide for the taking over, improvement, relocation, construction, and maintenance of a system of National highways and State highways, designed to facilitate the movement of troops, equipment, munitions, and supplies, and to promote the general welfare of the people of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 4994) granting an increase of pension to John J. Cassin; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4995) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1917; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4996) granting an increase of pension to Joseph L. Williams (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEWIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO REVENUE BILL.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit three several amendments intended to be proposed by me to the pending revenue bill (H. R. 12863), which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments are as follows:

On page —, line —, insert the following:

"Provided, That for income-tax purposes, in so far as the assessments of normal tax and surtax are concerned, a husband and wife shall be regarded as 'one person,' and their 'combined' income shall be reported on one income-tax return, and that the surtax shall be collected on the combined income of both."

On page —, line —, insert the following:

"Provided further, That the foregoing provision relating to the compensation of officials and individuals employed by a corporation shall be retroactive for the calendar year of 1917 in every case where the Secretary of the Treasury finds that the official or individual has been paid an unreasonably high compensation during the said year for the purpose of evading the payment of the revenue tax provided for by law."

On page —, line —, insert the following:

"Provided further, That for the purpose of determining the taxable income of a corporation the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to fix a reasonable compensation for officials and individuals employed by said corporation, which in no event shall be more than 50 per cent in excess of the average compensation paid to each of them severally during the years 1914, 1915, and 1916."

APPROVAL OF THE PRESIDENT'S WAR POLICIES.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a resolution, which I ask to have read, and, for reasons, I ask that it may lie on the table at this particular time rather than go to any committee.

The resolution (S. Res. 318) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Senate approves whatever course may be taken by the President of the United States in the matter of his replies and in his dealings with the German Imperial Government and the Austrian Imperial Government and the allies of either, or both, in response to the demand of either for peace or armistice: And be it further

Resolved, That the Senate, having complete and full confidence in the discretion, judgment, and patriotism of the President, indorses and approves whatever methods he may employ to achieve the result of victorious peace and the establishment of the principles for which the United States of America entered the war, and indorses such determination as he shall reach as to the manner best calculated to preserve the dignity of the Nation and its complete vindication in the contest between the United States and its associates in the war between these and the Imperial German Empire and its allies.

PRODUCTION AND IMPORTATION OF POTASH.

Mr. WALSH. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 319) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission be, and it hereby is, directed to transmit to the United States Senate any information it may have concerning the present and the prospective production of potash within the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction, the present sources of supply, and the importations thereof; also the present consumption of potash in the United States, itemizing the commodities into which it enters and the prospective demand for it upon the conclusion of the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana why he asks the Tariff Commission to furnish the information?

Mr. WALSH. I ask the Tariff Commission to furnish it because my information is that it has made a special investigation of the particular subject.

Mr. SMOOT. The Bureau of Mines has made a thorough investigation of the subject, and I think has already made a report upon it. I believe the Interior Department, outside of the Bureau of Mines, has made a thorough investigation of it. I do not know whether that report has been prepared or not. It seems to me it is entirely outside of the functions of the Tariff Commission to find out where potash is located in the United States.

Mr. WALSH. I can not see how the Senator can take that view of it. The Tariff Commission is obliged to inquire into all these matters and collect information concerning them. At some time or other we are going to deal with this matter, and possibly consider the question of a duty upon the importations of potash or the removal of the duty upon the importations of potash, and unquestionably the Tariff Commission is investigating the subject. I understand it has been doing so. I do not see why we should not have the information from any source from which the information is available.

Mr. SMOOT. The Tariff Commission certainly have no appropriation made to investigate where potash is located, and whatever information they will give I take it for granted will come from the Geological Survey.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or the Agricultural Department. We made an appropriation some 12 months ago to enable the Agricultural Department to put up a plant and test out the practicability of bringing to a commercial basis the potash contained in certain plants on the Pacific coast. We also authorized the testing out of potash in quite a large body of water not far from the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. SMOOT. That report has been presented to the Senate and states exactly what, in the opinion of the Agricultural Department, can be the production of potash in this country.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this is virtually a duplication, and I can not see why this information should be asked of the Tariff Commission. The only report that they could give would be figures furnished by the Geological Survey or the Agricultural Department or the Bureau of Mines. They certainly have no power to make the investigation themselves.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I can not see why the Senator should object to the resolution, or even offer any opposition to it. I do not think that all the information asked for by the resolution is available either in the Agricultural Department or the Geological Survey. I am asking particularly in the resolution for the commercial aspect of potash. I want to know how much of this commodity is utilized by this country, what the consumption is, what the demand is, and what are the sources of supply.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia rose.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not want the Senator to understand that I am objecting to the resolution or to any information which may be obtained. I was just wondering whether he knew that the Tariff Commission has any information, and I meant to call attention to a certain line of work we had done in the Committee of Agriculture of the Senate, together with the Agricultural Department. I feel a deep interest in the subject, and I would be delighted to get information from any source. Can the Senator indicate to us that he has reason to believe the Tariff Commission have some information on the subject? I take it that he has or he would not have introduced the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. I have information. As a matter of course, they have been interested in this subject in its every aspect, and particularly in reference to the commercial feature. The Agricultural Department, as a matter of course, has in mind the sources of supply; but in all probability it has not in mind the prospective sources of supply. The Geological Survey has; but the Geological Survey has no particular information obtainable from its own sources concerning importations, concerning the possibilities of sources of supplies abroad other than the German sources of supply.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution may go over for a day. I want to see what information there is on the subject already available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under the rule.

PROPOSAL OF PEACE WITH THE GERMAN PEOPLE.

Mr. GORE. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 320) was read, as follows:

Whereas the President in his latest note to the German Government stated that it is within the choice of the German nation to place itself in a situation to negotiate peace "if peace is to come by the action of the German people themselves": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate advise the President as to its readiness to consent to a treaty concluding a just and acceptable peace made with "the German people themselves" in accordance with the methods proposed by the President.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will not discuss the resolution at this time, but will merely have printed in the RECORD certain statements which I have previously made on the subject. I may explain that I offer the resolution to follow up the one which I offered on Monday last, on account of the change in the situation which has occurred in the meantime. That resolution was designed to advise the President that it was the sense of the Senate that the treaty concluding the present war should be made with the peoples of Germany and Austria-Hungary through representatives chosen by the people for that purpose and not through representatives of the present autocracy. It was intended to apply to Germany the precedent which Germany established in 1871, when the conquering German Army required the French people to elect a national assembly for the purpose of negotiating peace. The President, however, in his note to the German Government on Monday last stated that it was "within the choice of the German nation" to render possible "a peace made by the action of the German people themselves."

The resolution I now offer is designed to advise the President of the Senate's readiness to ratify a treaty made with the German people themselves in accordance with the terms and methods which he proposed. In this instance the method is vital, is fundamental. I ask that the resolution lie on the table for the present, and that the statements referred to by me be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From Washington Herald, Wednesday, Oct. 16, 1918.]

GORE RESOLUTION AID TO WILSON—PROVIDES WAYS AND MEANS TO PEACE ASKED BY HIM.

The National Capital awoke to-day to a realization of the certainty and nearness of the end of the Hohenzollern and Hapsburg dynasties, as a result of the masterly moves of the United States in concert with the allies.

The impression has deepened among observers both in and out of Congress that the German and Austrian people are on the verge of seizing the opportunity of extricating themselves from the position to which their imperial rulers have brought them by utterly destroying the powers responsible for their plight.

In harmony with the President's attitude of helping the German people to realize their aspirations of democracy, Senator GORE, of Oklahoma, has introduced a resolution definitely pointing the way.

Senator GORE'S resolution provides the method and the machinery for carrying out the plain and unmistakable intimation of the President conveyed in his message intended for the ears of the German people. The resolution, in part, provides:

"Resolved, That the Senate respectfully advise the President that it is the sense of the Senate that the treaty concluding the present war, and requiring the consent of the Senate, should be made with the peoples concerned, through representatives duly elected for that purpose and empowered to conduct such negotiations by them in the name and by the authority of the peoples of Germany and Austria-Hungary."

It further advocates the vigorous and uninterrupted prosecution of the war until such a democratic peace is made certain. The Oklahoma Senator intends to press his resolution and suggests that it should be Germany's first lesson in democracy.

Said Senator GORE:

"In 1871, the conquering Germans required the French people to elect a national assembly for the purpose of negotiating peace. This German precedent could be commended to-day by even-handed justice to German observance. I introduced my resolution in accordance with this precedent.

"It provides the method and machinery for carrying out the President's intimation. I am glad the President laid the ax at the root of the tree that bears such evil fruit. I am glad he touched with the spear of Arthurial, the head of the squatting toad that was whispering foul suggestions in the ear of democracy."

VIEWS OF SENATOR GORE ON THE PRESIDENT'S ANSWER TO THE GERMAN PEACE NOTE—FULL TEXT OF INTERVIEW.

The President cleft the heart of autocracy when he said, "This it is within the choice of the German nation to do." This means the substitution of democracy for autocracy. This means the passing of the Hohenzollerns. I concluded long ago that the coming of peace should be marked by the passing of the Hapsburgs and the Hohenzollerns. These houses are the survivals of a dead past. Like slavery, autocracy has outlived its time and its expectancy. It has survived the environment that made it possible, that made it inevitable. Shall we now let autocracy follow that environment to the grave or shall we recreate that environment in order to perpetuate autocracy? The world is now casting the wrinkled skin of despotism. These dynasties should take their place in the mausoleum of tyrannies alongside the Bourbons, the Stewarts, and the Romanoffs. This should happen not as a mere matter of revenge, not as a mere matter of retribution, but it should happen as a pledge of the world's peace and to rid men's minds of the hideous nightmare of war. Germany has been like one possessed of a demon. The casting of this evil spirit will be of service to all peoples everywhere, and not least to the people of Germany themselves.

The Hohenzollerns have deified force and might well become the victim of their infuriate deity. The extinction of these houses would mark the passing of the despot's dogma that kings rule by a right divine, would mark the passing of the deadly doctrine that might makes right, would mark the passing of that perverse, that frightful philosophy that the moral law is not binding upon states and nations. In creed this is moral nihilism; in deed this is international anarchism.

The Kaiser once inscribed in the Visitors' Book of the Town Hall at Munich that "the will of the emperor is the supreme law." We should help the German people to learn the truth that will make them free, that the will of a free, just, and enlightened people ought to be the supreme law of the land. In 1871 the conquering Germans required the French people to elect a national assembly for the purpose of negotiating peace. The German precedent could be commended by even-handed justice to German observance. I introduced a resolution on Monday in accordance with this precedent, declaring it to be the sense of the Senate that the treaty of peace concluding the present war should be made with the peoples of Germany and Austria-Hungary through representatives chosen by the people for the purpose of negotiating such a treaty. This should be the German's first lesson in democracy. It points out the method for carrying out the President's intimation. The President laid the ax at the root of the tree of evil. I am glad that the President touched with the spear of Arthurial the head of the squatting toad that was whispering foul suggestions in the ear of democracy.

[Extract from interview by Senator GORE in Daily Oklahoman, Sept. 24, 1918.]

In these times of tragedy personalities are nothing, principles are everything.

While our brave boys are carrying democracy and its blessings to the rest of the world we must conserve democracy and its blessings for them. The right of free thought, free speech, and free conscience is what they are carrying to the oppressed millions of the earth.

There is no room in the Democratic Party for one who is disloyal and who is opposed to winning the war. No man can be a friend of mine who is not loyal and who is not in favor of winning the war. The happiest day in history will be the one that announces that Germany has gone democratic, and that our American heroes have carried the Potsdam precinct.

[Extract from interview by Senator GORE in the New York American, Oct. 14, 1918.]

Is it a new face that Germany is turning toward the American people, or is it the same old face behind a mask?

I am not certain that the American people under present circumstances would be satisfied with anything less than the passing of the Hohenzollerns. We want a peace, not a truce. If Germany by the manner she pursued of gaining publicity for her peace maneuver sought to weaken the morale of the country, it is merely an added instance of misreading the minds of our people. I think the reaction will be distinctly injurious to Germany. We do not seek the rude justice known as revenge, but we do want to insure the peace of the future.

Senate resolution 316.

Whereas the Constitution authorizes the President to make "treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"; and

Whereas it is the constitutional function and duty of the Senate to advise with the President in the making of treaties; and

Whereas the victorious Germans in 1871 required the French people to elect a national assembly for the purpose of negotiating peace: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate respectfully advise the President that it is the sense of the Senate that the treaty concluding the present war and requiring the consent of the Senate should be made with the peoples concerned through representatives duly elected by them for that purpose and empowered to conduct such negotiations in the name and by the authority of the peoples of Germany and Austria-Hungary.

Resolved further, That the Senate favors the vigorous and uninterrupted prosecution of the war until a democratic, just, and acceptable peace is made certain, upon the terms approved by the President and faithful to the cobelligerents of the United States.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR THOMAS P. GORE AT THE LIBERTY LOAN MASS MEETING AT THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC, SUNDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 6, 1918.

Ladies and gentlemen, I trust that you will not permit me to disturb the train of your thoughts. [Laughter.] But for the warning just given this audience would be a splendid victim. President Jonas has already shown that he can work miracles in respect of raising money. He is now ambitious to work even a greater miracle and show that he can prevent a United States Senator from making a speech. [Laughter.] I am on the short shift. I wish to thank Chairman Jonas especially for the pleasure with which I listened to the song by Sergt. Berlin. This is an omen, I trust, that Berlin in Germany will soon be in the hands of the Americans. [Applause.]

I rise this evening not in the rôle of either an interesting or uninteresting speaker but merely as an interested spectator. I appear to testify that I am with you heart and soul. Ladies and gentlemen, before obeying orders I wish to congratulate you upon the mighty change which has come upon the world since I last had the pleasure of addressing you. When I addressed you in April last gloom hung like a mighty pall over the allied armies and over the allied peoples. Anxiety filled the minds of free men everywhere. The German drive was then at the height of its fury. The German hordes were advancing. The German advance seemed all but irresistible. Paris was in peril. Civilization was in danger. The destiny of the human race was then trembling in the balances. My countrymen, how changed is the situation to-day. Gloom has given place to sunshine. Anxiety has given place to high and confident hopes. The German advance has been turned into a German retreat, into a proposal for peace. The tide, the bloody tide, of battle has turned. Let us hope that this is the tide which, taken at the flood, will lead on, not to fortune but to victory and to peace. The future is now secure. Destiny is beckoning free men and free nations everywhere into the rich light of an ampler day. The American Army turned the tide. [Applause.] The American Army converted a retreat into a charge. An American general, ordered to retreat, sent back the heroic message that "The Stars and Stripes never retreat." [Applause.] Eight thousand American Marines saved the day at the Marne. [Applause.] Saved the day? Aye, and saved civilization itself. [Applause.] They saved civilization against a disaster how unspeakable no one can tell. The Athenian Army at Marathon, the Spartan band at Thermopylæ, did not render a greater service to civilization than did these Americans at the Marne.

Men that were girt for the combat,
Men that were grit to the core,
Swift as a panther in triumph,
Fierce as a bear in defeat;
Sired by a bulldog parent,
Steeled in the furnace heat—and yet the Kaiser said that the American boys could not or would not fight! [Applause.]

That reminds me of an English soldier who fell in with a crowd of American soldiers. He heard them using a phrase, not so elegant but a very common phrase—you will pardon me for repeating it—"Wouldn't that get your goat?" [Laughter.] Wouldn't that get your goat! This struck the English soldier as a very fashionable phrase, and he imagined that in order to show himself abreast of the times he must use this phrase on the first occasion. The next time he fell in with a number of American soldiers one of them, after an American victory, took occasion to remark, "So Kaiser Bill said that the American boys couldn't fight!" The Englishman seized the opportunity. "Ah," he says, "wouldn't that grab your nanny?" [Laughter.]

Ladies and gentlemen, let me say again the happiest day in all human history will be the day which announces that Germany has gone democratic [laughter and applause], and I hope that it may be the proud privilege of the American boys to carry the Potsdam precinct. [Laughter and applause.] But much remains to be conquered still. My friends, we do not want a truce that will break but a peace that will not break, a peace that will last, that will last as long as the grass grows, that will last as long as the water flows, and not a patched-up peace that will prove an incubator of future wars and future woes. Much remains to be conquered still. The winning of the war is still ahead of us; much hard fighting may lie ahead of us; many heavy sacrifices may still be ahead of us. This liberty loan must be a success; it will be a success. [Applause.] Remember, my friends, that when you buy a bond you serve your country, you serve your family, you serve yourself, and you serve the brave boys in the trenches. Remember that you may buy the bond that buys the bomb that beats the enemy. We may have to become more economic and thrifty. The truth is, we may be obliged to emulate the thrift of some of our soldiers in Europe. A colored corporal was standing on a platform one day and saw 40 carloads of watermelons go steaming by to an American camp. Somebody said, "Corporal, what you suppose they are going to do with all those watermelons?" He said, "Well, I guess they gwine to feed the darkies on the meat and they gwine to feed the Germans on the rind." [Laughter.]

A squad of colored soldiers were sitting in a dugout one day and a hurtling bomb came screaming along and crashed into the dugout, killing a number of them and mangling others. One of them crept out to the top to see if the world was still standing. One of his comrades had beaten him to the daylight and was moving around in the most excited state of mind. One who had just crept out said, "Nigger, what are you doing out there?" "Well," he said, "I'm looking for my arm." "Well," he says, "you fool nigger, if you was to find your arm you couldn't put it back again." He said, "I know I couldn't put it back again, but I want to get my wrist watch off of it." My friends, you can trust to men like that to stop the Kaiser's "Watch on the Rhine." [Applause.]

If you ask me when this war is to end I answer, I hope that it will end when America has paid her debt in full to prostrate, bleeding France. [Applause.] I answer, I hope that it will end when the Kaiser has been taught that his place in the sun is a spot in the sun, and when the world has been taught that this sun spot has been a plague spot, breeding wars and pestilence and famine. I answer, I hope this war will end when we have taught Prussian militarism once and for all that he that liveth by the sword shall also perish by the sword. [Applause.] I answer, when we have taught and convinced autocracy, have taught all that might aspire hereafter to autocracy, that they can not with impunity provoke the greatest democracy of the earth to wrath and to arms. Let me repeat: This war will end, I hope, when it has been made manifest that the "earth and everything that's in it" shall be the patrimony of those who exalt right above might and shall not be the prey of those who place their trust in iron shard and reeking tube, shall not become the prey of those who rely upon the mailed fists and upon embattled brutality, when it has been made manifest to all the sons and daughters of men that Christian civilization has been builded upon the eternal rock of justice, and that the gates of hell and the gates of Germany shall never prevail against it.

Ladies and gentlemen, I thank you. [Great applause.]

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. OWEN, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on October 16, approved and signed the act (S. 3438) to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress.

EDWARD STEWART.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1104) for the relief of Edward Stewart. It is a bill of about half a dozen lines. The beneficiary is 84 or 85 years old. There is a very strong report of the committee in favor of the passage of the bill, and if any relief is to be given he ought to get it soon.

Mr. SMOOT. From what committee was the bill reported?

Mr. JONES of Washington. From the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Edward Stewart shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company C, Second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, on the 31st day of March, 1863: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF W. H. SNEED, DECEASED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 469) for the relief of the heirs of W. H. Sneed, deceased.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the heirs of W. H. Sneed, deceased, the sum of $1,366.67, being for the use or rent of a building in Knoxville, Tenn., during the War of the Rebellion, and for which vouchers were given in lieu of payment by the United States quartermasters.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGES WROUGHT BY THE GREAT WAR.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is plain that we are now living in a world different from that in which we lived before the European war began. True, indeed, the same oceans break upon the same coasts, we tread the same soil, and the same unquenchable stars shed their blended radiance upon our pathway. Under the genial rays of the same sun, the warm seasons come, and summer is, as usual, supplanted by the less pleasing dress of winter; but the world is, nevertheless, altered; its problems are different; they are more complex, more difficult.

Economic and social questions that we once deemed settled, and things we once believed to be permanent, have either been burned away by the flash of gunfire or have suffered a severe shifting in the glacial grinding of the mighty forces unloosed four years ago. Gigantic events of world-wide importance now tread upon one another's heels, so fast do they follow.

When the eruptions of the great war poured their scorching scoria upon the United States, we beheld a sudden transformation of values here; we saw people who were traveling unobstructed roads suddenly halted; we saw others who were engrossed in safe ambitions and comfortable successes interrupted; and, in the very midst of their laughter and pleasure, we saw the mysterious finger of duty here and there touch the young men of our land and mark them for stern and mighty tasks. These young men uncomplainingly laid aside their gainful occupations, their comforts of home, their diversions and amusements, and with a heroism and an energy worthy of the best days of the Republic they bounded forward to defend liberty and civilization. We saw these same young men on land, on sea, and in the sky visualize and conceive so complete a realization of the justice and grandeur of the American cause that their patriotic enthusiasm is the admiration of all civilized men. I do not hesitate to assert that never before was there a war where the patriotism, valor, idealism, and sacrifice of the soldier mounted higher or shone with a purer and whiter flame than that which beams from America's heroic sons now on the red line of battle, fighting not only that we of to-day but that our remote posterity as well may live the lives of free people.

For a considerable period of time before the shuttle of flying shells wove that metal fabric now suspended between the contending armies in Europe, there was a widespread belief that the American, as a rule, had become soft and flabby. Reflecting for a moment upon prewar conditions, we recall that in material resources we were the richest of all the nations; we enjoyed guaranteed personal liberties and rights not possessed by any other people; we held traditions of state building, romance of origin, wealth of fields, forests, and mines unknown elsewhere; we possessed unexcelled opportunities and a population unsurpassed in versatility and optimism.

During the three decades immediatley preceding the war we had enjoyed the greatest era of prosperity ever vouchsafed to any people. Life was made easy for multitudes of persons. Automobiles whirred across the land, and the joyrider, with senile grin, looked out upon the workman delving in the earth. Places of amusement, always open, entertained millions of young men and women whose forbears usually spent evenings in cottage industry or in burning the midnight oil exploring histories and philosophies for truths that make peoples just and nations strong.

The past four years have been years of storm, of "climbing fire and quartering steel," and only the unpretending simpleton now fails to perceive that the American people will not and can not return to prewar conditions when our task on the field of honor shall have been fully performed; for it is a sacred duty we owe not only to our honored dead now sleeping on foreign battle fields but to the entire Nation as well to see to it that the ideals of justice, patriotism, sacrifice, humanity, and liberty, to which this great war remanded us, shall remain as monuments to those who sacrificed themselves in the war and as heralds of eternity for the life of the Republic.

When the European war flamed forth we were fast reaching a posture where self-denial was no longer one of our national virtues, and we lived in a fool's paradise, smug and conceited.

There was in the blood but little of the spirit of the great days of the past—the great days when Washington surveyed a wilderness; Decatur thrashed the Barbary States; Perry sent his famous "We-have-met-the-enemy" message; Lincoln mauled rails; and Crockett, Travis, and Bowie went their way of duty, death, and glory. What we dreaded most was poverty. As a people, we had grown soft handed and refused to seize the nettles of life and boldly crush them. Instead of acknowledging with gratitude the immense obligations we Americans owed to our ancestors for the blessings of the beneficent laws, political polity, and institutions they bequeathed to us, we stridently called for more help and sustenance from the Government, and we believed the Government should earn a living for us. Those persons whose lives were cast in easy and comfortable places, who spread tables to Lucullus and spent in a single evening, for highly seasoned foods and wines, sums of money sufficient to ransom a king, were utterly unable to comprehend why the hungry ones should be so unreasonable as to complain when the gormandized ones had just put a square meal into well-groomed paunches. In prewar times we did not know, or had forgotten rather, that preparedness for peace and preparedness for war meant, amongst other things, an equitable distribution of that upon which people must subsist; meant a fair field to all and no favors to any. As we drifted along, now and then premonitory signals and warnings were flashed upon us, but we were too busy erecting shrines in Mammon's temple and having a good time to give more than intermittent and casual attention to the red-lantern danger signals.

In 1912 a leader appeared in America, and he so clearly demonstrated his ability to recognize and interpret facts and symptomatic events that he was elected President of the United States; and on March 4, 1913, there commenced under his leadership a stupendous effort to remand us to the forum of duty and of sacrifices that make a nation great. How well this leader, Woodrow Wilson, has succeeded, let the world testify!

He has taught our youth fine scruples, noble impulses, and the stern virtues of obedience. He has taught the individual citizen that the United States is a Nation, and he has endowed us with a reservoir of faith in the future of our country, which thus enables us to look hopefully toward the days to come. He has not sought applause, but has searched diligently for the truths that lead a nation to eternal life. This great American leader has been able to perceive this war not only with the remote view of a historian, but has been able also to discover what anterior facts caused a particular event, and able to foresee what events, in turn, it will bring forth. He possesses, like the eye of the airplane, the power visually to assemble detached units in our national life into a complemented and interrelated whole; he then deploys the units where they must serve the common good. His is the great intellect and courage that has been able to puncture the fortified sophistries of special privileges to a favored few. He sees a duty and performs it. He will not be swerved nor turned aside by oratory, threats, sarcasm, or dread of failure.

Under Wilson's leadership our country has resumed her historic position as the beautiful exemplar and noble pioneer in the vanguard of human liberty, for we are now living over again the sublime days of John Hancock, Ben Franklin, Hamilton, and Jefferson; the days of "Hickory" Jackson, of Lincoln, Grant, and Lee. Wilson has shown the world that it is better to pour forth one's long-enduring strength for the vindication of human justice than to keep a full pocketbook; and he convinced the Sixty-fifth Congress of the necessity of extirpating, root and branch, the German military autocracy which gambled away its plighted faith with other nations, and then sprang with tiger-like ferocity upon an unsuspecting and unoffending world, from motives of fancied revenge and for the lust of gain. And shall the American people now in this crisis be found shackling, burdening, and harassing this leader with a divided Congress, or a Congress dominated by bitter partisans? No; the people will sustain him by choosing a Congress that will assist him in his vast labors. When the stupendous drama of war shall have passed—aye, even before it passes—there will be before us tasks of reconstruction—I have already pointed out we can not return to the prewar days—tasks of settling, and correctly settling, the imminent questions of armament, land distribution, taxation, transportation, reclamation of lands, improvement of highways, foreign trade, manufacturing, and the complex and ever-present problem of seeing to it that those who toil shall have an opportunity for the enjoyment of the fruits of their labor. For example, Mr. President, to show the complexity and character of the problems that will follow the war, there are to-day in the Army and Navy 3,000,000 men, with the prospect of twice that number within six months. They are the best of the Nation's man power. Will positions and employment be found for them when they come back? If so, how and where? These are vital questions that can not be hurdled by an epigram. They must be met.

Consider that at the end of the war the United States will have the largest merchant marine of all the nations. Shall these ships be sold or kept? Shall the Government continue to own and operate them? Are they to compete for the markets of the world? For whose benefit shall this vast merchant fleet cleave the tumbling billows?

Again, for example, for years the railway commissioners of the various States and the Interstate Commerce Commission tried to fix rates in the interest of the shipper and consumer, giving consideration to the rights of the investor by a "fair return on replacement value." Under Government control, higher rates have been fixed. A return on investment has been guaranteed. If the railroads are to be returned to private management, will these higher rates be carried over? Will the original owners get the benefit of money saved through the elimination of competition under Government management? Will the money revert to the Government or to the shippers? On the other hand, is a reversion to prewar conditions desirable? Were the present centralization to be continued, should the Government buy, lease, or merely manage the properties? It would be impossible to magnify the importance of these questions. They are problems running to the very roots of our national life.

Wisdom, experience, and tested ability must be called to Congress to reach a correct solution.

A dozen or more equally as important problems could easily be mentioned, but these I have mentioned will serve as illustrations of the magnitude of the task of reconstruction that will be faced by the next Congress. Shall we assist or shall we obstruct President Wilson in these duties of setting matters aright? No; we will not obstruct, for the American people well remember that President Wilson is the wisest statesman of his day; the American people well remember that where President Wilson, with clear lenses, horoscoped and interpreted events, his partisan critics confusedly recognized the event only long after it happened, and even then the partisan critics of the President saw the event, not clearly but through blurred and indistinct lenses. Where President Wilson acted with precision and correctly pointed the way his partisan critics stood like large locomotives on a sidetrack, without driving rods, and wasted their steam in vociferous and futile sibilation.

With our ships we have sent food and clothes for our soldiers' bodies, weapons for their hands, and medicines and bandages for their wounds; but we must continue to do that which is equally as important—we must sustain their high spirits by constant assurances of our solidarity here at home. The election of a Congress out of harmony with the President would be serving notice upon Germany that we were divided at home.

American soldiers are valorously driving back the German dragon. Let us, therefore, not be found refusing to give these soldiers the full strength of our support; let us not be found giving aid and comfort to the enemy by shackling their American Commander in Chief with a Congress upon which he can not depend or which is not in harmony with his efforts.

Upon this question we may all rest content. The Nation is aroused as to the necessity of supporting the President, and the people will see to it that Wilson shall not be handicapped, as was Washington by the Tories and by Gates and Conway, as was Madison by the "Blue Lighters," as was Polk by the Little Americans, and as was Lincoln by the Copperheads.

NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I intend at the conclusion of the consideration of the present unfinished business to ask to call up the Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 121) now on the calendar with reference to the establishment of a commission to report to Congress on a budget system. I wish to take this opportunity to present a few remarks on that question; and preliminary thereto, I ask to have an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post.]

THE NEXT CONGRESS.

This war will end, but these war taxes will not. They will be reduced, but will never get back to within hailing distance of the prewar figure. Besides the war debt, a heavy increase in Federal taxation will be a permanent legacy. That is certain. No American Congress will ever again deal with an annual budget under a billion.

This Congress in two years has appropriated more than forty billions on an archaic scheme. It has shown no interest in supplanting that scheme by a rational and comprehensive plan for dealing with national finances.

Candidates for the next Congress will talk about a good many issues. They can be made to talk and think about that issue by demonstrations of public concern over it—but not otherwise.

A few energetic men in every congressional district can get a pledge that the subject of a national budget system—with what that term rationally implies—shall be given honest, serious consideration by the next Congress. A demonstration of public concern would force the present Congress to treat the subject seriously.

At present, in view of the wasteful methods at the Capitol, Congress is in the position of a crossroads grocer who stands in his doorway exhorting a crowd to practice economy while the vinegar barrel is leaking all over the floor and mice are eating the cheese in plain sight of the audience.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I merely want to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa. I have heard the Senator from Iowa discuss this budget question a number of times, but I am not certain whether or not he has ever made a statement to the Senate of his idea of the exact executive and legislative procedure that would be necessary under that system. If the Senator has done so, of course I would not want him to repeat; but if not, I think it would be very enlightening to the Senate if he would describe in plain terms exactly what legislative changes in the matter of appropriations would be produced and the methods of operation of the system.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that I had intended to do that very thing at this moment. That is why I secured the floor.

Mr. President, there is a demand practically everywhere but in Congress for a change in the present method of appropriations.

The lack of any plan in Congress in the making of appropriations has led to inefficiency, extravagance, and waste.

Now of all times, should we take steps to formulate some method whereby there may be economy in appropriations and expenditure thereof without lessening efficiency. It is time to conserve the money of the Nation; to make every dollar do a dollar's worth of work.

Business organizations, economists, thoughtful men throughout the United States, have been insisting for many years that there should be a change in our system and that we should adopt some form of a budget.

For this fiscal year the appropriations of the Government will be the most enormous of any nation in the world.

No one in this country is objecting to the expenditure of every dollar necessary to win the war.

The people willingly and cheerfully back every effort of the Government and will continue to do so. They have a right to demand that this money be appropriated, be spent, and be accounted for in some systematic, intelligent business way—that a public dollar shall do as much work as a private dollar.

Chairman SHERLEY in the House on July 15 placed the total of appropriations made by the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress at $29,791,241,773.67. To this must be added the following:

Urgent deficiency	$100,200,000
Agricultural stimulation	11,212,283
Mineral bill	10,500,000
New deficiency Army bill estimated at	7,000,000,000
Total	7,121,912,283

This would bring the total up to about $36,000,000,000.

No one doubts that there will likely be a deficiency during the year, and it is altogether probable that the appropriations, including contract authorizations and loans to the allies, will be around $40,000,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The results of this war will be worth all that it will cost. But it is folly in national life, as in private life, to waste; and no one can deny that there is tremendous waste in the way Government finances are handled.

I speak in no spirit of criticism of the administration. It is not to blame because some different system has not been established. The blame is squarely on Congress. It can not shift or deny responsibility.

ATTEMPTS FOR BUDGET REFORM.

The Democratic platform of 1916, with reference to economy and the budget, is as follows:

We demand careful economy in all expenditures for the support of the Government, and to that end favor a return by the House of Representatives to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee chosen from its membership in order that responsibility may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication in the public service as much as possible avoided. We favor this as a practicable first step toward a budget system.

The Republican platform condemned the wasteful appropriations of the Democratic administration and the Democratic opposition to and rejection of President Taft's offer to secure a businesslike budget system for the Government, "to which," says the Republican platform, "we pledge our support and which we hold to be necessary to affect any real reform in the administration of national finance."

Mr. Hughes in his speech of acceptance declared for the same thing.

The Progressive platform of 1916 also declared for it.

President Taft made an earnest effort to secure a change in the manner of carrying on Government finances. An inquiry was made under an appropriation from Congress into the operation of the various departments for the purpose of affecting changes.

A commission on economy and efficiency was organized. This commission performed splendid service.

President Taft on January 17, 1912, sent a message to Congress with relation to this subject, part of which is as follows:

The United States is the only great Nation whose Government is operated without a budget. This fact seems to be more striking when it is considered that budgets and budget procedures are the outgrowth of democratic doctrines and have had an important part in the development of modern constitutional rights. The American Commonwealth has suffered much from irresponsibility on the part of its governing agencies. The constitutional purpose of a budget is to make Government responsive to public opinion and responsible for its acts. A budget should be the means of getting before the legislative branch, before the press, and before the people a definite annual program of business to be financed; it should be in the nature of a prospectus, both of revenues and expenditures; it should comprehend every relation of the Government to the people, whether with reference to the raising of revenues or the rendering of service.

In February, 1913, President Taft's plan for a national budget was sent to Congress and has rested in the embalming vaults of Congress ever since. I have it here, but will not take time to read from it.

The President tried to proceed according to a plan providing for cooperation between the executive and legislative branches with reference to finance. No action was ever taken. Both Houses were hostile to the President. He went out of office a few days later and there was no chance for any action.

With the advent of President Wilson's administration it was hoped that there might be some reform along this line. World problems, however, came so quickly to the administration, and it has been so absorbed in these matters that probably no blame can be attached to it. President Wilson is known from his writings and from a letter, which I will refer to later, to favor some form of budget reform.

Mr. Fitzgerald, for many years chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, made a speech on June 24, 1913, on the floor of the House relative to the need for fiscal reform. I place in the RECORD extracts from his speech:

If the principle enunciated by Mr. Gladstone be accepted as sound, that the constitutional duty of a legislative chamber is not to augment but to decrease expenditure, the solution of all problems confronting us may be readily solved. A few simple changes in our system will completely establish the system of responsible executive control of our budget, while retaining complete control of the Treasury in the representatives of the people.

Again on February 6, 1915, when this question was being discussed in the House, Mr. Fitzgerald said:

One thing that is essential to accomplish in this body—and it will be done some day—is to deprive the individual Member of Congress of the right to initiate expenditures. * * * Take away from Members of this House the right to initiate expenditures, and they will examine and scrutinize and take care that no unsound or improper estimate originating in a department is rewarded by an appropriation.

President Wilson wrote to Senator Tillman on this subject January 30, 1913, as follows:

Ever since I was a youngster I have been deeply interested in our methods of financial legislation. Ever since then I have insisted upon the absolute necessity of a carefully considered and wisely planned budget, and one of the objects I shall have most in mind when I get to Washington will be conferences with my legislative colleagues there with a view to bringing some budget system into existence. This business of building up the expense of the Nation piece by piece will certainly lead us to error and perhaps embarrassment.

The President, in his annual message, delivered before a joint session of the House and Senate December 4, 1917, referred to this subject, and without reading it I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Quoted from the President's annual address delivered at a joint session of the House and Senate, Dec. 4, 1917. In the Official Bulletin, Dec. 4, 1917, p. 3.]

And I beg that the Members of the House of Representatives will permit me to express the opinion that it will be impossible to deal in any but a very wasteful and extravagant fashion with the enormous appropriations of the public moneys which must continue to be made, if the war is to be properly sustained, unless the House will consent to return to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee, in order that responsibility may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication as much as possible avoided.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have here statements along this line from business men, leaders in industry, in finance, in our economic life, writers, presidents of chambers of commerce, presidents of railroads, and former Cabinet officers, insisting that Congress should adopt some form of budget. I will not take time to read them, but I will ask that I may insert certain brief ones in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they may be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From The West at Work. Paul W. Brown, editor. St. Louis, June 21, 1917.]

SHALL WE CONSERVE REVENUE?

The Government is very properly conserving man power, food, ships, iron, and steel. Why not conserve revenue as well? The need of the hour is for a national budget system. Every successful private business cuts its coat according to its cloth and proportions its expenditures to each other, in full view of both its means and its needs. For 50 years our Government has had no machinery to do this. Now is the time to supply it. It is easier than food conservation, and just as needful.

NEVER NEEDED AS SORELY AS NOW.

[By John F. Shepley, president St. Louis Union Trust Co.]

* * * I consider this an opportune time for the adoption by the Federal Government of the budget system; I have no hesitation in saying that I do. * * * Our Government is making and contemplating the expenditure of sums of enormous size for purposes extraordinarily diverse and has never needed as sorely as now the aid of this system, without which the economical and judicious use of these funds is practically impossible. It is curious that a people so progressive and enlightened as our own should suffer its affairs to be administered in so haphazard and unscientific a manner.

HAPHAZARD METHODS INTOLERABLE.

[By J. F. Downing, president New England National Bank, Kansas City.]

I think it is high time that the people of the United States were demanding a budget system for the business of our Government. The haphazard methods now employed in making appropriations would not be tolerated in any well-organized business house in the United States. * * *

This plan will never be adopted unless the people demand it insistently, and I am sure every business man in the country feels that the time has arrived when there should be economy in the expenditures of the Government, and business methods employed the same as for individuals and corporations.

THE MINIMUM OF INEFFICIENCY.

[By C. E. Schaff, receiver M., K. & T. Ry.]

Aside from the business considerations which have always suggested a budget system for the Federal Government, special conditions urge the adoption of such a system now that we are engaged in a war which imposes heavy burdens. Government expenditures are certain to be tremendous during the war, and the load of taxation will be correspondingly heavy. The public is prepared to bear whatever burdens national necessities impose, but there is a special reason now that every department of Government be so organized as to discharge its functions with a minimum waste and inefficiency. A heavy burden of taxation speedily becomes irksome if public funds are not expended with practical economy. It therefore seems to me that the time is opportune for the establishment of a Federal budget system.

THE MOST EXTRAVAGANT GOVERNMENT.

[By S. E. Ragland, president Central-State National Bank, Memphis, Tenn.]

* * * This Government is in no way responsible for the holocaust that is bleeding Europe white, but since it has been forced to take a hand it has pledged its entire resources to an enterprise the proportions of which are staggering to contemplate. The ultimate end of this enterprise is a democracy in which men, women, and little children may be free in the pursuit of happiness; but let no man deceive himself about the burdens of taxation that he will have to shoulder in the future. It, therefore, is imperative that every citizen demand that his Representative in Congress immediately start the machinery for retrenchment in the expenses of the Government. Congress should at once provide for a Government budget.

We are ready and willing to be taxed to attain our great aims, but there must from now on be no lost motion in the application of these funds. Let us immediately adopt the budget system.

Mr. KENYON. Senator Aldrich some years ago startled the country by an announcement that the Government could be conducted for three hundred million a year less than it was being conducted. That was at a time when our appropriations ran at about one and one-half billions. In other words, there was one-fifth of waste, a loss due to inefficiency. No one doubted that statement.

If our expenditures for this fiscal year, outside of loans to the allies, should amount to twenty billion, at the same ratio as suggested by Senator Aldrich there could be a saving of some four billion dollars this year. That figure seems rather large, but certainly no one will doubt that there could be a saving of at least two billions of dollars. That means a per capita saving in the United States of at least $20. In other words, it is undoubtedly costing the people of the country to maintain the Government this year with the slipshod methods and lack of any financial policy at least $20 per capita more than it would under some businesslike method of affairs. Does anyone doubt this to be true? That is based upon present rate of expenditure. Of course after the war the figures of necessity would be different, the waste and extravagance being in proportion to amount spent.

II.

OUR SYSTEM.

There are 29 different committees in Congress which report bills affecting the finances of the Government. I ask to be permitted to insert the list at this point, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list referred to is as follows:

COMMITTEES IN CONGRESS WHICH REPORT BILLS AFFECTING THE FINANCES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

In the House:

1. Ways and Means.
2. Appropriations.
3. Agriculture.
4. Foreign Affairs.
5. Military Affairs.
6. Naval Affairs.
7. Post Office.
8. Indian Affairs.
9. Rivers and Harbors.
10. Invalid Pensions—Civil War.
11. Pensions—other wars.
12. District of Columbia.
13. Public Buildings and Grounds.
14. Claims—Private.
15. Claims—War.

In the Senate:

16. Finance.
17. Appropriations.
18. Commerce.
19. Agriculture and Forestry.
20. Military Affairs.
21. Pensions.
22. Indian Affairs.
23. Naval Affairs.
24. Post Office.
25. District of Columbia.
26. Public Buildings and Grounds.
27. Coast Defenses.
28. Claims.
29. Private Land Claims.

Mr. KENYON. The Secretary of the Treasury now is a mere clerk sending over from the various departments their estimates.

The Cabinet has nothing to do with the proceeding; no power to pass on the estimates.

There is no executive responsibility upon the President; the legislative branch prepares in detail the financial measures. What do they know as to the intricacies of the various departments? Bills are amended on the floor and changed in conference.

None of the committees consult with other committees as to the expenditures.

It is true auditors are appointed; but what reports does Congress ever have and what consideration does it ever give to the spending of the money? The whole thing is a financial farce. There is absolutely no financial policy. Our financial methods are no better than the methods used in running a peanut stand on the corner. We appropriate money as if there were no end to national resources. In time the steady pressure of the people who must pay the cost of government will force the American Congress to a change in its present system.

There is no coordination or cooperation. The auditing is done by the same department that spends the money.

III.

ADVANTAGES OF A BUDGET SYSTEM.

I shall refer in a moment or two to the budget system of England, which seems to be the best in the nature of a model for the rest of the world; but I want briefly to set forth some of the general advantages of a budget system.

(a) The finances of the Nation are considered as a unit. There is a constant picture showing the expenditures and revenues. There is a financial program. It produces equilibrium in that the expenditures of all the departments are considered with relation to each other and with the national income. It places responsibility upon the executive branch of the Government for initiating the budget. It places responsibility upon the legislative branch for the carrying out of the budget.

(b) It nationalizes public finance. That is the main advantage in it. The appropriations will be made for national purposes and not for local. The appropriations for creeks with practically no water and public buildings in little towns can not be made without the sanction of the respective departments.

An attempt to appropriate for a public building at Podunk must have the sanction of the Post Office Department. After that there would have to be the assent of the Treasury before the item would be put in the estimate. And it would be considered from the standpoint of the Nation and not how the appropriation might affect some votes. Members can not offer amendments increasing appropriations. We would be spared the ridiculous spectacle at the close of most appropriation bills of Members on their feet offering every kind of an amendment that may aid in local matters.

(c) It is a business program for the year. Everyone then can know the condition of the Nation's finances. Everything is in the open. There is no mystery about it. The public will take more interest in the finances of the Nation. The budget system makes for economy. Experts will have passed upon the items. Oratorical efforts in Congress can not raise them. The sums can not be increased.

In short, the budget system enables the Government to have a definite financial policy.

(d) Cabinet officials under the system must have a place upon the floor so they may be questioned as to the estimates for their respective departments.

We have seen within the last few weeks a bill before the Senate where questions regarding items were asked in vain. There was no one to reply. The Secretary of Agriculture should have been here, and would be under a budget system, to answer the questions.

Cabinet officers would not need to be Members of Congress, but it is essential that some provisions be made for the questioning of them upon the floor. Why should it not be? They already have the right to be upon the floor.

(e) Every budget system provides for a method of acccounting. This should be done by officers not connected with the departments spending the money—by officers appointed, as in England, at high salaries and absolutely free of politics and removable only by impeachment. The fact that Congress will criticize the estimates has a healthy effect upon their preparation. Departments have a wholesome respect for congressional criticism and investigation.

IV.

BRITISH SYSTEM.

The workings of the budget system in England are generally pointed to as the most successful method of handling national finances. Britain has a responsible ministry, which makes easier the working out of the budget. That is one of the difficulties of our system, in that we have no responsible ministry.

The cabinet there settles the financial policy covering both expenditures and the method of raising the money. The cabinet receives estimates from the chancellor of the exchequer for the civil departments, and from the first lord of the admiralty for the navy, and from the secretary of state for war for the army.

The responsibility for the preparation of the estimates, except for the army and navy, rests upon the treasury. The treasury consists of the chancellor of the exchequer, first lord of the treasury, and a number of minor lords. The chancellor of the exchequer, chief official of the treasury, presents the budget at the demand of the Crown. This is done as soon after the close of the fiscal year as possible.

Over 200 years ago the House of Commons adopted a rule that it would consider no motion putting a charge upon public revenue unless recommended by the executive. Items in the budget can not be increased. They may be diminished, but if a substantial item were diminished it would be a challenge to the Government and might result in the resignation of the cabinet or a going to the country for a vote of confidence.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would it not require an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to require a recommendation of the executive department before appropriations could be made?

Mr. KENYON. I am going to refer to that under the next heading.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I shall be pleased to hear the Senator discuss it.

Mr. KENYON. When the budget is up for discussion the opposition can select the items they desire to discuss.

Heads of departments are on the floor to answer questions.

A certain number of days are allowed for debate.

The vote is taken on the whole item for the particular service under consideration.

In 1909 two budgets were refused and Parliament was dissolved twice in rapid succession. The budgets were not satisfactory to the House of Lords. In 1911 the House of Lords were absolutely stripped of their power as to the budget, and all they can do now is to give their formal assent. If that is not forthcoming, the budget becomes a law in any event, and there is no power to veto.

When the estimates of the budget are approved the appropriation bill is introduced covering the expenditures.

The next step is the execution of the budget and the auditing and controlling.

The auditing and controlling is perhaps the most important part of the budget system.

Questions of waste, inefficiency, and economy enter at this stage of the budget.

Accounting officers account to Parliament for the proper expenditure of the budget.

The comptroller and auditor general is an independent officer controlling the exchequer and audit department.

The public accounts committee is formed by statute as a standing committee of 15 members, the chairman of which comes from the opposition.

The comptroller and auditor general reports to this committee the result of his audit.

This committee is perhaps the most important instrumentality of the budget. It may investigate any question. The committee meets frequently. It investigates any irregularities. It may call witnesses.

Its reports are submitted to Parliament. Everything relating to the audit must be explained to the satisfaction of the committee.

The existence of this public accounts committee keeps the officials of the Government in a state of mind where they are very careful as to expenditures, as they are very desirous of not bringing about criticism.

The report of this committee goes not only to Parliament but to the treasury, and these reports are printed.

Perhaps the strongest feature of parliamentary control is the audit of the comptroller and auditor general hereinbefore referred to. He is an officer independent of the treasury and independent of the executive branch of the Government. He receives a very high salary and is appointed for life. He is supposedly beyond the reach of every influence.

Under the French budget system the estimates are submitted to the Chamber of Deputies, who in turn refer the same to the budget committee. This committee may write a new bill or refer it back to the minister of finance.

The French system is much more complicated than the British. The budget can be changed under the French system on the floor of the assembly in either house, but in England it is considered only by the Commons sitting as a committee of the whole house, and it is necessary that there be executive consent in order to make changes.

Under the Japanese system the Diet can not increase any item of expenditure.

In Switzerland the National Assembly can change the budget, but it is seldom done. In case of disagreement with the executive the attempt is made to smooth out the differences.

I do not care to discuss the workings of the budget system in Germany. Nothing done by Germany is pleasant to discuss. Suffice it to say that a "budget" has been successful in the most autocratic form of government—Germany—and in the most democratic—Switzerland.

The control of the treasury in Britain over the budget does not injure the public service. It makes it essential for a department desiring increased expenditures to show the reason why. In that way the treasury stands between the spending department and the taxpayer; between waste and economy.

The House of Commons holding the purse strings has really given over the initiative to the executive branch of the Government. But the house has given up no right of criticism and it is not compelled to accept the policy of the ministry in power. It can force resignation of the ministry or dissolution of Parliament.

Under the British system the cabinet has complete control as to initiating the budget.

In our Nation there is no control of expenditures; no system; absolutely nothing but chaos.

I now refer to the question asked by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I realize that it is an important constitutional question.

V.

Would the adoption of the budget system require a constitutional amendment?

What provisions of the Constitution will be violated?

Nothing is found in the Constitution with reference to the President's duty as to public finance, unless it be the general statement that the President "shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; * * * he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

Further, Article I, section 9, provides:

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public moneys shall be published from time to time.

This makes it essential that Congress appropriate for the expenditures. As to the raising of revenue, the Constitution provides, Article I, section 7:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

The inquiry may well arise, as suggested by the Senator from Washington, whether a budget prepared by the Treasury and ratified by the Cabinet, which covered the raising of revenue as well as the appropriation of money, could originate in that way or must originate in the House of Representatives. If the revenue measure were introduced in the House that would cover the purpose of the constitutional provision. The bill then would have originated there in the constitutional sense. That would not be very different from many of the bills now that are prepared and sent here and introduced.

Now, the Senate may substitute an entire revenue bill for the House bill, and in that way violate the spirit, though not the letter, of the Constitution.

The Constitution provides, Article I, section 5: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." This provision would be ample to sustain the budget, as the budget can be made almost entirely a matter of procedure. There is no constitutional provision for committees or for the privileges of the floor. These are matters of rules, and a budget system could be put into force and effect by changing some rules of both Houses and adopting new ones.

If all financial matters, all appropriations, were taken away from the large number of committees now dealing with these subjects and placed in one committee, it would go a long way toward solving the difficulties. So there could be a rule permitting the Executive, through a Member, to introduce the budget into the House; a rule giving seats to members of the Cabinet, and the right to question them concerning items in the budget. That question might raise serious debate. They now have the privileges of the floor. Of course, no one would expect them to have a vote or be in any sense considered Members of Congress. That would require a constitutional amendment, but it is entirely unnecessary to have such procedure.

There could be another rule adopted preventing any motion or amendment to change the budget except with the approval of the executive department.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose.

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What hope would the Senator from Iowa have that a transfer of the power of making appropriations to the executive department would reduce expenditures, in view of the fact that it is the almost universal experience of the Government that under our present system the estimates, which are carefully made every year by the executive department, always exceed the appropriations made by Congress?

Mr. KENYON. I think that is one of the faults that has grown up under our system. The executive department realizes that the committees will cut down its estimates, and so it makes its estimates too high. If they felt that the committees would not simply cut down without knowing anything about it they would, I believe, give more careful attention to it. Besides that, the Senator will bear in mind that under the budget system there will have to be a ratification, so to speak, or a concurrence by the Cabinet. The auditing must come in there, in answer to the Senator's question, too. A separate and distinct board of auditing, separate from the power spending the money, will be a constant restraint, and the criticism of Congress will likewise be a restraining influence.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator if his plan provides for giving the Cabinet and the board which makes up the budget the authority to fix the amount to be appropriated and deny to Congress the right to increase or reduce it?

Mr. KENYON. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have not suggested any plan. My resolution is for the appointment of a commission consisting of three Members of the Senate, three Members of the House, and three economists to be appointed by the President to consider the general subject of a budget and report to Congress. There is nothing in it that binds Congress. My own idea, which the Senator asks me about, is that the estimates should come with the approval of the Cabinet in the form of a budget to Congress. They are then before Congress for discussion, and Congress to have no right to raise any appropriation without the approval of the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does not the Senator think that is a long step toward the concentration of all power in the Executive?

Mr. KENYON. Not at all. I am not in favor of the concentration of power in the Executive any more than is the Senator, but Congress would have, of course, the absolute power of criticism and the power to reduce appropriations. Congress could go to the departments. For instance, if the Senator desired an appropriation for a public building he would take it up with the Post Office Department and show the necessity of the building. After the Post Office Department had passed on it it would go to the Treasury Department. The condition of the Treasury would be taken into consideration. The question would be, Is this a national proposition, or is it just a little local proposition somewhere? It would then pass to the Cabinet for ratification in the general budget estimates to be submitted to Congress.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But the power of the Executive to appoint the commission is absolute, and Congress is only advisory. The Representatives of the people who pay the taxes would act only in an advisory capacity under that plan.

Mr. KENYON. Congress could defeat the entire budget, of course. I will state to the Senator very frankly that it does shift the responsibility for initiating expenditures from Congress to the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have always been intensely interested in this subject; it was discussed in the New York constitutional convention; and I wish to observe, connected with the remark of the Senator from Mississippi, that I believe it would result in increasing the power of Congress.

Mr. KENYON. I should think that to be true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Particularly the enforcement of the mandate of Congress that the head of the department must appear before it and answer questions could never do any harm.

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Senator for that suggestion. The head of the department, knowing he might come before Congress to be interrogated about his estimates, would be very careful.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will allow me to interject an interrogation, in view of the expression of the Senator as to what he feels should be the duty of the Cabinet members, if Cabinet members are to continue to initiate measures and exercise the authority we have seen in later years they have exercised, does not the Senator think the Cabinet members before they are vested with the power to which the Senator alludes should be elected by the people and be made responsible to the people rather than to be constituted as they now are if they are to exercise authority such as the eminent Senator feels should be given them on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will very frankly say to the Senator from Illinois that it does not seem to me a feasible proposition at all to elect members of the Cabinet. I think the Senator will observe that in many States now there is a very considerable agitation for a short ballot. I know there is a movement in many of the States that the governors shall appoint treasurers and auditors, and for myself I favor it very much. I should dislike, however, to see the Cabinet elected by the people. I do not think it would be possible.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I fear I may not have made myself clear to the Senator. Does the Senator feel that a Cabinet member should be allowed to be on the floor of either House; that he should be held responsible and be given authority to initiate these questions without having come from the people?

Mr. KENYON. Cabinet members would be on the floor of either House only for the purpose of inquiry, to answer as to their estimates. Was the Senator from Illinois present when we had the Agricultural bill under consideration? Senator after Senator arose and asked questions about the Agricultural bill, but there was no information forthcoming. If we had had the responsible head of the department here and had asked those questions, we could have known what we were doing.

Mr. LEWIS. I was getting at this point: I am sensitive, I confess, to either Chamber being occupied by anyone who is not elected to it or having a right to participate in debate; and since one begins inquiry, the other person would have a right to respond, and if issue was taken with Cabinet members they would have a right to argue. Therefore they would be practically debating on the floor and presenting viewpoints when they represent no constituency and come from no authority. I had assumed that the information which the eminent Senator desired is furnished by the heads of these different departments before committees. Am I wrong?

Mr. KENYON. I desire to know what is the Senator's question? I did not understand it.

Mr. LEWIS. I had assumed that the heads of the various departments did have the information to which the Senator referred and conveyed it to committees.

Mr. KENYON. They convey their estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he, in turn, sends to Congress this large Book of Estimates. The Senator from Illinois has seen estimates for the year. The heads of departments, it is true, or any other witnesses may appear before the committees in reference to bills if the committee request it.

Mr. LEWIS. Does not the Senator assume that these different committees when informed by heads of departments are able, then, to furnish the Senate the information such as he states was sought in vain to be had on the Agricultural bill?

Mr. KENYON. But the Senator knows they do not keep the Senate very well informed.

Mr. LEWIS. No; I will admit they do not keep it well informed, but I thought the Senator might assume that in the way I have suggested it could be done. I must, however, close. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. KENYON. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I only have this point in my mind: How far does the Senator feel we could adopt the plan of allowing a member of the Cabinet, appointed by the Executive, to come before us and participate in the discussions——

Mr. KENYON. I do not go that far——

Mr. LEWIS. And in the deliberation by their replies and responses in the positions they would assume on financial questions?

Mr. KENYON. I do not go to the extent the Senator does at all, but that they should come before Congress merely for the purpose of answering inquiries concerning the estimates which they have presented; that is all; not for discussion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Would the Senator from Iowa permit an interruption?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the Senator whether he contemplates that a Cabinet officer might bring to the Senate floor any of his subordinates whom he might desire?

Mr. KENYON. No; unless the Senate should especially ask for the presence of the head of some bureau. I do not think, for instance, we should assemble the whole Agricultural Department in the Chamber to answer questions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, does not the Senator know, as a matter of fact, with the duties that we have imposed upon various Cabinet officers, that they know practically nothing about the details of, for instance, an Agricultural bill?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not. We have had the Secretary of Agriculture before our committee, and he seemed to know very thoroughly about all of the details of his department. I think it is the duty of the Cabinet officer to know about the details.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think a Cabinet officer ought to know them, if he can; but I think, for instance, as to the Secretary of the Interior, with the duties of various kinds which we have imposed on him—not against his will, either, for that matter—it would be impossible for him to be acquainted with the details of the various administrative features that he must handle. He has the Geological Survey; he has the Bureau of Mines; he has public lands; he has pensions; he has the Census Bureau, and all those various activities, and it would be impossible for him to know the details of the bills concerning those various matters without consulting the heads of his different bureaus.

Mr. KENYON. I notice—and I say it in no disrespectful way at all—that members of the Cabinet seem to have plenty of time to travel around the country and to make speeches, and I think they have time to come prepared on any subject that Congress desires to question them about. They could be informed as to the particular matter, if necessary, and be able to come in and inform the Senate as to it.

As I was proceeding to say, Mr. President, the foundation of the British budget has been a standing order of the House of Commons, before referred to, adopted over 200 years ago, providing that the House would proceed to no measure where there was any demand made upon the treasury unless the executive branch of the Government should recommend it.

It has been said by many authorities that this order may be considered a fundamental part of the British constitution and the corner stone of the budget system in England.

Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution provides: Congress shall have power—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all the powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or any department or officer thereof.

This would seem to give complete power to pass any legislation needed for the budget system.

I have not proposed any plan for a budget but have called attention to the necessity for some change. Congress is not informed—and this whole discussion we have here this morning shows it—and very few Members have given any study to the question.

My joint resolution does not provide for any plan, but simply provides for a commission which shall consist of three Members of the Senate, three Members of the House, and three economists to be appointed by the President.

What opposition can there be to an investigation of this subject and the presenting of a plan to Congress? Congress is not compelled to adopt it. It may change or reject it. It will at least be the basis on which to build a better structure of financial policy for the Government.

In 1915 the committee on State finance of the New York State constitutional convention held hearings on the budget provisions of the new constitution. Many eminent men discussed this question. Among them President Lowell, of Harvard University; President Goodnow, of Johns Hopkins; ex-President Taft; Chairman Fitzgerald, of the House committee, and others. This commission should have upon it men of this character. No better selection could be made than ex-President Taft or Mr. Fitzgerald, formerly of the House committee. I am not concerned with who is on the commission, and it may be wise to have more economists and fewer Members of Congress. I apprehend, however, that Members of Congress will desire to have considerable to say about any change in plans. Personally I had rather have the information come from a commission that had upon it no Member of Congress, but I realize that such a thing is impossible.

Many of the States have abandoned the obsolete method of finance and have adopted budgets. Maryland has adopted a constitutional amendment on the subject. Wisconsin has what is known as the "Tanner System." The States are awake to the situation. The business men of the Nation are awake. The only Rip Van Winkle on the subject is Congress. It is time for Congress to wake up and give to the Nation a sound method of finance instead of the present farcical method of dealing with governmental expenditure.

I do not pretend, Mr. President, to suggest just what plan should be adopted. A budget system, as I have suggested to the Senator from Mississippi, necessarily shifts responibility for initiating appropriation from the legislative to the executive branch. I do not know that Congress will ever be willing to do that; I do not know that Congress will be willing to take any action limiting its power to increase items in appropriation bills. If it will not, it can not adopt a system that will amount to anything as a budget plan. I am merely urging this proposition out of an earnestness that I feel. These tremendous expenditures of public money are now reaching beyond what our most vivid imagination could ever conceive of, and the people of the country, paying these taxes, are going to scan very closely appropriations made by Congress, and Congress is going to be forced by the exigencies of the situation, if this war goes on for many years, to do its level best to try to see that public money is spent and accounted for with the same fidelity that the private money of a ward would be spent and accounted for by a guardian.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. It would seem that some improvement might be made in the present system, but I am not clear that we could derive very much advantage by authorizing the heads of the departments to appear before the Houses of Congress. They now appear before the various committees in regard to various subjects in connection with which appropriations are asked. I am afraid that if we authorized the heads of the departments to appear here in the Senate we would not have more than a committee meeting to ask questions. However, I ask the Senator if he does not think that perhaps his plan or the adoption of some wise budget system would help to some extent to do away with duplication of work? I think many, if I may say so, of our unnecessary expenditures arise by reason of overlapping and duplication of work of employees and endeavor in the various departments and in divisions of departments. If the budget system or plan which the Senator has in mind could help accomplish the abolition of that duplication, I have no doubt there would be a great deal saved in that way.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that the very inquiry shows the necessity of some commission to study the question as provided in the resolution. The commission would take up subjects of that kind. The Senator probably knows vastly more about that than I do, but I know that there is a waste in the duplication referred to; and every Member of Congress knows that there is duplication of work. Those are questions to be considered by the proposed commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. And perhaps, in adjusting the budget plan, that would all be gone over and considered, and a system finally reached that would abolish that duplication to some extent.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me that might be a very important feature.

Mr. KENYON. Even if this commission did not report in favor of any budget plan, they could report on matters of that kind, I assume,

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, while I can see difficulties in the way, yet I do think that the proposal of the Senator for a commission to study and investigate the matter is a very good thing, and I can not see any very valid objection to it. What I rose, however, to suggest was this: The Senator suggested that the Senate might hesitate about adopting a proposition that would permit them to refuse to consider any proposed expenditure that was not recommended by a department. I do not think a proposition like that ought to shock the Senate very much, because we have gone to a certain extent along that very line. We have a rule that in the consideration of appropriation bills amendments of a certain character providing appropriations are not in order unless estimated for by a department or unless they conform to certain other conditions that allow them to be considered without such an estimate. We have in that very rule ourselves recognized the importance of having the recommendation of a department.

Then, in connection with river and harbor appropriation bills, the Commerce Committee, as the Senator knows, has a sort of rule that no item shall be put on a bill unless recommended by the department; and while that rule has not always been followed——

Mr. KENYON. They never observed that rule while I was a member of the committee, but usually everything was put on the bill that was recommended by a particular member of the committee who lived in the State where the improvement was contemplated.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is hardly correct in that. I know of some instances where items were put on that did not have the recommendation of the department, but there were very few of them.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that is true; but I know that during the short time I served on that committee some items were put on that had no recommendation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know there were one or two, but not very many, and I know that there was quite a contest at the time in the Senate upon the proposition that the department had not recommended items. I do not believe, however, that there would be very substantial opposition in the Senate to a general proposition along the line I have indicated.

Mr. KENYON. All I have to say, in closing, Mr. President, is that I have submitted these remarks in order that the Senate may, if they will, think about the proposition. I shall move to take up the resolution to which I have referred at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill which is now the unfinished business.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock meridian.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just a moment. Before the question is put, I will ask the Senator if he does not hope that before Monday the Senate will have the deficiency appropriation bill now being considered in the House?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If so, the Committee on Appropriations can proceed with its consideration. I do not believe we will have the bill before that time; but if we should, it will not interfere with the work on the bill, for the committee can consider it; in fact, the committee will go to work to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, and the absence of a technical reference of the bill by the Senate to the committee will not interfere with the progress of our work. I will say that I am induced to make this motion because members of the Finance Committee tell me the work of that committee can not go along uninterruptedly and efficiently with the Senate in session, and they are very anxious for the short adjournment in order that the work on the revenue bill may be facilitated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4637) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thought I had the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair doubts whether the Senator from Mississippi can take the Senator off his feet to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What was the observation of the Chair? I did not catch it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in doubt whether the Senator can move to adjourn when the Senator from Tennessee has the floor and is addressing the Chair.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought the Senator from Tennessee made his motion and yielded the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I made the motion to be put to the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. When the motion was made the Senator did yield the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, even though a motion was made by the Senator from Tennessee, it is open to the Senator from Mississippi to make a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee made a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. The Chair had not put that question to the Senate, and, therefore, the Chair thinks that the Senator from Mississippi, perhaps, is in order, and can make the motion to adjourn. The Senator from Mississippi will withhold his motion so that the Senate may receive a message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Certainly.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE MEEKER.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. JACOB EDWIN MEEKER, late a Representative from the State of Missouri, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. WILFLEY. I ask that the resolutions of the House be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,

October 16, 1918.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JACOB EDWIN MEEKER, a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That a committee of 20 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILFLEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk resolutions, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 321), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. JACOB EDWIN MEEKER, late a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President, to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Under the second resolution the Presiding Officer appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate Mr. REED, Mr. WILFLEY, Mr. WATSON, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. NEW, Mr. KENYON, Mr. HARDING, Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. KIRBY, and Mr. CURTIS.

Mr. WILFLEY. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, October 21, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 17, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, whom we have been taught to worship as Father, we bless Thee for the rich and varied endowments of mind and soul which constitute us progressive beings, lifting us to clearer visions of Thee and the laws which environ us and hast made character the supreme test.

Make us strong in our convictions, pure in our desires, and thus lead us onward and upward to a closer relationship with Thee.

Again, O God, our Heavenly Father, are we reminded of the brief tenure of this life by the sudden and unexpected death of a Member of this legislative body. Strengthen our faith and that of his friends and admirers, especially those to whom he was nearest and dearest, in the larger life to which he has been called and to which we are all rapidly tending and fit us for the inevitable change.

"It lies around us like a cloud,
A world we do not see;
Yet the sweet closing of an eye
May bring us there to be.

"Sweet hearts around us throb and beat,
Sweet helping hands are stirred,
And palpitates the veil between
With breathings almost heard."

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Upon what subject?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To include an address made by me on waterways.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on waterways. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13086, the first deficiency bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Let me say to the gentleman that I have applications for time by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] for 10 minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] for 15 minutes, and for safety I think the gentleman had better make the request for 30 minutes, and the last 5 perhaps will not be used.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 45 minutes, reserving 15 minutes for myself.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, the gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 45 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Thirty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and 15 minutes by myself.

Mr. HEFLIN. Reserving the right to object, I may want 10 minutes' time myself.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman knows how to get it, does he not?

Mr. HEFLIN. I understand the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. That general debate be limited to 45 minutes, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Kentucky. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky if there will be any chance for my getting 10 minutes? I do not know that I want to speak, but I would like to have it reserved if necessary.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am simply following the evident wish of the House in trying to expedite the consideration of the bill. I yesterday took considerable time myself, but I took it for the purpose of the explanation of the bill, and only that, without in any sense diverging from that purpose. I had hoped that we might go on with the reading of the bill this morning, and that such debate as might be necessary might develop under the five-minute rule. I think I may be able to give the gentleman from Alabama 5 or 10 minutes out of the 15 I have reserved if he thinks that he needs it. But unless he now knows that he wants it, I suggest that we go along under the request that I have made.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will not object, and leave it to the gentleman from Kentucky to give me the time if I want it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13086, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennesse in the chair.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I appreciate that the chairman is anxious to get along with this bill, and I will not take up any more time of the House than I absolutely have to.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill authorizes appropriations aggregating $6,345,755,666.04. When we consider that the bonded indebtedness of the United States on October 31, 1865, was only $1,163,769,611.89 (Spaulding's Financial History of the War, p. 201), and that our governmental expenditures from January 1, 1791, to January 1, 1914, only totaled approximately $28,000,000,000 (Dewey's Financial History of the United States), and that this bill is merely a deficiency measure, it is apparent that our present rate of public expenditures is quite beyond human conception. The aggregate expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, under existing estimates, will probably exceed $35,000,000,000, of which amount the War Department will undoubtedly get at least $25,000,000,000. An annual expenditure of $35,000,000,000 means in round figures $96,000,000 per day, $4,000,000 per hour, $66,000 per minute, and $1,100 every second.

I do not speak in any spirit of criticism, but from a sense of duty and responsibility as a Member of the House. I speak as a Member who has supported every war measure demanded by the Executive for the vigorous and successful prosecution of the war. The President says that we must win the war. I stand upon that platform with all my heart and soul. It is our duty, in time of war in the prosecution thereof, to sustain and hold up the hands of the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, whoever he may be. It is the imperative duty of all loyal American citizens in this great crisis to concentrate all their thoughts, all their energies, and all their resources into an irresistible unit for the sole purpose of bringing the war to a speedy conclusion by victory.

We must not forget, however, that in the minds of the American people exists this question: "Are public funds being wisely, economically, and lawfully expended?" You on the other side of the aisle will soon find out that you are making a great mistake in getting so absorbed in your greed for a continuance in power that you will not see what even the blind can feel. Public sentiment is rapidly crystallizing upon this question, and demands not only that the Congress adopt the budget system, but that the Congress exercise careful supervision over the expenditure of public moneys, and take reasonable precautions against waste, extravagance, and unlawfulness.

The Syracuse Post-Standard on September 24, 1918, contained the following editorial:

A COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES.

The committee of the House of Representatives which ranks first in importance is Ways and Means; it determines how the money necessary for the support of government shall be raised. Next in importance is the Committee on Appropriations; it determines generally where the money shall go. There is no committee on expenditures to see that the money is honestly and wisely spent.

The proposition that the House shall have a committee on expenditures with the broadest powers of audit, completing with the Ways and Means and Appropriations Committees the circle of legislative control of the Nation's purse, has come before the present Congress as usual. Our own Congressman, Mr. MAGEE, we are glad to say, made a convincing plea for it. The House rejected the proposal as usual. That the United States Government should have the essentials of a budget system necessary for the conduct of all corporate business is apparently not to be considered.

There are committees on expenditures to be sure. Their number is their condemnation, one for each of the 10 departments whose heads are in the Cabinet, one for public buildings, none for any of the multitude of other agencies for the spending of money. The chairmen of the 11 committees, working independently, do not take their duties very seriously, but they all have fine committee rooms.

To do away with all these committees and substitute a committee on expenditures, with power to hold every department of Government to strict accountability for its expenditures, would be statesmanship.

The New York Tribune on September 23, 1918, contained the following editorial:

DODGING THE INEVITABLE.

The House of Representatives has once more refused to create a committee on war expenditures. The House usually shrinks from modernizing its procedure and conforming its methods of doing business to new requirements. A committee on expenditures would be a radical innovation. Therefore the majority in the present House will have none of it. This fear is unreasoning. It obstructs a recasting of the relations of the legislative branch to appropriations and expenditures which our war experience has made inevitable. We could blunder along without a budget system and without a rational apportionment of responsibility for our national outlay while we were spending only $1,000,000,000 to $1,500,000,000 a year. But it is preposterous to go ahead spending $20,000,000,000 or $25,000,000,000 a year without the safeguards of administrative accountability and legislative audit and control.

We have been proceeding on the mistaken theory that Congress is competent to originate and determine down to the last detail the expenditures of the executive branch, and that it is a normal function of the executive to audit its own expense accounts. Chaos naturally results from such a confusion of duties. It is only a form of words to say that the House and Senate appropriation committees any longer decide what the executive departments are to spend. More than ever before the legislative committees merely register the decisions of executive officials. It could not be otherwise. Secretary McAdoo has even intervened to control the details of taxation and of other revenue legislation. And he has a logical right to do so. Under any well-considered fiscal scheme the executive ought to accept full responsibility for the outlay necessary to carry out its plans. Congress really takes over a routine administrative function when it decides of its own motion what ought to be spent by each department, bureau, commission, and so on down to the pettiest agency of government.

Under an intelligent budget system Congress would merely vote appropriations in the mass. That would end forever the dangerous fiction which permits the administration to wash its hands of all accountability for the sum total of appropriations. But having fixed that responsibility where it belongs, Congress would be entitled to assume the broadest possible powers of audit. Having voted the money, it would see to it that that money was wisely and profitably spent. Congress can not function efficiently until it creates a real committee on expenditures, supplanting the various make-believe committees on expenditures in the various departments carried for window-dressing purposes, in its present organization.

The House and the Senate should actually "hold the purse" through a strict auditing of accounts. Congress is the natural forum in which to discuss and settle all questions as to the wisdom and usefulness of national outlay.

Think of the enormous gain in economy and in public morale which would result if Congressmen were limited to the rôle of critics of expenditure and were effectually barred from acting as promoters of public building, river and harbor, and other "pork-barrel" extravagances for the benefit of local interests. This Congress is too deep in the ruts of the past to feel the need of new methods and a new outlook. If the Republicans carry the next House they can do nothing more timely and constructive than to create that vital auditing committee at which the torpor and timidity of the present Congress balk.

Under date of September 14, 1918, the committee on State and municipal taxation of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in its report on the pending revenue bill, said, in part:

Any tax system, especially in times of stress, which has a recognized tendency to produce profligacy and corruption, should be supplemented by measures to check these evils. Your committee believes that the House of Representatives should establish a vigorous auditing committee, amply provided with assistance and authority and under the chairmanship of a member of the minority party.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. I have only a little time, and will be glad to yield if the gentleman can get me more time.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was just going to ask why you did not adopt the budget system when the Republican Party was in power? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MAGEE. Under the Republican Party there was a commission on Economy and Efficiency appointed, and President Taft sent a message to the Congress approving the report of that commission.

Mr. HASTINGS. You were in power for 40 years and you never attempted it.

Mr. MAGEE. When public sentiment began to crystallize a Republican administration created a Commission on Economy and Efficiency on "the need for a national budget." On June 27, 1912, President Taft sent a message to the Congress approving the recommendations of the commission and recommended to the Congress the enactment of the legislation necessary to put into effect such recommendations. A Democratic administration starved to death the commission.

My contention is that it is as necessary to conserve our financial resources as our food products. Our people give without stint, but we can retain their absolute confidence only by showing them that the funds given have been wisely and lawfully expended. They are at least entitled to that, and we shirk our responsibility when we persistently refuse to render any accounting of public expenditures.

The administration has obtained the services of a former justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, one of the great lawyers of the country, to determine where a few financial drops have gone. I am unwilling to concede that we have not sufficient ability and intelligence in the membership of the House to investigate and make an efficient report upon public expenditures. My observation is that the membership of the House contains its fair share of the best business ability and best legal talent in the country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman think also that the House would know best where to go to get that information?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes. I appreciate that the Committee on Appropriations in the preparation of this bill has been painstaking, conscientious, and performed excellent service. But that does not meet the situation. We have no authoritative body to investigate public expenditures and furnish any information to the House. We simply have to shut our eyes and vote.

We must sustain and back up our incomparable soldiers overseas to the utmost limit of the Nation's resources. I feel that it was at Chateau-Thierry, the gateway to Paris, where through the heroism of American soldiers the German offensive ended and the Foch offensive began. We all must feel that the soldiers of America fighting under the Stars and Stripes alongside of the union jack of sturdy England and the tricolor of glorious France will prove the determining factor in this war; and all must rejoice to see that the spirit of '76 still exists in the youth of America.

This is what a young French woman, Miss Vromet, now taking special courses at Syracuse University, says of our boys:

At the Battle of Chateau-Thierry my brother fought beside American soldiers for the first time, and he told us that the Americans fight like lions.

[Applause.]

Our soldiers and sailors overseas and at home must be supplied with the best of everything. Consequently it behooves us to economize in the expenditure of public funds and to make it our particular business to stop profiteering everywhere. We can not do this unless we adopt efficient means therefor. In a speech in the House on April 6, 1918, I pointed out how the great committee on public accounts in the House of Commons had been an absolute check on waste, extravagance, and unlawful expenditures. We imperatively need such a committee here. Your refusal, gentlemen across the aisle, to take some means to supervise public expenditures will prove your undoing. You have seen the lightning flash in the recent elections in Maine, and you will hear the thunder roar in New York in November next. If we vote throughout the State by ballot, it may take until near Christmas to count the Republican vote. [Applause on the Republican side.]

As was stated by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the American people are amazingly unified in their determination to push the war to a speedy and successful conclusion. This is due in a large part, I think, to the fact that war was made upon us. When the Congress on April 6, 1917, declared that a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial German Government, we all had vividly in mind the ruthless attacks without warning by Germany upon our unarmed merchant ships, flying the Stars and Stripes and peacefully sailing upon the high seas where they had the lawful right to be. That was the great mistake of Germany that doomed her to defeat. She ought to have known that every loyal American citizen would spend the last dollar and sacrifice the last man, if need be, to protect Old Glory wherever it might float upon any land or upon any sea. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is doubtful if at any time in the experience of people with self-government their representatives have so united for a single purpose as have the representatives of the American people for the successful conduct of this war. To accomplish that purpose partisanship and personal ambitions have been set aside. Marvelous things have been done since this Congress convened on the 2d of April, 1917. It is almost inconceivable that the amount of work that has been done could have been accomplished. We have raised and authorized appropriations or appropriated well onto $50,000,000,000. We have provided for the raising of the greatest Army ever marshaled in so short a time. We have increased our Navy and perfected our fighting organizations on land and sea. Our armies are in action. Our Navy has accomplished what Germany thought was impossible. We have taken an army overseas in safety. All these great things have been authorized and provided for by work done on this floor. And there has been no party distinction. Unlike any other war, in the history of this or perhaps any other country, there has been no minority party. The party in power has had the cooperation of the minority party in the enactment of every measure essential in the conduct of the war. The President has been ungrudgingly granted every war power he has asked that was essential. I am sure every other Member of the House has felt as I have felt and worked and voted as I have voted for every war measure as a solemn duty to meet a grave responsibility. One seated in the galleries would not know the leader of the majority from the leader of the minority or the members of the majority from the members of the minority by what has been said and done. On war matters amendments offered or voted for, all votes cast have been without party distinction. And yet, while Members are here aiding in this way in the conduct of the war, some persons are campaigning against them upon the ground that their defeat is necessary to aid in the conduct of the war. Votes cast for or against amendments in the great mass of legislation that has been enacted, amendments inconsequential in their general effect as war measures, are cited as reasons why this should be done. Votes to recommit bills for amendment are falsely stated to be votes against the bills. To illustrate: A short time ago we passed what is known as the man-power bill. Many Members had serious doubts as to the wisdom of including the 18-year old boys among those first to be sent to the trenches.

The Secretary of War and the President had said it was not the intention of the administration to send the 18-year-old boys until the others in the call had been exhausted. In order to make assurances doubly sure that this intent of the administration should be carried out, an amendment was provided for in a motion to recommit calling the 18-year-old boys last. Many of us voted for this motion. The amendment was not carried, but the President within 24 hours after the man-power bill was passed, did what he had said had been the purpose of the War Department and what Members voted for—gave the 18-year-old boys deferred classification. And yet there are men going about in congressional districts to-day saying that this or that Member voted against the man-power bill, voted against raising the necessary men to carry on the war. Of course, the men or set of men, or the newspapers that state or publish such things know they are making a bold attempt to deceive the people by grossly misrepresenting the facts.

Mr. Chairman, whatever the result of this election may be, as to the control of this House, whether the majority shall move from one side of this aisle to the other, the conduct of the war, if it has not been concluded, will go on. I am confident, however, that a Republican House and a Republican Senate will give confidence to the country and impetus to the conduct of the war. We will look into the expenditures of the money that has already been appropriated and that shall be appropriated in the future. I have believed from the beginning that committees of Congress should have made the closest inquiry into the manner in which money has been expended. The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department should have kept the closest watch on the expenditure of money by the War Department. We should have stricken with terror those who contemplated graft or were misapplying funds. It is doubtful if there would have been the waste or worse than waste of $640,000,000 for airplanes if those who had the responsibility for expending the money knew that every step they were taking was being followed up by committees of Congress, the body that appropriated the money. I believe that in the next Congress, with the majority upon this side and such expenditures being carefully watched, not to embarrass, not to hinder, but to insure economy and honesty in the expenditure of public funds we shall save money and expose graft wherever it exists.

Great things are to be done in the future. The greatest problems that have ever confronted mankind will follow upon peace, the dawn of which is reddening in the East. I confidently believe that the constructive forces of this Nation, those with a legislative vision and purpose to maintain a high plane of living and wages and prosperous conditions for the laborers and industries of the country when the country is on a peace basis, are on this side of the House.

For this reason alone, if for no other, the American people will act wisely if they change the leadership from one side of this aisle to the other—from you to us. I do not say this to you in a bitter partisan way. I believe the constructive legislation of the Republican Party in the past half century amply justifies the statement I have made. Nothing has demonstrated itself more forcefully than this: This Nation and the world are getting the benefit of the results of the constructive legislation of the last half century. Civilization has been benefited by the billions of money that have been created by the inspiration of that legislation under the leadership of the Republican Party. The great wealth that has been accumulated, the great resources that have been developed as the result of wise laws have made it possible for our Government to expend billions on our own account, to lend other billions to our allies, and to send materials and food to all the world, and in this way to make possible the triumphant victory the allied armies are now approaching. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the first speaker on the Republican side this morning [Mr. MAGEE] has the best record of any Republican in the House for loyal and whole-hearted support of the administration. If his Republican colleagues had his record, they could go with better grace to their constituents and ask for reelection. But the gentleman from New York allowed his partisan zeal to lead him, even in the face of his party's record in this House, to urge that the next House should be Republican. Although he has voted with the Democrats nearly all the time, he now invites the country to return to "the good old days of Republican control."

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] makes a like appeal. He reminds us that constructive statesmanship is on the Republican side, and that the country should return to those glorious old days of Republican rule. These suggestions brought vividly back to me the recollections of the days of "Aldrichism" and "Cannonism," when Aldrich, the king of the Rubber Trust, the leader of the Republican Party in the Senate, laid a tariff tax on rubber goods and taxed the American people to put money in his own pockets. I recalled the time when Ballinger, a member of the Republican Cabinet, was bartering the public domain of the West to Guggenheim and his kind. I recalled the time in those glorious old days when Lorimer had bought a seat in the Senate from the State of Illinois and was impeached by the Senate of the United States. These happy recollections of Republican misrule came trooping in upon my mind as these Republican gentlemen invited us to return to those old days.

In those old days waste and extravagance were rampant in Republican circles. The Republican President, Mr. Taft, said that you were wasting or squandering annually at least $100,000,000. But Mr. Aldrich said that it was $300,000,000—and you gentlemen have the gall to invite us to swap off this Democratic administration for that old Republican machine. Why, the power-hungry bosses of the Republican Party are doing everything in their power to get control of the Government. They are absolutely trying to buy seats in the House and Senate. Go to Michigan, Illinois, and Colorado, where your millionaire candidates are relying for election not upon the patriotism of the people but upon their power to buy the elections. In the State of Michigan the patriots who believe in clean elections were unable to get Republican officials to investigate the corrupt use of money in the recent Republican senatorial primary and the Federal court in New York summoned witnesses there. They have brought them into court, and when the constituted authority of the country said, "Gentleman, where did you get this money and how was it used?" they said, "We decline to tell you." "Take them to jail," said the judge. "All right, we will go to jail, but we will not tell who furnished the money." Three of them were sent to jail by the judge in New York yesterday. Buying and selling seats in the United States Senate and then defying the constituted authorities of the country.

When our boys are fighting and dying in France for our country, for God's sake let us refuse to sell or surrender the country to these profiteers and corruptionists here at home! [Applause.]

Do you know what you would do if you got control of this House and the Senate? I will tell you what would happen. You would begin at once your presidential campaign and for two years you would hamper and hamstring the great President and defeat his great measures while you played your game of 1920 politics.

Is the country ready for such a miserable performance? It is suggested that if you get control of the House and Senate that one of your candidates for President will come to Washington and dictate your policies—one of which will be to tie the hands of the President of the United States.

President Wilson has not had the loyal support of the Republican side. There is no use of trying to deceive yourselves or the country. Why, one of your number [Mr. MASON of Illinois] offered a bill to tie the President's hands and stop the Army at the ocean's side, and no Republican in either branch of Congress ever condemned that act. One of you Republicans [Mr. BRITTEN of Illinois] offered a bill to exempt American boys of German and Austrian blood from service to that flag on a foreign field, and no one of you on that side, or in the other branch, ever condemned that act. One hundred and eighty-six of you voted to exempt excessive profits from the provisions of the war-tax bill. Many of you supported the Cooper resolution. Many of you supported the McLemore resolution, and many of you voted against measures that the President wanted passed to aid him in the conduct of the war.

Gentlemen, let us be fair with ourselves and with the country. It would be nothing short of a national calamity, and an international disaster, for the Republican Party to get control of this House and the Senate at this critical time. Let President Wilson have both branches of Congress until this war is over. Lincoln had them, McKinley had them, and Wilson has them, and he is going to have them after the next election. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is no doubt about that. I make you the prediction here to-day that we will have this House by over 50 majority. A good many of you will not, and should not, come back. You place partisan success above the welfare of your country. Gentlemen, the country is aroused from one end to the other. The patriotism of the people is stirred as never before, and they do not propose that this House shall be turned over now to the money-grabbing, profiteering element of this country.

Why is it that these men are putting up millions back of you? Because they have been required to pay large sums of war taxes. They want to get control of the taxing power. They want to exempt themselves and put the burden upon the other fellow. The voter who sits in the audiences in this fall campaign and listens to the talk of turning this Government over to the constructive statesmen referred to by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will say, "God of our fathers, deliver me from such a fate!" No; gentlemen; let us stand by this great Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. Let us give him whole-hearted support. Let us keep the party in power that was in power when the war commenced, that was in power when we entered the war, and that is now conducting the war successfully. Let us stand by that party until the war is won. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, under leave just granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to submit the following:

"The issue in 1918 is, Are we going to stand by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy? His party was in power when the war came on; his party was in power when our country entered the war; and his party should remain in power until the war is won.

"The Republican Party leaders, in their efforts to defeat and turn out the party now in control, are responsible for the injection of partisan politics into this campaign.

"Suppose the Republicans had been in power when the war commenced and were in power now, and the Democrats should now be engaged in a campaign to drive them from power, what do you suppose these Republican leaders would say? Why, they would accuse us of being disloyal and they would stoutly contend that to elect a Democratic House and Senate under the circumstances would be doing precisely what Germany wanted done. I want to say, as an American to Americans, that to defeat the President's party in the coming election would be nothing short of a public calamity, and it would be seized upon and exploited by Germany as a repudiation of the President and his war program, and the country would be injured by such a course. I submit to the intelligent and patriotic people of the United States that it is right and proper that the party in power charged directly with the responsibility for the conduct of the war, and especially when the war is being successfully carried on, should be kept in power by the American people. One thing is certain, and that is, that every half-hearted American and every German sympathizer in the United States is going to vote the Republican ticket in the coming election. German spies and agents are hoping to be able to tell the allies of Germany that President Wilson and his party, the party in power, have been repudiated by the American people.

"Democrats can truthfully say that under our control the war is being carried on in a wonderfully successful manner, and therefore with perfect propriety we can ask the American people to indorse the work and leadership that have brought success to our arms, but when the Republicans under the circumstances ask to have the party in power repudiated they are guilty of injecting partisan politics into the very issues of the life and death of the Republic. Democrats simply ask for an indorsement of service, which has been indorsed and warmly praised by the allies and which has resulted in victory for our flag, but Republican politicians, when they ask for a repudiation of the party in power, show a disposition to place partisan success above the welfare of the country, and if Republicans were in power at this time and Democrats sought to do such a thing they would be guilty of the same great evil. I want to say again that President McKinley, Col. Roosevelt, and ex-President Harrison, during the Spanish-American War, appealed to the American people to give President McKinley a Republican House and Senate and the people did so by an overwhelming vote. Then we were at war with Spain, a small power. If it were necessary then to support and keep in power the Republican Party, the party in power when the war came on, how much more important now when the very life of our Nation is at stake and the civilization of the world is threatened to stand by Woodrow Wilson and retain his party in power. In many important instances Republican leaders and Members have opposed the President's program just as far as they dared to go, and after trying to defeat many of his measures as we considered the bills section by section and seeing that they had failed, in order to save themselves at home they have voted for some of them on the final roll call. From another viewpoint it would be nothing short of a national calamity to turn over the taxing power to the men who want to get rich and enormously rich out of this war, and the fact that they are supporting the Republican bosses now is proof enough that they have been assured that the war-tax burden will be shifted from the shoulders of those most able to pay to the shoulders of those least able to pay and that instead of being required to pay a considerable portion of their immense profits they will be relieved of that burden almost entirely while Republicans unload it upon the backs of the American masses.

"This is a question—a very important question—that should and will be seriously considered by the voter in the coming election. Surely the men who are making tremendous profits and stupendous fortunes because of the war should be willing—and if not willing, should be required—to contribute a fair and just portion to the Government and its soldiers who are carrying on the war. This the Democratic Party has insisted should be done, and this the Democratic Party has succeeded in doing, and that is why some of these big greedy fellows, making millions in war profits, and who are required to pay to the Government a fair portion of what they get, are now secretly contributing thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to the campaign funds of the Republican Party. They had rather give to the Republican campaign fund a hundred thousand dollars for sordid purposes than to pay to the Government a million dollars in taxes to support the cause involving the very life of the Nation. It is whispered around in many quarters that the Republicans have the largest campaign fund that they have ever had. No one who has been about the Capitol in recent months doubts that. The pompous profiteer, sore because the law requires him to turn over to the Government a considerable portion of his profit in taxes, is now seeking relief at the hands of the hungry bosses of the Republican Party, and they, without a moment's hesitation, these power-hungry bosses, are ready to agree to use the taxing power of the Republic to enable a favored few to escape their fair share of the Nation's war burden, and this is to be done, we are told, at the expense and great injury of the American masses whose boys are fighting and dying for our country. While our boys on a foreign field are fighting and dying for our country God forbid that we shall sell it or surrender it to plutocracy and predatory interests at home. The ghouls and vultures and vampires that always appear at a time like this are not only taking advantage of a condition produced by war while they fatten upon the distress and misfortune of their country, but they are now seeking to get control of the Government itself, so that they can suck and drain its lifeblood to feed their putrid veins."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have five minutes, and I will ask the Chair to call me down at the expiration of one. I desire to yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

In that one minute I wish to say this: I think the President of the United States can survive, notwithstanding his self-constituted chief defender, in season and out of season, rushes in and performs and appeals to "the God of our fathers." And we on this side can survive, notwithstanding his attack. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose that what I am going to say will do any good, any more than what I have already said on the same subject has accomplished anything, but inasmuch as I once started out to give the details of this little transaction, I want to conclude it. I described some time ago on the floor of the House a case where a soldier had made a certain allotment to his wife. The wife, not knowing it, after he had gone also applied for the allotment, giving her first name a little different in spelling, though not in sound, and a little different address from the one that her soldier husband had given, though in the same town. Month after month she has been receiving two checks, one check to her under the first name, which she had given, and the other check with the first name which her husband had destined for her, but both on the face as wife of the same soldier. Being an honest woman, she wrote back monthly, telling the circumstances and returning one of the checks. But it made no difference. Both monthly checks continued to come to her. Finally she wrote to her Congressman, and I thought it well to bring before the House the circumstances and also in that way to make it public, and I thought it might call the attention of the Treasury Department to the matter. And I thought also, perhaps, returning the check by her Congressman might have a little more effect than returning it by herself. But apparently there is no means of stopping this generosity of the United States Government, because I have just heard that again has come to her the two checks. [Laughter.]

I do not remember the exact amount, and I will not attempt to give it, but they were two sizeable checks; and again, this honest, self-sacrificing woman sends back the duplicate, which she thinks does not belong to her, because she thinks the Government might make use of it otherwise. I call attention to the matter again, hoping that it will reach the Treasury Department and be remedied. I appreciate their difficulties, but I do hope that it may reach them and that this particular case may be remedied.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is just possible that the gentleman's constituent herself may be mistaken. I know nothing about the facts; but, as the gentleman knows, there are certain allotments that are known as compulsory allotments, in the case of dependents, which are paid through the medium of the War Risk Bureau, and then there are certain volunteer allotments which are paid through the medium of the War Department, and it is possible that the lady may be entitled under the law to both checks.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think it is possible in this case, but I will look into that particular phase of it, and if I find it so, I will be very glad to report so. But I fear very much that this is not the only case of that kind. The lady is certainly entitled to great commendation for her persistent industry in trying to put back into the Treasury the money she thinks belongs there. I can not help having an unpleasant misgiving as to how many other checks are going out to people who are not as honest as she is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For temporary employees for the Civil Service Commission, $150,000: Provided, That not more than four persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,400 per annum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this item and other items relating to the increase of clerical force in the departments in Washington are worthy of some consideration, and I rise to make an inquiry, because the matter was not referred to in the Committee on Appropriations inasmuch as it was regarded as a matter of incidental importance. And yet, I think the members of the legislative subcommittee will be interested in knowing what was the policy of the subcommittee on deficiencies in granting this large amount of $150,000 for the Civil Service Commission. I believe there is another instance where the committee voted to the Department of State $136,000 as additional deficiency appropriations for clerical services.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no appropriation carried in this bill looking to the employment of additional employees in Washington. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will give me his attention——

Mr. STAFFORD. I am giving the gentleman my attention. I heard the gentleman——

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason for these deficiency appropriations is simply to maintain existing organizations, and this particular one is not for the purpose of increasing the number of clerks that the Civil Service Commission may have. A number of departments asked for such increases. They totaled something over $3,000,000, and the committee refused to grant them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman advise the committee whether there was an exception in the present legislative bill about allowing four persons to be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $1,400? If my recollection serves me right, two salaries in excess of $1,400 were allowed, not four.

Mr. SHERLEY. The committee permitted four as seeming to be warranted in view of the enlargement of their force and their work.

Mr. STAFFORD. The reason why I made this inquiry, particularly as to the Civil Service Commission, is that in the bill reported from the legislative subcommittee we granted the Civil Service Commission a lump-sum amount, if I remember correctly, for additional clerical services, recognizing that there were additional burdens placed upon the Civil Service Commission in providing examinations for the large corps of clerks that would be employed in the department service here.

Mr. GORDON. Is it the understanding of the Committee on Appropriations that under the Overman Act the executive departments of the Government are authorized, or, rather, the President is authorized, to transfer employees from one department in which they have nothing to do to another department of the Government? Is that comprehended in the Overman Act in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I may say that that is a new suggestion to me, but prior to the promulgation of the Executive proclamation forbidding the transfers of clerks from one department to another, without the express sanction of the heads of the departments concerned, they were privileged on their own initiative to make such a transfer upon the request of another department, but an abuse arose that required the Executive proclamation, because departments were vying with each other and bidding for the services of superior clerks, and the President, I believe, last December, issued a proclamation that forbade that practice.

But under the Overman law, as I recall it, the President would have authority to transfer clerks. Certainly for a long time the department heads have been authorized to detail clerks from one bureau to another. We have had instances of that called to our attention from time to time, where clerks in the Pension Bureau have been detailed to the office of the Secretary. In the consideration of the legislative bill many instances have been called to our attention where clerks were detailed from one bureau to another, permanently, for a year or more, to perform work in bureaus where their services were urgently needed.

I think under the scope of the Overman Act the President would have that authority. If he has authority to rearrange the bureaus and consolidate them——

Mr. GORDON. And transfer functions.

Mr. STAFFORD. And transfer functions, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, he would certainly have the power to transfer an incident of those functions, namely, the clerks to perform the work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Referring to the suggestion of the gentleman with reference to this particular appropriation for the Civil Service Commission, the gentleman will doubtless recall that when the Civil Service Commission appeared before the legislative subcommittee asking a lump-sum appropriation for additional clerks their estimate, if I mistake not, was for $300,000. The legislative subcommittee denied that estimate and gave them $150,000, for the reason that it was impossible at that time to determine just how many clerks they might possibly need to take care of this additional work, and with the idea at the time that if the Civil Service Commission found it necessary to have a larger appropriation they could come back and ask for a deficiency. Now, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has stated, this particular appropriation, as I understand it, does not involve the employment of a single clerk in addition to those now employed in the Civil Service Commission. As I understand it, the Civil Service Commission will have exhausted the $150,000 by January 1, and this appropriation is simply made to enable that commission to carry on its work for the balance of the fiscal year. The gentleman knows that the Civil Service Commission has had an enormous amount of work thrust upon it by reason of the thousands and thousands of employees who have been made necessary on account of the war, which has increased the examinations by many, many thousands.

Mr. STAFFORD. I quite agree with the statement of the chairman of the legislative subcommittee [Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee], but I can not agree with the logic or approve of the position as stated by him when he approved of the action of the Civil Service Commission in allotting for the period of six months the $150,000 which we allowed them for the entire year, and that that should be a warrant for them to come to Congress for a deficiency appropriation. I certainly must object to that course because there is a legislative mandate, a statutory law that forbids any department or bureau from allotting for any period less than a year the total appropriation that has been authorized for the entire year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will recall that prior to July 1, the Civil Service Commission had employed a large force out of an allotment of funds made to the commission by the President. Now, I do not understand that the Civil Service Commission have employed any additional clerks, but they have been carrying on the force that they had prior to July 1 in order to take care of this enormously increased work, and this appropriation is merely to enable them to continue that work. Otherwise I suggest to the gentleman that the Civil Service Commission, in which he so earnestly believes and for which he stands, would become inoperative, because it will be necessary to fill these various places outside of the civil service if we do not furnish the machinery for the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question? Our committee was, as I considered, quite liberal in voting clerks to the Civil Service Commission. The president of the commission came before our subcommittee and stated that they had received an allotment from the President's emergency fund. Our subcommittee declined to reimburse them for the money so used. Now, when our subcommittee voted the Civil Service Commission $150,000 for clerical service, was it not with the intention of providing for the clerical force over the 12-months' period.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, the legislative bill undertook to provide an appropriation for the entire fiscal year; but, I repeat, the gentleman will recall that they asked double the amount that the committee allowed them. The committee, in other words, reduced their estimate to $150,000, hoping that they would be able to get along with that sum, and for the reason that no one could tell at that time as to whether or not the present conditions would continue to prevail throughout the year. Now, the committee, as I say, reduced the estimates which the commission then thought they would need for this fiscal year, and they find now that they do need the full sum that was asked, and this appropriation is simply made to enable them to carry on their present work and not to increase their force.

Mr. STAFFORD. I certainly do not wish to deprive the Civil Service Commission of any clerical force that is necessary to carry on their work. Our subcommittee was reminded of the necessity of increasing their force temporarily to meet the exigent conditions occasioned by the war, in examining the papers of the thousands upon thousands of clerks who are needed during the war period. I merely rose to obtain some information from the chairman of the committee, so that I could have that information when preparing the next legislative bill. I withdraw the proforma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The increases in statutory salaries, contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, shall be allowed and paid from July 1, 1918, if the employees otherwise are entitled to receive them: Provided, That this paragraph shall not be applicable to any employee who left the service prior to September 1, 1918.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this paragraph. I do not recall any prior bill, where an appropriation bill carrying salaries has failed to be enacted before the close of the fiscal year, which has contained subsequent authorization carrying back the increased salaries to the beginning of the fiscal year. I may be in error in my recollection, but I would like to have some explanation of this exceptional practice of granting increased salaries for a period of three months when they were not voted by Congress.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, this matter was not at issue between the two Houses. The gentleman will recall that the District of Columbia appropriation bill was held up on three items. Both Houses agreed to these increases, notably in the police force. They were losing the policemen with great rapidity, and we granted them an increase—not a radical increase, but one which would hold members of the board. Under a promise or agreement, both Houses having agreed that the salaries should be the figures named in the bill, they were able to keep the employees. Now, we are carrying out in good faith the promise which was really made to the employees who were thereby held. But for that increase at that time we would have lost a great number of the best employees in the District of Columbia. I gave assurance to the District Commissioners that in my opinion both Houses of Congress would be very glad to put into effect what was their will expressed in the bill, which ought to have become a law before the 1st of July. The difference between the two Houses on the matter, to wit, the half-and-half plan, the McKellar item, and another small item, were the only items in difference. Therefore, feeling that the House had committed itself to that, I told the commissioners that they were warranted in saying that the very day the bill became a law they would get their salaries fixed in the bill and Congress would without hesitation give them up from the first of the fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman was assuming quite a responsibility.

Mr. SISSON. I know I did.

Mr. STAFFORD. The House has great confidence in the ability of the gentleman, and knows his acquaintance with the needs of the District, especially since he has been charged with the responsibility of reporting the appropriations necessary for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SISSON. Let me say to the gentleman that I did not do it without the absolute sanction of both Houses of Congress, in that they had agreed to the bill in all the other items except the three items I have mentioned.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not recall that the Congress had ever sanctioned any private understanding of the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know that any such statement was ever made on the floor of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. There was no private understanding, there was an actual concrete situation that confronted the District of Columbia. They had to hold their forces, and that was one of the reasons why Congress passed the increased salary in order to hold many employees. That particularly pertained to some employees—I think the police and other employees. The Congress agreed to the increase, and the bill, as the gentleman recalls, was held up by a fight over the half-and-half principle. In the meanwhile the Commissioners of the District of Columbia were confronted with the fact that their employees would not remain at the old salary and they were held under the statement that the bill carried an increase and as soon as it passed they would receive the increase as of the 1st of July. There was a general acquiescence on the part of everybody as to that situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means by "everybody"—whom? Does the gentleman include others than the subcommittee that had charge of the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. The situation was known in the House generally, and for my part I am perfectly willing to assume my part of the responsibility.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will accept the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi that there was such an understanding had with the District Commissioners, but I think it would have been better form to have provided in the resolution continuing the appropriations of the last appropriation bill an item that the salaries carried in the pending bill should be continued during the next fiscal year, as we did some years ago in continuing the appropriations of the Post Office appropriation bill, by providing an increase of salary for the rural mail carriers when that bill failed of passage. I called attention to this matter because I think it is exceptional practice to go back and vote salaries as of the first of the year. I was not acquainted with the fact that there was any private understanding——

Mr. SHERLEY. It was not a private understanding; there is no private understanding ever made by me as chairman of the Appropriations Committee with any department of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has there been any statement on the floor of the House in relation to this understanding? If so, I do not recall it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not positive of that fact, but it was understood as a matter of general knowledge.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am pretty well versed in the affairs which go on, and if it had been stated on the floor of the House I would not have arisen and called attention to the matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am willing to exempt the gentleman from any understanding of it—he may not have understood so—but I repeat that it was a matter of general understanding. I am quite sure that there was some newspaper comment in connection with it. It was simply the practical way of dealing with a concrete situation that had arisen; and if there had been no understanding, I still think it ought to be done.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am rising to make an inquiry as to the situation in good faith.

Mr. SHERLEY. And I am not objecting to the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. I had no knowledge of any understanding, private or otherwise, never heard of it in the Committee on Appropriations or on the floor, in connection with the various resolutions which have been presented by the gentleman from Mississippi extending the effect of the last District appropriation bill by reason of the snarl that the committee got into with reference to three items. If there had been any mention of it on the floor of the House, there would have been no necessity for my taking the floor.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not objecting to the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to say that, if there was any such understanding, I think it would have been better to have had some reference made to it on the floor of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps that is true; but if there was none made it was because of the belief that the situation was well understood.

Mr. STAFFORD. The District bill was under consideration several times, and no mention was made that the increase of salaries was going to be carried into effect as of the first of the year.

Mr. SISSON. Let me say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], the ranking Republican member of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCANDREWS], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], all understood that we were going to ask that salaries should take effect from the 1st of July.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that when he presented the various resolutions, extending the appropriations of the prior fiscal year, he should have made some reference in the House to the fact that that was to be the policy?

Mr. SISSON. I want to state to the gentleman that there was a very good reason in our minds why we did not do that. We thought we would get a better opportunity to get an agreement out of the Senate on the disagreeing items by not agreeing to this and letting pressure be brought upon the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's expectation failed upon that.

Mr. SISSON. It did not fail altogether.

Mr. STAFFORD. Upon the main item of the half-and-half principle, in which I was in entire sympathy with the gentleman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking that the telegram which I send to the desk be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOLYOKE, MASS., October 16.

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
Washington, D. C.:

Please inform President Wilson that Deane Works, of Worthington Pump & Machinery Corporation, after going the limit and subscribing 100 per cent strong for $175,000, an average of $135 per employee, have enrolled an unconditional-surrender club of 71 members, each subscribing for one more bond. Above figures show how we feel about backing the boys to a victorious finish.

CHARLES L. NEWCOMB,
Manager Deane Works, Holyoke, Mass.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. The emergency shipping fund provision of the urgent deficiency appropriation act of June 15, 1917, as amended by the act of April 22, 1918 (Public Act, No. 138 of the 65th Cong.), is hereby amended, as follows.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry, with the reservation of a point of order. The inquiry goes to the paragraphs, the first one of which has been read. Will we consider the item by paragraphs or by Titles I and II? We have just read lines 13 to 16 on page 3. Will that be considered a paragraph under the rule applying to appropriation bills? If so, I rise to make inquiries as to the purpose of this change in the law.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that as a matter of convenience each of the divisions can be considered separately. I shall undertake to explain the purpose of them, if the gentleman will permit the reading down to line 22, which will embrace the first paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should be very glad to do that, subject, of course, to the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that each subdivision should be considered as a separate paragraph, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(I) In subdivision (d) of paragraph 1, to begin said subdivision and to precede the words "to requisition," are now inserted the words: "To acquire, construct, establish, or extend any plant, and in pursuance thereof to purchase, requisition, or otherwise acquire title to or use of land, improved or unimproved, or interests therein; and".

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the two paragraphs which have just been read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlemen withhold that for a moment so that I may be permitted to obtain some information in respect to this particular subdivision?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to inquire wherein this increases the power of the Shipping Board?

Mr. SHERLEY. The language of the act creating the President's emergency shipping fund, in the opinion of the lawyers of the Shipping Board, seemed perhaps to be deficient in the power for the establishment of a plant and to be deficient in the power "to acquire title to the use of land improved or unimproved or interest therein," and inasmuch as we have been establishing plants, and inasmuch as we have been and it was desirable to acquire land, both improved and unimproved, it was felt that any legal question as to the power of the agents designated by the President under the act should be removed by this extension of language.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There has been some doubt, then, as to the legality of their acquiring certain ground?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a question as to whether any power existed for the acquiring of unimproved land or improved land that was not taken over directly as a shipbuilding plant. Personally, I have felt that the language which is in the existing law was broader than the doubt touching it seemed to imply, but it is a matter about which there ought not to be any doubt. For that reason, upon the representation of Mr. Whipple and Mr. Wehle, attorneys for the Shipping Board, this amendment is submitted to the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My recollection is that the powers heretofore conferred were very comprehensive.

Mr. SHERLEY. They were. As to paragraph (d) the act now reads as follows:

To requisition and take over for use or operation by the United States any plant or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire plant, whether the United States has or has not any contract or agreement with the owner or occupier of such plant.

Subsequently there was legislation increasing the appropriation to the President, and in making that appropriation language was used that clearly indicates to my mind the intention of Congress that the President, through such agencies as he might employ, should have the power to establish plants; so that I think that the only question that is really involved in the way of the extension of power is the question of making clear the power to acquire title or use of land improved or unimproved. Then there was some question which the lawyers raised as to whether taking over for use or occupation by the United States meant taking over simply for use and occupation or taking over the title. In some instances they have needed to do one, and in some instances they have needed to do the other. They simply wanted to make clear the power beyond peradventure of acquiring these plants and establishing plants and extending them and acquiring land in connection with them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman satisfied in view of these increased or stronger powers, a tightening up of the situation, that owners of property and property rights are adequately protected in the matter of compensation?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is provision in the law as originally drawn, and it was afterwards unnecessarily reput in as an amendment to the law that was reported by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, which carries the well-known provision about the fixing of a price, and if it be not agreeable to the owner of the property, the payment of 75 per cent of the price, leaving the owner to sue in the court for what additional sum he thought necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All those safeguards are maintained?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably. There is no intention in any way, of course, to take property without making provision for compensation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know whether the gentleman's especial attention has been called to the form of amendment adopted here, which follows in subsequent sections, but it is rather new in amendatory language. Lines 17 to 19, page 3, read as follows:

(I) In subdivision (d) of paragraph 1, to begin said subdivision and to precede the words "to requisition," are now inserted the words—

And so forth.

That is rather novel. May I inquire who prepared this?

Mr. SHERLEY. It was prepared by the attorneys of the Shipping Board. I undertook to rephrase it, and to set out just the way the whole paragraph would read, but it meant to carry into the bill a page or two of language, and I felt that it would be clearer to the House if they understood just what language was being inserted, and then have such explanation made as might be desirable. I had printed just for my own information a sheet here that undertook to show the way this law will read as amended, and I will be glad if the gentleman is not clear about any paragraph to explain it. For instance, I will state now for the RECORD that this paragraph which is now proposed to be amended if amended in this form would read as follows:

To acquire, construct, establish, or extend any plant and any appurtenances thereof, to purchase, requisition, or otherwise acquire title to or use of land improved or unimproved or interest therein, and to requisition and take over for use or operation by the United States any plant or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire plant, whether the United States has or has not any contract or agreement with the owner or occupier of such plant.

Mr. STAFFORD. I quite agree with the construction placed by the learned attorney and chairman of the committee that it was hardly necessary to amplify the existing language, but of course we wish to make certain the powers to be conferred on this board, and if the attorneys for the board have any question, of course, perhaps, it would be better to amplify it in plainer language.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will appreciate that we have appropriated something like $4,000,000,000 to the President to be expended in the creation of a merchant marine. Now, with such huge sums involved and with very large expenditures running into the millions of dollars, I did not feel like I ought to leave any question as to these necessary powers, even though my own judgment might be that the language heretofore used was sufficient. We do not want unnecessary lawsuits. We are going to have enough as a result of the war without unnecessarily having them if we can clarify and make plain what is intended by everybody.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LINTHICUM having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. OWEN, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

(II) In subdivision (f) of said paragraph 1, after the words "or assume control of," are now inserted the words "or to extend, improve, or increase, or cause to be extended, improved, or increased."

Mr. SHERLEY. The purpose of that is this: It is to make valid beyond any question what has been the practice of the Shipping Board for some time past in connection with the problem of housing incident to these shipping plants. It has been found that relief could be had frequently by improving the transportation to the plant from homes where the workmen were, and that by increasing street railway and steam railway facilities the necessity for building additional houses was eliminated. Now, that improvement can take place, and it has usually taken place, by extensions of existing facilities—where the track is a single track frequently the doubling of it, putting in switches and increasing the number of cars and the schedules by which many men can be accommodated at points some distance from the plant who otherwise could not be accommodated—and if it were not done the Government would be called upon either to get along with less labor or else greatly increase the houses for the workers at these plants.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is nothing in the report about this subdivision, and that is the reason I asked the gentleman whether this subdivision (f) pertained only to transportation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Subdivision (f) reads as follows without the amendment. (f) was an amendment that was placed on the original act by a special bill reported from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Relating to transportation?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am going to read it:

(f) To take possession of, lease, or assume control of any street railway, interurban railroad, or part thereof wherever operated, and all cars, appurtenances, and franchises or parts thereof commonly used in connection with the operation thereof necessary for the transfer and transportation of employees of shipyards or plants engaged or that may hereafter be engaged in the construction of ships or equipment therefor for the United States.

Now, that is the existing law. That as amended would read as follows:

To take possession of, lease, or assume control of.

Now comes the new language:

Or to extend, improve, or increase or cause to be extended, improved, or increased.

And then follows the language of the existing law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would mean if it was found necessary in order to move these workmen expeditiously to extend a road or put in a siding or make certain additions or increase of the service, the board would have power to do it?

Mr. SHERLEY. It means that, and, further, they have been doing just that thing. In order that there might be no question whether the language, "to take possession of, lease, or assume control of," permitted the right of extension of, they have asked this amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is another case of having the law made plain?

Mr. SHERLEY. Made perfectly clear that the powers they have been exercising and that are necessary to be exercised shall be warranted by the letter of the law.

Mr. ANDERSON. The literal interpretation of this language would seem to give the Shipping Board the power to extend the franchise. Of course, that is not intended?

Mr. SHERLEY. The language as it fits into the existing law would not make that possible. I will read the whole language——

Mr. ANDERSON. I have it here.

Mr. SHERLEY. The way it will read now is this:

(f) To take possession of, lease, or assume control of or extend, improve, or increase, or cause to be extended, improved, or increased, any street railroad, interurban railroad, or part thereof wherever operated, and all cars, appurtenances, and franchises or parts thereof commonly used in connection with the operation thereof—

And so forth.

Now, the word "franchise" there applies to the case of taking possession of and using powers under existing franchises. Manifestly, Congress could not confer upon this or any other body the right to extend franchises of street railways within the States, and, in point of fact, there is no intention so to do. And this language could not be used to confer such a power. I am glad the gentleman speaks of the matter, in order that there may be this expression on the floor of the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it ought to be perfectly clear.

Mr. SHERLEY. No such practice is being undertaken. In point of fact, they are not taking over the street railways at all. What they are doing is to help finance extensions and improvements in order to get the additional transportation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this amendment which the committee seeks to report mainly intended to authorize the Shipping Board to equip the existing street railways with additional facilities, rolling stock, and the like, so as to make them more serviceable in the transportation of men from the plants to their homes and from their homes to the plants?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and sometimes the situation is brought about by the building of a switch and additional trackage, so as not to have cars delayed in passing.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe that there is any authority in the Shipping Board at present to further increase their facilities in the purchase of cars, unless it was granted under the authority for the Shipping Board to finance these interurban corporations.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the gentleman will find there is a subsequent amendment looking to taking care of advances and loans in order to accomplish these purposes. In other words, instead of compelling the Government to build them or take them over and requisition them, what they have done—which is much more economical and satisfactory—is to loan the money or to finance things that they approve as necessary in order to increase their facilities.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have thought that instances would arise where they would be compelled to increase the rolling stock to such an extent to meet the exigent conditions of war time, and which would not be existent during peace times. I have in mind conditions in the great industrial territory south of Philadelphia. There is no question but what additional rolling stock, more than necessary in peace times, is required in these abnormal war times, and I think this provision is partly for the purpose of authorizing the Shipping Board to provide additional rolling stock.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true, except the way they have been providing, it has been to make loans to these corporations with the idea of enabling them thereby to improve their transportation systems.

The Clerk read as follows:

(III) After said subdivision (f) in said paragraph 1, a new subdivision is now inserted as follows:
"(g) In pursuance of the foregoing powers, or any of them, to make advance payments or loans of such amounts and upon such terms as the President may deem necessary and proper."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is what I alluded to a moment ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Pardon me a moment, if the gentleman pleases, but does this pertain to the same matter as the last subdivision?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it not only pertains to that, but it pertains to all the powers that have been given to the President in connection with the expenditure of the shipping fund. And it provides they can obtain extensions to plants or in the way of railway systems or other facilities, by making loans as against the Government making the actual expenditures. Now, the result of that is very greatly to reduce the amount of moneys that the Government has to spend, and these loans are made upon securities sufficient to guarantee their repayment. They already have, under express provision, authority in regard to housing.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does this provision legalize the right to concur in many of these contracts in which loans are made or advances are made?

Mr. SHERLEY. It would legalize this: If the President saw fit to permit moneys to be loaned with provision for only their partial payment, this would authorize it. But it is not my understanding that any such practice is being indulged in by the Shipping Board in connection with these extensions. But that is simply my impression, and I would not like to state it as a fact.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is being done by several other bureaus of the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not only is, but ought to be, and must be if you get things done. It is perfectly patent you can not get men to-day to undertake extensions of any plants at their own expense, with the superwar cost and with the risk of no continuing need after the war, unless the Government undertakes to bear part of the burden.

Mr. ANDERSON. I quite agree with the gentleman; but it does seem to me that a provision of this kind ought to be safeguarded a good deal more than I think this will be. It ought to come from the committee to whom legislation of this character ought to be referred.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I will be delighted beyond expression if all the various legislative committees of the House will take care of all the matters that are brought to the Committee on Appropriations. I send them there repeatedly, and that is the end of them. Now, when matters of real emergency for the prosecution of the war are necessary the committee must act, and, in point of fact, this power originated in the Committee on Appropriations.

The power under which they are spending this money was power which was carried in a deficiency act passed in June, 1917, and it had nothing to do with the shipping act, which came from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Personally I have no interest in the matter except to serve the Government, and if the gentleman thinks it ought to be delayed by going through the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I shall not object.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think the gentleman should take that attitude. He ought to be here to give information, and be willing to give it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have given it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think he ought to criticize people who are asking for information.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not. I am simply saying we are carrying it in this bill because of the circumstances. I tried to explain just what is involved. Now, the gentleman thinks it is not sufficiently circumscribed, and that it ought to be sent to another committee. If the House sees fit to do that, all right. I am not seeking to take power to the Committee on Appropriations in legislative matters.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(IV) In paragraph 8 of said provisions, after the word "shipyard," are now inserted the words "dry-dock, marine railway, pier." In said paragraph the words "or other facilities connected therewith" are stricken out and there are now inserted, after the word "terminal," the following words: "and any facilities or improvements connected with any of the foregoing descriptions of property."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that for the purpose of getting information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this was again an opinion of the lawyers, which I did not share, but which they urged with a good deal of insistence. The language now reads, in connection with the word "plant," as follows:

The word "plant" shall include any factory, workshop, warehouse, engine works, buildings used for manufacture, assembling, construction, or any process in shipyard, dry dock, marine railway, pier, or dockyard and discharging terminal, or other facilities connected therewith.

Now, the lawyers made two criticisms of that. One was that they had a question as to whether the word "shipyard" or "dockyard" embraced such things as dry dock, marine railway, or pier. To my mind they clearly do. The act, I think, was wisely drawn in generic terms, but they wanted to be sure, inasmuch as they are building dry docks and marine railways and piers, so that they made the insertion of the words after the word "shipyard."

Then, they had some question as to whether the words "other facilities connected therewith" qualified simply the language "discharging terminal" or whether they related to the shipyards or dockyards, and, not wanting to have any question about that, they suggested the striking out of the words "or other facilities connected therewith" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or other facilities or improvements connected with any of the foregoing descriptions of property." The purpose of the amendment was to clarify the existing statute. I again say that in my judgment the amendment was not necessary.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think it does clarify it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I worked over it with these distinguished lawyers, and they seemed to think it made more clear the situation.

Mr. MADDEN. My thought was that it made it more complex, because it seems to me you eliminate the facilities that are connected with the dry dock or the railway or the pier or the terminal; and, eliminating that, of course you do not in my judgment include the facilities to which the term applied.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps if I read the language as amended it would help to clarify it. The language would read as follows:

The word "plant" shall include any factory, workshop, warehouse, engine works, buildings used for manufacture, assembling or construction or any process in shipyard, dry dock, marine railway, pier, or dockyard and discharging terminal, or any facilities or improvements connected with any of the foregoing descriptions of property.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that covers the thing, and I suppose it would be considered that "other facilities connected therewith" would be surplusage.

Mr. SHERLEY. They thought that the words "other facilities connected therewith" now qualified simply a discharging terminal. What they wanted to do was to embrace facilities that pertain to shipyards or dry docks or dockyards or piers, or any of these other matters——

Mr. MADDEN. Or railroads——

Mr. SHERLEY. Or railroads; and for that reason they asked for the enlargement of power.

Mr. MADDEN. It ought to be. I thought at first it was rather restrictive, but after the reading of the language by the gentleman I think that covers it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have read that the Shipping Board proposes to build certain dry docks. There is no doubt that they have started work on some piers. They have built piers. They have built marine railways. Does the gentleman know whether dry-dock work has actually been started in any instance?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it has. The gentleman will note that immediately following this in the next section is a provision authorizing the acquisition or establishment of plants such as marine railways, dry docks, and so forth, to the extent of $34,662,500, and the hearings state very fully the places, the amounts, and what is contemplated to be done. On page 1335 of the hearings the gentleman will find a statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the page, please?

Mr. SHERLEY. Page 1335.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, as a matter of fact, the board has been going ahead, doing work on dry docks, marine railways, and piers.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Which will now be included in the law, so that there will be no question as to their authority to do this work?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true. The gentleman will find lists set out as to executed dry-dock contracts, covering three pages.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The purpose, then, is not only to facilitate the work but to leave no question about the authority of the board to do it?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is to make it perfectly plain that the powers they are exercising were powers that were conferred.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And warranted by law?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I think possibly this matter has been brought to the gentleman's attention, but I wanted to ask him with reference to the unusual phraseology of these amendments. It seemed to me that it would be better if these amendments might be made in the manner in which it has been the custom to amend existing legislation. It says the words are stricken out and they are now inserted, and so forth.

Mr. SHERLEY. I explained a few moments ago——

Mr. WALSH. I am sorry I was not here.

Mr. SHERLEY. I undertook to present it so that the law would appear as it is proposed to be amended; but in order to do that it would have been necessary to print a couple of pages of the old law as revised, and I thought that the changes were sufficiently plain so that I could indicate, as I have endeavored to, just what the meaning was. In each instance I have undertaken to set out in the RECORD exactly the way the law would read as amended. I have here a print giving the law as it would be as amended.

Mr. WALSH. I came in just as the gentleman was reading that, and I did not know what question brought out his response. But may I direct the gentleman's attention to this? In line 10, page 4, if you strike out the words "are now inserted" and insert in place thereof the word "insert," so that it will read—

> In paragraph 8 of said provisions, after the word "shipyards," insert the words "dry-dock, marine railway, pier"—

That would make it perfectly clear. The point I make is that I am afraid to use the phraseology "are now inserted" might lead to some doubt in case of interpretation of the legislation by the courts. I just wanted to get the gentleman's idea.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think there would be any question about it. If you do that, you have got to rearrange the paragraph. For instance, following that you will come to the language:

> In said paragraph the words "or other facilities connected therewith" are stricken out and there are now inserted, after the word "terminal," the following words: "and any facilities or improvements connected with any of the foregoing descriptions of property."

You would have to rearrange it so that it would read:

> In said paragraph strike out the words "or other facilities connected therewith" and insert, after the word "terminal," the words "and any facilities or improvements connected with any of the foregoing descriptions of property."

Mr. WALSH. I know the gentleman has given careful consideration to the matter, and I just wanted to be sure that it would not lead to any doubt as to the meaning of the language.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not; and in order to safeguard it I have read into the RECORD the way the provision that is being amended will read as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, answering a question a few minutes ago, called attention to a list of dry-dock contracts to be found on page 1337 of the hearings. As it is not likely that these hearings will be read outside of Congress, I think it is rather important to put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a brief summary of the contracts as they are set forth in this statement. Mr. Piez, of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, was on the stand, and in response to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], he put in the following data as to executed dry-dock contracts. I shall read only the names of the companies, the location of the dock, and the estimated cost of the dock. That will be sufficient information for the present.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest that the gentleman simply put into the RECORD the entire table not only as to dry docks but the one that follows, as to marine railway contracts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall be glad to do that. I ask permission to have that done, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the table referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

Data as to executed dry-dock contracts.

No. of contracts.	Name of company and location of dock.	Work to be done.	Estimated cost.	Investment of contractor.	Amount of loan.	Final payment when due.	Security.		Write off.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Meanwhile, and not necessarily because the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] made a political speech a while ago in which he referred to "the millions and millions" that "somebody" was pouring into certain political campaigns but because I think it would be interesting information to him as a student of these financial questions, I shall read off hurriedly this list of Government contracts that have been going into certain sections of the country. While they are not in the nature of slush funds, of course, and are only for patriotic purposes, they are highly important locally.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the gentleman propose to read a lesson of instruction to the gentleman from Alabama? Is it something that the gentleman is going to give out himself?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I was going to put it into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because I thought it might be highly beneficial to the gentleman in his study of these political and financial questions.

Contract No. 1, Alabama Dry Dock & Shipbuilding Co., Mobile, Ala., estimated cost $560,000.

Contract No. 2 (superseded by contract No. 6).

Contract No. 3, Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation (Ltd.), Sparrows Point, Md., estimated cost $2,300,000.

Contract No. 4, Beaumont Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., Beaumont, Tex., estimated cost $450,000.

Contract No. 5, Galveston Dry Dock & Construction Co., Galveston, Tex., estimated cost $761,319.

Contract No. 6 (superseded by contracts Nos. 8 and 9).

Contract No. 7, Jahncke Shipbuilding Co. (Inc.), New Orleans, La., estimated cost $770,000.

Contract No. 8, Terry & Brittain, Jacksonville, Fla., estimated cost $775,000.

Contract No. 9, Terry & Brittain, Savannah, Ga., estimated cost $589,000.

Now, as to the marine railway contracts, perhaps I ought to put them in just here.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will ask the gentleman if he does not know that more money is expended in his district for war purposes than all the items that he has read for these southern States?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I do not know that, and I question very much if that is the fact.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will furnish the information to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman, in his study of financial subjects, will put these figures in the RECORD, I will circulate them in my district, because it would be very interesting to the people there to know it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will give the gentleman the statistics for all the States in a few days, which will show that ten, fifteen, and twenty times more money is being spent in each northern State than in any southern State, and more in the gentleman's own State than in all the southern States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be very complimentary to "the gentleman from Pennsylvania," but I question whether the compliment the gentleman from Alabama pays to "the gentleman from Pennsylvania" is well bestowed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it is complimentary to the gentleman from Alabama to have it known that while he makes beautiful speeches here reflecting on the Republican Party and charging enormous slush funds, and things of that kind, from the days of Ballinger down, the gentleman himself has had his hands in the trough and yanked a few contracts down to Alabama. It is one of those peculiar political phenomena worth considering when the gentleman gets on his feet and makes speeches in defense of the administration. I hope the gentleman will listen, because this is interesting to him, and it ought to be interesting to his people. It is sort of an answer to the charges the gentleman has made:

Henderson Shipbuilding Co., Mobile, Ala., cost $100,000.

Newcomb Lifeboat Co., Hampton, Va., estimated cost $100,000.

Crowninshield Shipbuilding Co., Somerset, Mass., estimated cost $100,000.

Beaumont Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., Beaumont, Tex.

Cumberland Shipbuilding Co., Portland, Me., a similar estimate.

Tampa Dock Co., Tampa, Fla., a similar estimate.

Federal Marine Railway Co., Savannah, Ga., a similar estimate.

Terry & Brittain, Jackson, Fla., a similar estimate.

Barnes & Tibbetts Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., Alameda, Cal., estimated cost $110,000.

American Dredging Co., Camden, N. J., which is opposite the district of "the gentleman from Pennsylvania," no money loaned.

So, for the purpose of the record, it is well to have people understand that while we are all intensely patriotic, the gentleman from Alabama simply topping the climax when it comes to intensive and vociferous patriotism, the gentleman is still reaching down into the trough for the benefit of his own State and getting something out of it. Perhaps it is not well for gentlemen who live in glass houses to throw stones, but whether this advice will be followed by the gentleman from Alabama I do not know. Let him have the credit and glory of getting something for his district, now that he is in power and stands pat at the White House gate. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care either to invoke or take part in the controversy between Members of the House, but I think we ought to keep the record straight as we go along. Now, the trouble with my genial friend from Pennsylvania is that he looked at only one table in connection with the contracts that are executed. If he will turn to pages 1331 and 1332 of the hearings he will find a statement of the proposed contracts which totals $34,662,500, and they are divided as follows:

Proposed construction.

One 10,000-ton dry dock at Portland, Me	$2,100,000
One dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H.	900,000
(Boston, Mass.), bonus for the completion of the Commonwealth dock	250,000
Three 10,000-ton floating dry docks	6,500,000
Three 3,200-ton marine railways to be located at Providence, R. I.; Seattle, Wash.; and Astoria, Oreg.	760,000
One 10,000-ton dry dock at Fall River, New London, or Providence	2,100,000
Ten dry docks—New York Harbor, 10,000 to 20,000 ton capacities	25,000,000
Three 10,000-ton floating dry docks at Philadelphia	10,000,000

[Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

One 10,000-ton dry dock at Baltimore, Md.	2,100,000
One 10,000-ton floating dry dock, Norfolk Harbor	2,100,000
Financial assistance for completion of 7,500-ton dock, Charleston, S. C.	300,000
One 5,000-ton floating dry dock, Pensacola, Fla.	350,000

That makes a total of $52,460,000, and less the available balance of $17,797,500 leaves $34,662,500 that is being carried in this bill.

Then as to the actual or estimated commitments for marine railways the gentleman will find a list totaling $878,500, and they are at various places along the coast.

I want to say this seriously, aside from the pleasantries exchanged which take place from time to time on the floor, that the dry docks are being located at these places where the shipping warrants their being placed. They are not being placed either North or South because it is North or South, and no appropriation has ever been made by the Committee on Appropriations while I have been a member of the committee that have been predicated upon geographical considerations from a political sense. The committee does not consider these matters, and the departments, in spending these huge sums of money, do not consider it. It so happens that a very large proportion of the money is spent north of Mason and Dixon's line, and that follows simply because of the fact that a great portion of the commercial industrial development of the country is now north of Mason and Dixon's line, and it has not been to play politics one way or the other. I think the country ought to understand and appreciate that while we occasionally have a little fun with each other, the Congress of the United States and the departments have forgotten geographical positions in the political sense of the term. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

3. The United States Shipping Board shall not require payment from the War Department for the charter hire of vessels furnished or to be furnished from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, for the use of that department when such vessels are owned by the United States Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that. I would like very much to have the chairman of the committee explain why it was thought wise to forego the charge by the Shipping Board to the War Department. Of course, I realize that it all comes out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was the major reason. There were submitted as estimates in connection with the transportation of the Army an estimate for the pay of charter hire for all the vessels that would be used by the Army in connection with the transportation of troops and supplies. As to those vessels which the Government does not own, of course, we must repay the United States Shipping Board for the charter hire that it has to pay, but it did not seem to the committee wise in this day of tremendous appropriations to have to appropriate for the Army to pay to the Shipping Board, and it simply involved unnecessary bookkeeping and unnecessary appropriations, and as a result of that and a revision of the whole cost of charter hire there has been a reduction of about 189 million and odd dollars made in the estimates under the head of transportation of the Army.

Mr. MADDEN. I was not here yesterday when the gentleman explained the bill, and I see that his remarks are not yet printed.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will appreciate that I have not had a chance to revise my figures, and I wanted to be absolutely accurate.

Mr. MADDEN. If it is not inconsistent with the public policy to answer this, if the gentleman can tell, I would like to know what the cost per capita of this transport is where our men sail on foreign-owned ships.

Mr. SHERLEY. The charter hire, where we charter a ship, averages about $9.20 a dead-weight ton. That includes the ship with its crew and officers. The allied steamers chartered average about $11 a ton, and the American steamships, which were requisitioned and which includes the naked ship without a crew and officers, is $5.64 a dead-weight ton.

Mr. MADDEN. What does that make the individual passenger cost?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no computation on that. I doubt if it could be obtained without a pretty elaborate calculation, because many ships have a dead-weight ton capacity and a passenger-carrying capacity very much different from what another ship of the same dead-weight ton capacity would have, due somewhat to construction.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it would be interesting if these figures could be compiled, because I know there is a feeling in many quarters throughout the country that we are paying a good deal more for the transportation of our troops to the allied nations who are furnishing ships than they are justified in charging. I would not undertake to say that that is true, but there is a general feeling that it is true.

Mr. SHERLEY. This is true. The impression which existed in some quarters that we were getting ships furnished free by some of our allies for the movement of our troops or supplies is not warranted. I think there was one ship from a South American nation that was furnished to the United States Government for one or more trips free of charge, but with that exception we are paying for all of the tonnage that we use.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course we could not expect to get it free, and ought not to.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand we could not; but I simply wanted to make that statement in view of the impression that was in the minds of some that our allies were bearing the burden of transporting our troops. They have been very generous in the giving over to us ships for that use, and of course that has meant, necessarily, the curtailment of ships used in their commercial trade on routes that have been long established. It was only what was to be expected, however, from allies who were cooperating with us in using the united forces of all nations in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. MADDEN. I heard it said—whether there is any truth in it or not, and whether it is proper for me to make the statement for the RECORD I would not undertake to say; and if it is not true I would not want it to go into the RECORD—that the charge made by Great Britain for the transportation of our soldiers averages $150 per man for carrying them across. I do not know a thing about the truth of that, but those who told me claimed they have knowledge of the facts. If any such charge is being made, I think it is excessive and our Government ought not to permit it.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I have no knowledge whatever about that; but I question whether anyone is in a position to make a statement of that kind upon anything other than wild speculation, because the ships are not used on the basis of per capita cost of transportation.

Mr. MADDEN. No; but it would figure up.

Mr. SHERLEY. But there are so many varying factors in regard to each ship that I question very much whether anybody has figured it out.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it would be an interesting tabulation and ought to be figured up.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no information about it. It did not occur to me to make that particular inquiry at the time the matter was under consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD.

For expenses of the War Industries Board, including personal and other services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, rent of offices and grounds, traveling expenses, per diem in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4, supplies and equipment, law books, books of reference, periodicals, newspapers, repair and upkeep of buildings, and printing and binding, $2,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman from Kentucky make a statement as to the personal services provided for in this item, which includes traveling expenses, rent, etc., running up to $2,000,000. This is the board of which Mr. Baruch is chairman?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is what has resulted from the old Council of National Defense?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is simply what was a part of the Council of National Defense. It was carved out of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It grows out of the Council of National Defense?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The head of it is Mr. Baruch?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is the real center of the entire system with regard to distribution of supplies, labor, and so forth. May I ask whether the members of the War Industries Board are paid a salary?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I think a few of them are, but I can not give the gentleman that exact fact. They asked for a total sum of $3,765,825, and they had divided it under various heads in connection with the salaries of the employees attendant upon the members of the board, on the price-fixing committee, on the administration, and the various committees that are operating under this War Industries Board.

There is no possible way by which we could determine absolutely just what moneys were needed. All of this money is practically for the payment of salaries of employees, with the exception of that which goes to a limited extent for printing, stationery, furniture, and other equipment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The board is divided up into departments according to the business, occupations, or industries, and very many men who are prominent in those industries are here in Washington a great deal of their time in conjunction with the board. They are given credit for patriotic and self-sacrificing work.

Mr. SHERLEY. There are 243 of those men who draw $1 a year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This has come now to be a permanent institution. They started out as $1 a year men on patriotic lines and they were enthusiastic in offering their services to the Government. I want to know whether we continue to pay them only $1 a year or whether now, by reason of the War Industries Board having come to be a permanent institution, those men are still devoting their services to the Government and the War Industries Board substantially without compensation?

Mr. SHERLEY. Two hundred and forty-three of them are. If the gentleman will turn to page 1097 of the hearings, he will find the number of employees and the salaries that are being paid. On page 1098 he will find the salaries according to the character of occupation of the employees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman a plain question. Does Mr. Baruch derive any compensation from the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. I have no doubt Mr. Baruch actually spends considerable money out of his own pocket and he himself gets no salary or compensation of any kind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He is here necessarily most of his time, and probably has given up all other business. Mr. Baruch is a very wealthy man, because it was reported only recently that he very patriotically subscribed for $1,000,000 worth of the fourth liberty loan, a very creditable thing for him to do. I would like to know whether such men are expected to stay here in Washington throughout the year, as Mr. Baruch is doing, without receiving any compensation whatever?

Mr. SHERLEY. I doubt if Mr. Baruch would accept any compensation, and I suspect that is true as to a considerable number of these other 243 men. There are a number of experts who are being paid salaries somewhat commensurate with their value, not what they would get commercially but a living value, and the gentlemen will find that set out. I want to say this touching the general work of the War Industries Board. The wisdom or lack of wisdom with which that board performs its functions will have more to do with the real production of this country in the way of war material than any other single agency in the Government. Its work is of the very first magnitude and can not be exaggerated in its importance. It is a great work. To-day they are being required to say to private industry, "You shall curtail your industry to a certain extent." They are also saying to private industry, "You shall stabilize your prices and ask only a certain maximum price." They have done that recently in regard to shoes by the elimination of many unnecessary styles and the standardizing of the different prices of shoes and fixing the price, and they have made it possible for the shoe industry to continue to manufacture at a reasonable profit and yet supply to the country shoes at very much less retail than under the old competitive condition in which each manufacturer had to make many more different styles than there was any real need for and which if he did not make he would suffer by virtue of the competition of other manufacturers who did. Now, that is a fair sample of much of the work that has come more and more within the domain of the War Industries Board. Then, as the gentleman well knows, all priorities in connection with Government work must be cleared through the War Industries Board, both as to raw material and many finished articles which go to make the raw material of some other article.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr Chairman, I appreciate the force of what the gentleman says. I think he has made a correct analysis of the work of this board and of its usefulness, but my inquiry was directed with a view of ascertaining how many men still devote their services to the Government for nothing, and he has answered by giving the figures——

Mr. SHERLEY. Two hundred and forty-three.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These men are more or less interested, many of them, in the particular lines of industry they are called to sit in judgment upon as representatives of the War Industries Board. Complaints have come to me from many people who are interested in one line of business or another with respect to the manner in which they are obliged to go to their competitors to obtain a judgment from the War Industries Board. That is to say, a man who may be an importer in a certain line of business——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A man who may be an importer and who desires certain information with regard to his particular line of business finds upon inquiry of the War Industries Board that the whole matter, which is vital to him and may also be vital to the Nation, is intrusted to his chief competitor, and that if he has any business secrets he must reveal them to his competitor who holds this position with the Government at a nominal consideration. It has occurred to me that it might be well for this Nation to pay its officers, even on the War Industries Board, so that it could have a check upon them and might at least know that the industry was getting a fair deal. I assume we do not want to crush business competition.

Mr. SHERLEY. In answer to that, I will say to the gentleman this, expressing simply my own thoughts, that I do not believe that the paying of any salaries to these men of high place is going to insure in any degree their honor. Unless a man is a man of honesty in the first instance, the paying to him of $15,000 salary or $25,000 salary is not going to have any effect. The only other remedy to prevent the situation that he complains of—and I am not admitting it is not the usual situation, but I think it will be found the exception rather than the rule—would be to obtain men who had the requisite information and were not engaged in any way in commercial life, and that is very much easier proposed than done. You are more or less bound to take men who are leaders in the trades that they are dealing with if you are to get that information which is a necessary predicate for action and judgment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Inasmuch as I think there is still time, let me ask the gentleman this: The last provision in this bill contemplates the appointment of a "war salvage commission" of seven men, to be appointed by the President, whose salaries are not to exceed $10,000 per annum. If we can get 234 patriotic men who are willing to serve in the War Industries Board for nothing—although many people suggest that their interest in their particular lines of business may be of some concern to them—why can not we get seven men to serve on this war salvage commission who are equally patriotic with the men in the War Insdustries Board?

Mr. SHERLEY. We could, and for that reason, when I read that, I avoided the payment of $10,000 salary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would not want them to serve for a dollar a year.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not going to admit, myself, that I can make a man honest, whom I entrust with responsibilities that run into the millions and maybe the billions, by paying him $10,000 a year. He is going to be honest because he is honest, or he is going to be dishonest because he is dishonest, and not because of the $10,000. It is too small to count as a factor, but the reason that I provided for a compensation of $10,000, if necessary, is this: There are men in the country who are men of high intelligence and ability and who have the means to serve for nothing, and I did not want to exclude such men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I think I might perform some services to my Government that are of value. I trust I am doing it now, but it so happens that I would not be able to do it unless I received some compensation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SHERLEY. And that is true of a good many of us.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will place the gentleman's ability, his integrity, and his patriotism against that of any man in the War Industries Board who is serving for a dollar a year. For that reason I would not prejudice the right of such gentlemen as he to serve on that board. We would do so if we permitted to serve only those who are willing to serve for nothing.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nobody is prohibited from paying salaries to members on the War Industries Board, and, in point of fact, they are paying salaries to some men whose circumstances make it necessary.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman explain how these dollar-a-year men came to serve on this board?

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the gentleman answers that question, will he permit me to ask——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin in a moment.

I will answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] by saying they are appointed by the President. Mr. Baruch was appointed by the President under the act, as I recall it. I have not gone into the matter for some months, but at the time the Council for National Defense was formed it was provided it should consist of certain Cabinet officers, and that then under them there might be such subsidiary committees and commissions as were thought desirable. I say "appointed by the President." I do not think that he undertakes in each instance to pick out the individual man, but men in whom he has confidence in working out the constantly changing and growing problems suggest men for that particular work. The committee did not go into the matter at this time because we could not go into it.

Mr. KREIDER. I am not criticizing——

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand.

Mr. KREIDER. I am simply asking for information.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am explaining why I can not give the gentleman quite the information I would like to give. My impression is that the men who are engaged in this work are men who have all met with the approval of the President or those gentlemen in his counsel whom he trusts.

Mr. KREIDER. I wish to say that I have been approached by at least one man, and he asked me this question that I have propounded to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I was unable to answer him. That is the reason why I wanted to know.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the question was propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee was discussing the question of the salary of the members of the salvage commission. I wish to direct an inquiry to the gentelman as to whether he has considered fixing the salaries of the members of this commission on a per diem basis for the days they serve in doing this work?

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not; and for this reason: I believe that any man who is put on that commission ought to be prepared to give all his time to it. It is a big enough job to engage the entire attention of the ablest men that exist to-day anywhere.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, the thought occurred to me that the character of men we should have should be men of great business ability, heads of great manufacturing establishments, who are to-day receiving, maybe, $100,000 a year as salary, and who would be only too glad, like these dollar-a-year men are, to give sufficient time to the great problems connected with the salvage of Government establishments, and yet would not be willing to and could not give their entire time to that work; and to award them a compensation as we do in other instances of $25 a day would tend to make them perfectly willing to do this service.

For instance, Mr. John Dodge, of Dodge Bros., is recognized everywhere as one of the great industrial leaders of the country. He might be only too glad to serve and give his best thought and study to the great problems that will come before the salvage commission, and yet, if he were paid a year's salary, it might preclude him from serving, as an annual salary presupposes that he was to give all of his time to the work, and he could not give all of his time to it by reason of his present responsible business engagements.

Mr. SHERLEY. The provision does not require the payment of $10,000. It does not even require the payment of the same amount to different individuals. It simply provides that they shall not be paid more than $10,000 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes that under the form of the phraseology all these civilian commissioners will get the same salary?

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope not, because I think some of them ought not to receive the same salary as others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. STAFFORD. While the subject is under consideration I merely wish to advance this thought: I know the gentleman from Kentucky has given it much more thought than I have, although since it was proposed before the general committee I have been revolving it in my mind. I think this work will require the very highest order of business ability, and the men you wish to obtain are men who are now engaged in the management of large industrial enterprises; not the cast-offs and the business scraps of industry, but big men receiving $50,000 and $100,000 a year salary. They are perfectly willing to serve and study at night, and make examination of these sites, and make hurried trips, at whatever compensation the Government sees fit to pay. If you make the maximum salary $10,000 you are not going to get, in my opinion, that character of men, and that is the character of men we should obtain. By paying them a per diem salary you do not foreclose them from accepting, but fix a yearly salary and they are precluded because these other engagements prevent them from giving all their time to this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For employees in the Department of State, $136,000: Provided, That not more than six persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the legislative appropriation bill for the present fiscal year we granted to the Secretary of State a considerably increased amount for clerical services which he had not been previously authorized to have, namely, $200,000. Now, we have here an additional appropriation. That $200,000 was in addition to the appropriations to his regular statutory force and temporary employees, the latter carrying, respectively, $54,000 and $73,000, which have been carried the last several years.

I wish to inquire what is the special need of giving him an additional appropriation of $136,000 so shortly after the Secretary of State came before the committee in the preparation of the legislative appropriation bill? When we prepared the legislative appropriation bill the war was at its peak. We granted to him all, or nearly all, I believe, that he asked for additional clerical services. We have been voting to this department thousands and thousands of dollars right along for additional clerical services. What is the occasion now of voting $136,000 more for the remainder of the fiscal year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that this appropriation does not contemplate increasing the force now employed in the Department of State. In other words, it does not provide for any additional clerks, but it simply is to enable the State Department to take care of the force that it now has employed. The gentleman will notice that it does not provide for an increase of pay of any clerks, and the same limitation is put upon this appropriation as was carried on the original appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, in that particular I make a different construction of the present provision from that which the gentleman has just made. Under the existing legislative bill there is a limitation that out of the $200,000 not more than six persons shall be employed at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 a year. Now, you make an appropriation of $136,000 and enact the same provision. I take it that under this appropriation of $136,000 he could employ six additional persons at salaries above $1,800 per annum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. This provision here is simply intended to carry along the six persons who were employed on the original appropriation at salaries exceeding $1,800, and it is not contemplated by the State Department to pay anyone out of this sum, or the original sum, more than $1,800, with the exception of the six persons.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice, in just glancing over the hearings, that the gentleman was present when this item was under consideration before the subcommittee, and I wish to inquire for what purposes are these large sums to be used? I have glanced over it, not reading it as carefully as I should, but it gives the impression that the State Department wants this additional amount for the employment of economists and other expert employees to study conditions leading up to the preparation of peace terms.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I will say to the gentleman that this particular appropriation, as explained by the State Department, is not to be used for the employment of experts such as economists.

Mr. STAFFORD. On page 832 I find this colloquy:

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just what will you need men of these qualifications for—

Referring to the question answered previously as to there being economists and men of that type.

Mr. Carr says:

Because in the work of preparing for the peace conference, post-war commerce, treaty revision, and examination of claims there must be made a number of studies of economic conditions, political conditions, and legal questions that can not be made by the ordinary clerk. We have to have men of more ability for that kind of work; also men who can take charge of the handling of correspondence, and the direction of action upon it, and so on.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman noted on page 836, beginning near the top of the page, the questions that I asked Mr. Carr? I think my questions and Mr. Carr's answers make it very clear that the amount which we have granted to the department simply provides for the force they now have; but it will give them authority to grant larger salaries to some six clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman from Wyoming takes a different position, in construing this paragraph, to that of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not so understand.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that we provide for the force that is now in the department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. MONDELL. But that we do provide for six new salaries in excess of $1,800.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are not new salaries. They are simply to carry six employees who are now employed in the State Department at salaries exceeding $1,800. I am quite sure that it is not the purpose of the State Department to employ out of this sum more than six people at salaries exceeding $1,800. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that the original estimate submitted by the State Department calls for $250,000. It appeared in the hearings that it was the purpose of the State Department to use $50,000 of that sum for the employment of experts—economists and others of expert ability and qualifications. It further appeared in the hearings that they are employing quite a number of men of expert ability and paying them out of the $700,000 appropriated in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, with which the gentleman is familiar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Quite familiar.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee felt that since they were using the $700,000 fund, or a portion of it, for the employment of experts who are economists, and so forth, it would hardly be wise to make an appropriation here of $50,000 and give them two funds for the same purpose. And hence the committee cut out the $50,000, and also reduced the estimate to $136,000, so as not to provide for the employment of a clerical force in addition to the force now employed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not understand the viewpoint of the State Department. They came before the legislative subcommittee in January of this year and asked for an appropriation of $264,000. The original appropriation that they asked for was $120,000. After careful consideration we voted them $200,000, and that is in the existing law. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee states that this $136,000 is not for the employment of any additional employees, but merely for those employees now in the department. There must be a conflict there, because the State Department is subject to the same law as other departments that does not permit them to employ any additional employees except those for which appropriations are carried in the appropriation bill. There is an inconsistency in the gentlemen's position. He says it is not for the employment of any more employees, and yet the department has no authority to employ any greater number of employees than those covered in the $200,000 that the Congress voted them in the legislative bill. I think some explanation should be made of that position on the part of the State Department.

Mr. MONDELL. The State Department estimated that the sum of $250,000 was needed for additional employees, and they stated very clearly the purposes for which these people were to be employed. They asked that out of that additional appropriation for employees they might pay 25 a sum in excess of $1,800. They clearly indicated the character of the employment proposed. It developed in the hearings that, under the appropriation of $200,000 which was granted in the legislative bill, the State Department had employed a sufficient number of people to amount to a pay roll of $336,000 for the year. In other words, their present pay roll is $136,000 for the year in excess of the appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How is the State Department authorized to employ a clerical force that requires the payment of $336,000 when the legislative appropriation bill, which was the basis for their employment of their clerical force, only authorized them to employ at the annual rate of $200,000?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not recall at this moment just the exact language of the provision in the legislative bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] may have it before him, but I have assumed, from the statement of the State Department, that that appropriation of $200,000 was so worded that the State Department could use their discretion to a certain extent in the employment of people under it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The language is very general. It says:

For additional employees in the Department of State, $200,000.

That does not mean $200,000 for one month. It means $200,000 for the entire year.

Mr. MONDELL. Not necessarily. Under general language of that sort the State Department would be fully justified in increasing its employees above a force that could be maintained for $200,000 for the entire year.

They might need all the services in 30 or 60 days, and then the work would be completed. The Congress very clearly did not intend to give them the sum of $200,000 to be distributed through 12 months, divided into 12 sums. The department, acting within its discretion, has increased its pay roll so that it will amount to $336,000 for the year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that it is the gentleman's construction of the law that the heads of departments, when we have voted a lump sum for employees during the entire year, can utilize the lump sum in any one month, and then come to Congress for additional appropriation? Is not the gentleman aware of the provision of the law carried in the sundry civil act which requires the heads of departments to allot appropriations to the respective quarters throughout the year and not exceed them?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming does not pretend to know so much about the fine points of legislative limitation in regard to employments as the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is an expert in that particular line. My opinion is that the appropriation granted in the form in which this was need not be allotted by months.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DEWALT). The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The department must necessarily exercise its good judgment and discretion in making up its force under that kind of an appropriation. Congress may decide when the sum is used up to make no further appropriation for that purpose. The State Department made so good a showing that the committee was of the opinion that we should grant them a sum sufficient to keep a force of the present size, not necessarily the same force, but a force of the present size continually employed. As one member of the committee, my further understanding is that they can increase the salaries of six of these additional employees above $1,800, but in that event it might be necessary for them to somewhat limit their present force. At any rate, we do not grant them any new employees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask the indulgence of the gentleman from Kentucky a moment. I had marked an inquiry on the War Trade Board paragraph, and while it is going back the gentleman can explain the matter in a moment or two. The transfer to its own use of the amounts collected by a bureau is rather an unusual proceeding, and I want to ask the gentleman why it was permitted in this case.

Mr. SHERLEY. Some time ago, when the sundry civil bill was up, the War Trade Board called the attention of the committee to the fact that they were required to expend a considerable amount of money in cable charges at the instance of the exporters; that it was subsequently repaid, and that if they were required to cover it into the Treasury they would have to ask in the appropriations for a larger sum of money in order to take care of this expense. We therefore carried a provision that the sums collected from the exporters for telegraph tolls should be usable by the department, they having paid the money out in the first instance. At that time they neglected to call attention to the fact that the same thing occurred as to importers and others who did not come within the technical term of exporters. As the gentleman knows, the War Trade Board has absolute control over imports and exports, and necessarily matters affecting exporters and importers, frequently urgent, are brought to their attention, and at the instance of these people they expend large sums in cables to find out facts upon which action may be predicated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I should think it a dangerous practice to allow moneys to remain in the hands of a bureau in this way.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the only money they get is the money to reimburse them for money paid out of an appropriation that Congress has made, and Congress has the control of it because it only gives certain moneys for the War Trade Board during the year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Money collected by a department ought to go into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, ordinarily; but you could not estimate how much money would be needed for cables and telegraph tolls; it would require $300,000 or $400,000 more appropriation for the War Trade Board.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did it appear that the cable charges amounted to a considerable sum in 1918?

Mr. SHERLEY. In three months it amounted to $115,506.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That money actually remains in the custody of the War Trade Board.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it was in the custody of the War Trade Board in the first instance, and they paid the bills amounting to that much and then collected them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But did not turn them into the Treasury when collected?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And in that they deviated from the ordinary rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. We gave them that permission in regard to exporters.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the idea is to sanction that practice hereafter?

Mr. SHERLEY. We carried a provision in the sundry civil bill in regard to the exporters. We now add "importers and all other sources." It is for cable charges that the War Trade Board has paid out. I sympathize with what I know is in the gentleman's mind—that we ought not to have a department get funds from outside sources and have them reexpended, but here is a matter that is limited to the cable charges, and it did not seem that there could be any abuse of it. They pay out the cable costs in the first instance, and they have to because the private people are not permitted to use the cable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. These private parties could not use the cable except through the Government, practically, because the Government absorbs the use of the cable. Now, the individual exporter or importer needs to ascertain certain data in connection with his license that the War Trade Board issues to him. They come, and the War Trade Board incurs the expense of the cable, and after they ascertain what the expense is it is paid by the importer or exporter when it is a charge that properly belongs to him. Then that money simply goes to reimburse the fund they have had.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it is not entered up in any way to appear to be a part of the Treasury of the United States. That is the point I am making. I think that is rather a dangerous proposition. I know how careful the gentleman is, but I want to make this brief statement in his time. Some years ago a situation just like this existed in the Treasury Department with regard to passports, affidavits, and small fees collected, with the result that there was a defalcation. It happened that the defaulter was bonded to the Government, and the Government in course of time was protected, but it was a condition that ought not to have existed. That money should have been accounted for as it came in. This may be such a condition as would make it difficult to make these returns to the Treasury, but it seems to me that the Treasury ought to receive such moneys as come into a bureau of this kind.

Mr. SHERLEY. Speaking by and large, that is very true; but the committee only made this exception because of the circumstances surrounding it, and would not think of doing it in normal times.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not picking out this particular board, but can the gentleman state whether the particular officials who have charge of this fund, rising in three months to as much as $115,000, as indicated by the gentlemen, are bonded?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know about that. All of the disbursing officers in all of the departments are bonded. The head of the War Trade Board is Mr. Vance McCormick, a man of very high standing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is money that comes in in relatively small amounts?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; five and ten and fifteen dollars at a time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The danger is in having that money around, and it is just a question whether it ought not to be reported to the Treasury. My judgment is that it should be.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course it is reported to the Treasury, and is simply credited to their appropriation. The money is not paid out without its going into the Treasury. When they get it they turn it over to the Treasury, but they turn it over to their account instead of turning it over as miscellaneous receipts, so that there is a Treasury auditing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This relieves them to a certain extent from going to the gentleman's Committee on Appropriations and asking for money; and my opinion, as a Member of Congress, is that we ought to permit no department, no bureau that is regularly in business now as this one is, to escape that responsibility. They should go before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. They do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And tell his committee what they want.

Mr. SHERLEY. They do come every year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that the gentleman has some check upon them.

Mr. SHERLEY. They do come every year.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of diplomatic and consular officers: For the transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts, including the same objects specified under this head in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $20,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. Is it the purpose to make a number of new appointments of clerks in embassies and legations?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. The department asked for additional moneys on account of the increasing burden that exists in the legations and embassies abroad. The committee did not give the amount they asked. I did not personally conduct this hearing, so that I am not familiar with the details of the figures; but my impression is that they asked for $200,000, and we allowed them $125,000.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry with reference to the $2,000,000 appropriation for the War Industries Board?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman yesterday stated that the committee did not favor increasing the number of employees here in Washington—that is, clerks and stenographers. Will the $2,000,000 enable the War Industries Board to employ a large number of additional clerks?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. Some part of their expense was for expense away from Washington and part of it was to take care of an existing force. They asked actually for $3,750,000. We gave them $2,000,000; and we gave them that not with the idea of increasing the existing force, but maintaining it through the year, with perhaps some expense outside of Washington that is not now being incurred.

Mr. WALSH. My question was prompted by the language "including personal and other services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere."

Mr. SHERLEY. That is just the usual language; but, of course, some of this money goes into the District, but it goes for the rest of the months of this fiscal year and for existing pay rolls. It is just the same language that was used before.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

American citizens and prisoners of war in Germany: For relief of American citizens in Germany or in German-occupied territory, and American prisoners of war who may be taken by German forces, $200,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Referring to this item of $200,000 for American citizens and prisoners of war in Germany, may I ask why that is in this bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Because they are short of money. They had about $80,000 and they figured that there are some 2,000 people they need to make provisions for, and they need this additional money. They can not tell just what the expenses are. Those expenses are incurred by the Spanish Government through the Spanish ambassador and, of course, the Federal Government reimburses any expenditure the Spanish Government may make.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this deficiency appropriation to make up for the pay of such Americans as may be prisoners in Germany?

Mr. SHERLEY. To make up the expense of looking after those prisoners.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not for salaries or compensation?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For relief of American citizens in Germany—just what kind of relief is that?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will quote from the testimony of Mr. Carr:

Under a provisional reciprocal arrangement with the German Government, pending a definite determination of the questions at the conference now in session at Berne, American officers who are prisoners of war in Germany are paid salaries by the German Government to be eventually reimbursed by the United States at approximately the rate of $80 per month up to and including the grade of captain and $90 per month for higher grades. Privates are, however, paid no salaries. The latter class in particular are dependent upon the clothing and food furnished by the German Government, and that has been found to be so inadequate that the soldiers look largely to the packages of food they receive through the Red Cross. It is practically imperative, therefore, that our soldiers be given small amounts of money immediately after capture to meet immediate needs, this amount to be returned by them if reciprocal arrangements can be made on the part of Germany as to the payment of salaries to prisoners of war. At present officers are paid an initial sum of $50 and noncommissioned officers and privates $15 to meet their first expenses after capture, such as extra clothing, etc. It is obvious that their welfare demands these payments as well as others with which they may procure from time to time through the American prisoners' central committee in Berne certain articles necessary to their comfort and welfare, such as surgical appliances, artificial limbs, books, musical instruments, etc. It is for this kind of relief of prisoners that this appropriation is requested, and as has been explained the initial payments specified are to be reimbursed to the Government eventually.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did I understand in the earlier part of the reading that American prisoners are paid something by Germany?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are being paid something now provisionally, just as we are paying to German officers who are prisoners of the United States certain money, and there is at the present time a conference at Berne, of which Mr. John Davis, the present Solicitor General and who has been designated as the coming ambassador to England, is a member, for the purpose of adjusting with the German Government this whole matter of care and treatment of prisoners of war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Apparently the main question is largely a diplomatic one. I have some inquiry concerning one particular prisoner of war. His pay allotment is not coming along. The question has arisen whether by reason of his being a prisoner of war his pay stops. If, being a prisoner of war, he is made some allowance by Germany, this appropriation apparently is to make good ultimately the difference between his salary and that which Germany allows him. It is a matter I should like to have more fully explained if the gentleman is familiar with it.

Mr. SHERLEY. What the gentleman is confusing is that this particular provision is a question whether men who have been captured as prisoners of war shall be continued to be paid by this Government and draw salaries, and the comptroller held that the payment ceases. There has just been passed through the House, at the instance of the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill to take care of that situation, and I have no doubt it will speedily be enacted in the Senate, to permit the payment of men who are reported lost or missing or who are prisoners of war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am obliged to the gentleman for the information.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Considering the very great losses which are taking place in the present battles, does not the gentleman think that the situation has changed since the hearings and that this sum might very well be made considerably larger to provide for all contingencies?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it is larger than any need to make it, but the State Department very recently, within a week or 10 days, made this estimate. They do not know what funds they need, and the amount that is appropriated here will not be the determining factor. Moneys will be paid to the extent that is necessary, and whatever difference there may be the Congress will willingly appropriate.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. TILSON. There is no part of this that goes to the pay of the enlisted man?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. TILSON. This is entirely to take care of their interests while they are there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. This money is to pay advances made to the soldiers to supply them with funds that they may need when captured and during their captivity, and then subsequently they may or may not be reimbursed.

Mr. TILSON. It appeared there was considerable hardship upon the families of certain soldiers who were captured in Germany that came before the committee of which I am a member.

Mr. SHERLEY. That came before the Committee on Appropriations, and they asked legislation be carried in the bill. I suggested to them that we would do it if necessary, but I was sure the Committee on Military Affairs would gladly consider and report a bill, and I thought that was the better procedure, and accordingly the matter came before the gentleman's committee, and they did report it immediately.

Mr. TILSON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

International Trade-Mark Registration Bureau: For the annual share of the United States for the expenses of the maintenance of the International Trade-Mark Registration Bureau at Habana, including salaries of the director, and counselor, assistant director and counselor, clerks, translators, secretary to the director, stenographers, and typewriters, messenger, watchmen, and laborers, rent of quarters, stationery, and supplies, including the purchase of books, postage, traveling expenses, and the cost of printing the bulletin, $56,450.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I desire to ask the chairman if this is not anticipating a pending bill now before the Committee on Patents or the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not understand so. This is under an existing agreement as to our part of the expenditures of this bureau. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] can perhaps give the gentleman even more detailed information.

Mr. WALSH. I am under the impression that there is a sort of tentative agreement in reference to this International Trade-Mark Bureau and that it is legislation to put an agreement into binding force and effect and that the legislation is now pending before one or two committees of the House, and I think this appropriation is practically the legislation that is desired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman this is to carry out an agreement made by this Nation with the Central and South American Republics and also with the island of Cuba which was made August 20, 1910, at Buenos Aires. Under that convention and agreement there were to be two bureaus established, one at Habana, and in that organization to be the United States, Cuba, and the Central American Republics.

Mr. WALSH. What year did the gentleman state?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. August 20, 1910.

Mr. WALSH. Why was it not carried in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Because it is only just recently that the agreement has been signed and entered into by all the countries involved.

Mr. WALSH. That is just the point I am making, that the legislation to permit the agreement did not permit the appropriation of this sum and the authorization of the employment of all these officials.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that Mr. Carr, of the State Department, stated that—

On August 20, 1910, the Fourth National Conference of the American States of Buenos Aires formally adopted a convention for the protection of trade-marks. The convention was ratified by the United States on the 21st of March, 1911, and proclaimed by the President on September 16, 1916. It has also been ratified by Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, and Costa Rica. The convention provides for two registration bureaus, one at Habana and one at Rio de Janeiro, and that at Rio de Janeiro was intended to deal with applications for the 10 Republics of South America, while that at Habana was intended to serve North and Central America and the West Indian Republics. Each bureau was to be established as soon as two-thirds of the countries comprising the group which it was to serve should have ratified the convention. The requirements as to the ratification having been met in the northern group, the Cuban Government, charged with the administrative execution of the convention, was able in the winter of 1917 to initiate the bureau at Habana. On July 16, 1918, the President of Cuba promulgated a law for the initial expenses of the bureau, and in August of the present year a director of the bureau visited Washington and conferred with the appropriate officials of this Government concerning the regulations to carry the convention into effect. The convention provides that the expenses shall be defrayed by the signatory States in the same proportions as that established for the International Bureau of American Republics, namely, all contributions being in proportion to population.

That places upon us the obligation to pay our quota of the expenses in accordance with the treaty or convention. That quota is determined in exactly the same way as that of the International Bureau of American Republics is determined and amounts to this amount that we have here, $56,450.

This sum is simply appropriated to carry into effect the treaty and agreement made by this country with the other countries named.

Mr. WALSH. This convention provides that the expenses shall be defrayed. Now, this paragraph provides not for defraying the expenses but for paying salaries of a director, a counselor, assistants, stenographers, secretaries, rent of quarters, and in fact the establishment of a new bureau.

It is legislation in the nature of an authorization. If this item read for the payment of expenses incurred under a convention entered into between these Governments there could be no exception taken to the item. I think clearly this establishes a bureau.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly it establishes a bureau, and that is exactly what was established by the convention and treaty to which I referred, and that necessarily carries with it a director and the employment of the necessary force in order to conduct the business of the bureau. The gentleman will notice that this provision simply provides for the annual share of the United States for the expenses of the maintenance of the International Trade-mark Registration Bureau at Habana, and so forth.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that if the item stopped right there after the word "Habana," on line 18, and then carried the appropriation, it would do all we seek to do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Absolutely.

Mr. MONDELL. The balance is simply detail with regard to the character of the expense.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Chairman, I can not quite agree with the interpretation that has been placed upon this, and I think the paragraph is subject to a point of order. This convention was ratified on the 21st of March, 1911.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will yield, it was ratified by the United States——

Mr. WALSH. On the 21st of March, 1911.

Mr. MONDELL. That is right. And proclaimed on September 16, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make the point of order?

Mr. WALSH. If the Chair will permit me just a moment further to get some additional information, I wish to say that it was proclaimed by the President on September 16, 1916.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct, so far as the proclamation of the President of the United States is concerned, but if the gentleman will look further in the hearings——

Mr. WALSH. That is the President of Cuba.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The President of Cuba promulgated the law for the initial expense of the bureau on July 16, 1918.

Mr. WALSH. That is the point I make, the initial expenses of the bureau; but this is the annual share of the United States. And we have not enacted any legislation as the result of that convention, which was agreed to and proclaimed, and authorized the establishment of this bureau.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The treaty in itself, I will say to the gentleman, has all the authority of law in the matter.

Mr. WALSH. We have not the treaty before us. We have the statement of Mr. Carr that this convention was ratified and provides for two registration bureaus. We do not know whether it provides for directors or assistant directors, watchmen or laborers. It is clearly legislation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman desires it, so far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to see that language stricken out, and stop at the word "Habana," and simply provide for the annual share of the expenses of the United States. But I really believe it is best to leave the language in there, for the simple reason that Congress will know exactly for what purpose this money is being appropriated and used from time to time. But if the gentleman wishes the language stricken out, for one I have no objection.

Mr. WALSH. We do not know. We know we have a lot of directors and stenographers and typewriters, and that they are buying a lot of books and postage. We do not know what the director gets, or what they are spending for stenographers and typewriters. And this is clearly legislation. And I should be inclined to make a point of order against the paragraph, although, if the gentleman——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman I do not think it is subject to a point of order, because it is provided for under a treaty made by this country with Cuba and certain Central American Republics, which is the supreme law of the land.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the Appropriations Committee——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is authorized under the law.

Mr. WALSH (continuing). Has acquired jurisdiction to bring in legislation on an appropriation bill simply because some treaty has been entered into providing for us to pay a portion of the expenses of an international trade-mark bureau.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not legislation. It is merely an appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. My contention is that it certainly is legislation when it provides for salaries of directors, counselors, and so forth, that have never heretofore been provided for. There is no law on the statute books authorizing their appointment, and I doubt very much if this treaty goes into such details as that. And I make the point of order that the paragraph is not in order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I understand, the language to which the gentleman objects is contained on line 18 after the word "Habana" down to and including line 22.

Mr. WALSH. No; I object to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point, and it seems to be somewhat of an important question. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he is willing to permit the point of order to go over so as to give the Chair opportunity to look into the matter?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] willing to let the paragraph go over?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no objection. I am satisfied, however, it is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that it is subject to a point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. That it is not subject to a point of order. But if the Chair desires to obtain further information I am perfectly willing to let it go over. As a matter of fact, the question is immaterial as compared to other sections in the bill, and I am anxious to expedite the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there seems to be this question involved, namely, as to whether a treaty, without previous legislation having been had, gives authority to make an appropriation. That is the thing that is in the Chair's mind at this time. That is the thing that is in the mind of the Chair at the time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think a treaty the moment it becomes approved by the ratification of the Senate becomes the law of the land just as much as any act of Congress, and I think there are any number of precedents to that effect; and it being the law, this is simply an appropriation to carry out the terms of it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the impression that the Chair has.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Chair permit me to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does it appear anywhere in the hearing that the treaty provides that this bureau shall have a director, counselor, translators, and these various other officials?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but the treaty provides for the expenses of this registration bureau, and that would include legitimate expenses, such as the salary of director, counselor, and so forth.

Mr. WALSH. It would include the expenses that the Congress authorized in the way of providing for officials.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I differ with the gentleman, but I would rather not take the time of the committee now. The Chair has suggested that he would like to look into the matter further, and I suggest that it go over and we continue with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to delay. If a conclusion is reached before the adjournment this afternoon, the Chair will have passed upon the matter. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of officers and employees in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $6,000,000; stationery and minor office supplies, $300,000; furniture, equipment, and supplies, including existing deficiency of $313,874 for addressograph equipment, file cabinets, typewriters, etc., for immediate needs, $750,000; field investigation and branch offices, $500,000; miscellaneous expenses, including telephones, telegrams, freight, express, car tickets in the District of Columbia, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $30,000; in all, $7,580,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is a very large appropriation, and so far as the salaries of officers and employees in the District of Columbia and elsewhere are concerned they amount to $6,000,000. I do not know just what check the committee has on the distribution of that large sum for salaries. Apparently no effort has been made to itemize them, although I presume the committee has a report on that subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. The salaries they pay are the usual statutory salaries, and the estimate that was submitted to the committee showed the salaries that were being paid. There are 1 or 2 people who will draw $5,000 each, 1 who draws $4,832, 1 who draws $4,000, 6 who draw $3,500 each, 23 who draw $3,000 each, 26 who draw $2,500 each, 50 who draw $2,000 each, 1 who draws $1,890, 158 who draw $1,800 each, 7 who draw $1,700 each, 9 who draw $1,680 each, 55 at $1,600 each, and so on down to the lowest salaries of $240.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the salary of the chief of the bureau now?

Mr. SHERLEY. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. An effort was made some time ago to increase that, and if my recollection is not awry it failed. There has been a change in the head of the bureau recently, has there not?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. Mr. De Lanoy has resigned, I understand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a very important bureau of the Government, and its importance is increasing every day, as every Member of Congress can very readily attest. But this being a deficiency appropriation, and a very large one at that, I would like to know whether by virtue of this appropriation we may expect that the work of the bureau may be accelerated?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would not say by virtue of this appropriation. I hope that as the bureau becomes better and better organized we will get better service. I have at times been somewhat critical of the bureau, and yet it is only fair to say that it has probably had the biggest task of any single bureau of the Government, outside of a department like the War Department. The amount of insurance, for instance, that this bureau is carrying exceeds manyfold all of the insurance of all of the private insurance companies in America and elsewhere. There is something like $34,000,000,000 worth of insurance that this bureau is now supervising and carrying for the Government, and the task is really a hurculean one.

I know that Members of Congress have and continue to have cause for complaint, due to mistakes in allotments or failure to make allotments, and so forth, and there have been in the past a good many things that have been the proper subject of complaint. But alongside of that there must be borne in mind the tremendous magnitude of the task that has been imposed on this bureau.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I concede the magnitude of the work, and I would like to help those in charge to advance it. It seems to me the pay of the chief of the bureau is not what it ought to be, considering the responsibility he has.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman, but the committee did not feel warranted, particularly at the time this hearing was had, to increase the pay of the head of the bureau.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But this much I wanted to say in the presence of the gentleman and his committee, that for a long time, having due regard to the difficulties confronting this bureau, the correspondence with my office was generally very satisfactory. I had no fault to find with it. But I have observed recently that it has fallen back considerably, and that some letters are much delayed, which, I assume, may be due to the fact that they have not sufficient force, or they have not got their machinery together, as they would like to have it; for that reason I inquired if this appropriation meant that the work may be hastened so that complaints may be lessened.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not represent all they asked, but it does represent what the committee thought was sufficient, in view of the fact that considerable machinery has been purchased and is being installed for expediting work in addressing letters and in making out checks, and so forth, and the bureau will this winter get installed in the Arlington Building, instead of being scattered in some 13 buildings all over the town, and that again ought to expedite the work. I really think that this is one of those problems that are not solved simply by piling in money for additional clerks. It is solved by the gradual settling down of an organization along lines of efficiency.

It was to be expected that with work of this magnitude there would be much of confusion and of trouble.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If they could get this work all under one roof, probably it would be much better all around.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman thinks that is likely to eventuate this winter?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are to have six or seven floors of the Arlington, and while they will still have certain work outside it will be work that is not of a permanent nature. My own judgment of this bureau is this, and I think the House ought to have it in mind: I believe that the time is rapidly coming when we ought to consolidate payments, both the voluntary and the compulsory one, in one bureau instead of having them divided as they now are. I think further that there will come a consolidation of the Pension Bureau with this bureau. There ought not to be two bureaus dealing with that subject. My own judgment is that the proper committee ought to consider very carefully and prepare a bill undertaking to determine all of these factors and to provide for one organization, and that then we will have need to erect a building somewhat similar, I hope, to the new buildings for the Army and Navy in Potomac Park in which this bureau can be housed. It is destined to be the largest bureau in the Government for many years to come.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are we using the Arlington Building now?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but within a few weeks they hope to move into some floors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I assume the appropriation just passed contemplates that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman know positively that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance is going into the Arlington Building?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I know it from the statements made before the committee, and I know it from the personal statement of the Secretary of the Treasury to me.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman know what else is going into that building?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; the Railway Administration is going into that building.

Mr. DENISON. Will there be room for both bureaus in that building?

Mr. SHERLEY. There will not be all the room that the War-Risk Insurance Bureau ought to have at this time, but there will be six or seven floors given to them, as I recall it.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman stated awhile ago that he thought at some time the Bureau of Pensions would be consolidated with this bureau. Was it the gentleman's thought that the Bureau of Pensions would be absorbed by this bureau, or that this bureau would be absorbed by the Bureau of Pensions?

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope the Bureau of Pensions will be absorbed by this. In magnitude the Bureau of Pensions does not represent one-twentieth of what the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance represents.

Mr. DENISON. I know; but in efficiency it represents a good deal more.

Mr. SHERLEY. I question even that.

Mr. DENISON. I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. And I am not prepared to rate this bureau too high.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to detain the committee only just a minute for the purpose of enforcing what the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERLEY] said about the consolidation of this bureau. The work now done in the Quartermaster General's office and the work done in the War-Risk Insurance Bureau have caused quite a good deal of confusion. For example, wherever an allotment is made by law it goes to the Quartermaster General, and where there is an allotment and an allowance it goes to the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. So the War-Risk Insurance Bureau handling one class of cases and the Quartermaster General handling another class of cases, it has caused quite a good deal of confusion throughout the country. When this bureau was first established the allowances were made in every case through the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance; but a provision was put into one of the bills, and the War Department contended that they had all the records and that they ought to handle it. They themselves did not seem to anticipate the enormous amount of trouble that would be entailed on that account. It ought all to be in one bureau, and in my judgment it ought to be put in the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, because the Navy has allowances, the Marine Corps has allowances, and the Lighthouse Service has allowances, as well as the Army. Therefore, it all ought to be at one place. Now, the President has the right under the Overman Act to consolidate all of this activity in one bureau, and, in my judgment, it ought to be done immediately, because they have about cleaned up the back work on the original first draft, and the next lot of soldiers who come in under this new law—ages from 18 to 45—will put in quite as many cases and quite as much labor as the original draft. Therefore, it ought all to be consolidated at this time, in my judgment.

And, in saying this, I agree very heartily with the chairman [Mr. SHERLEY] that something ought to be done at once. If it is not done in the department, the proper committees in the House and Senate ought to take up this matter and work out a very careful plan and consolidate all of this work at one place. It would save every Congressman, every Senator, every soldier, every man who has correspondence a great deal of trouble, and then you would know exactly where to fix the responsibility in the event of carelessness or delay. I believe it is necessary to be done and ought to be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How long does the gentleman think the War-Risk Bureau is going to last?

Mr. SISSON. Of course, nobody can tell exactly. It depends on how many of our boys are injured and how much administration will have to be had to work out the legislation whereby Congress has committed itself to the soldiers in certain lines of help.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The insurance feature will necessarily tend to prolong it.

Mr. SISSON. I think, perhaps, quite a number of years; but I will say that ought to be worked out as soon as the war is over, so that the force could be gotten down to a minimum within a year or two after everything settles down. Then it becomes largely a question simply of paying what is due to the soldiers. Some of them may take it in lump sums, and some may decide to take it monthly or annually, under the other plan.

Mr. ROBBINS. There is one question I would like to ask the gentleman; this item of $70,000,000 appropriated for the payment of the military and naval family allowances. That, I presume, is to make up the allowances made by the soldier to the family, either compulsory or voluntary, under the act. Is that the purpose of it?

Mr. SISSON. It could be used for all the purposes for which allowances are made under that act. In other words, if a man was injured and discharged from the service and wanted to settle, the money could be paid out of that sum.

Mr. ROBBINS. How does it come that it takes such an enormous amount in so short a time after the act went into force?

Mr. SISSON. I doubt very much if anybody knows to any certainty whether $70,000,000 will be enough until the next bill becomes a law.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is the very point I wanted to ask about. The gentleman has gone into this as a member of the subcommittee and taken voluminous testimony, which I have read hastily. Does not the gentleman think the war risk is a problem as to whether we will be able to meet the terrible drain on the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think so; in my judgment it will all be worked out without much trouble. I will state to the gentleman frankly that I am not an insurance expert. We have relied on gentlemen called into the service who are experts and who do have a knowledge of what this present arrangement will finally put upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS. What gives me cause for alarm is that you come in with this deficiency bill and ask for $70,000,000 in so short a time after the act goes into force. It is becoming alarming as to the extent of the burden upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the Committee on Appropriations, even if it desired to exercise the option, had none. The Congress of the United States passed a law making certain fixed allowances for the families of the soldiers and sailors in the service. The department has to carry out that law, and comes to us with an estimate as to the money necessary. We appropriated it; but, aside from that, is the gentleman prepared to say that he does not think we ought to give the allowances that we are giving?

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, no; not at all; exactly the reverse. I want to give them, but I wanted to know whether we are going to be able to keep faith with the soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think we are going to be able to do it; and in order to be able to do it we give them this sum.

Mr. LONDON. If the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to know if we can give this money to the soldiers and let the Government keep the money at the same time. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, no; I do not; the gentleman did not hear my question or did not understand it.

Mr. LONDON. I did not understand it.

Mr. ROBBINS. I think it is a great and beneficent plan; but what caused me some concern is the amount carried here.

Mr. SISSON. I want to say that the committee, in giving $70,000,000, was actuated by the testimony of gentlemen who came before the committee and these gentlemen who made the estimates and who have been paying out to the soldiers this fund for this purpose. Their opinion is that under present conditions and the present number of soldiers this sum ought to carry us up until Congress meets again, and then if they need any more money they can get it.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. There was a suggestion—I do not remember who made it—that there could be a consolidation of the War-Risk Bureau and the bureau in the Quartermaster Department.

Mr. SISSON. That was made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. ESCH. And that the proper committees of the House should have the matter in charge. Would not the President under the Overman Act have the power to do that?

Mr. SISSON. I stated at the outset that the President had that power under the Overman Act, and that if he did not take the matter up and make the consolidation I was in hearty accord with the chairman of the committee that the proper committees should take the matter up and work out a plan where these activities could be consolidated. I think it would be good administration economically and be much more convenient to the country at large.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he was not afraid that if we consolidated the two departments it would be only a short time until the policy that has been pursued in regard to giving pensions will be pursued in regard to soldiers in the present war.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think that the consolidation of the departments would have a tendency to do that.

Mr. DENISON. My own judgment is that we ought to keep the two departments as far apart as we can in operation and in law.

Mr. SISSON. I think it would be good administration to consolidate them; we are incurring a great deal of useless expense in useless correspondence on the part of Members of Congress and men who have business with these bureaus.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Is it not possible for the Committee on Appropriations to give the War-Risk Insurance Bureau enough money so that in some way we could find out how they are spending the money, and so that dependent families could get the allotment provided under that act? I get a dozen letters a day from people in my district, objects of charity, who have not got anything for five or six months, and they can not get any satisfaction from the War-Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. SISSON. I think, as a matter of fact, a few isolated cases might be found in all the districts. When the change was made from the Bureau of War Risk to the War Department in reference to the soldiers to whom the Government made no allotment out of the Treasury a great deal of confusion arose. Many soldiers were in France when the War Department undertook a reallotment by the soldiers and have a filing of new papers by the soldiers, and that caused a great deal of delay. But we have the assurance of a very accomplished Army officer, Gen. Lord, who seems to be in sympathy with all the purposes of the bill, anxious that the soldiers' families should get all the allowances intended under the law that they now have, and he says that they have about cleaned all that matter up. Some time you will find that the fault has not altogether been with the Government, but the fault has been with the soldier who neglected to make the allowance to his family.

There are certain allowances under the law which the soldier himself must make. The Government can not compel him to make them. They can not compel a soldier to make an allowance to his father, his mother, his brother, or his sister.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for three minutes.

Mr. SISSON. I want only one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] if he will tell us whether these dependents are going to get the money for the months between the time the soldier made his original allotment and the time he starts to make his new allotment?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; if he is entitled to it under the law. This bill will carry an amount of money for the purpose of having these cases investigated. In many instances, unless there are actual dependents, they are not entitled to an allowance out of the Treasury. Therefore to prevent fraud it is necessary that many of the cases be investigated. Those allowances which are allowed by law, except in rare cases, are being paid now. In those cases where the allowance is made to a brother, father, sister, or some one where the soldier himself must make the allotment, frequently delay is caused by the soldier and not by the department.

Mr. DALLINGER. A large number of cases have come to my attention where the soldier made his original allotment on the blanks furnished and then later a ruling was made by which those allotments were canceled, and after a great deal of delay the soldier was located and told that he must make another allotment.

Mr. SISSON. That is true.

Mr. DALLINGER. What is going to become of the money allotted by the soldier between that time and the time of the second allotment? The dependents are not getting that money, and they need the money for their support. They are absolutely dependent and they can not get any satisfaction in regard to it. They have had to borrow money in order to live. Such a condition of affairs is inexcusable and a disgrace to this Government.

Mr. SISSON. If the soldier desired an allotment to be made and signs the allotment blank sent him by the War Department, that allotment will be made in accordance with the soldier's wishes, because in those cases you can not compel an allotment, except one to the wife, or to the children of the soldier in the event that the wife is dead.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. There are 5,000 prisoners in Germany. I have presented to the bureau cases of men who have made an allotment through the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance where the allotment has been canceled under this order and the man required to make a new allotment through the quartermaster. The men are in prison in Germany and can not be reached. What has been done in respect to those men?

Mr. SISSON. As a matter of fact, those soldiers do not get paid.

Mr. TEMPLE. Oh, yes; they do.

Mr. SISSON. They do not get it sent to them in Germany.

Mr. TEMPLE. It is credited to them.

Mr. SISSON. That is true, and so will this be credited to the family.

Mr. TEMPLE. But to have the money credited to them does not support the family.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is complaining about a matter in respect to which the Appropriation Committee can give him no help. We can not make the law, because, if we did, we would have a great many criticizing us for going outside of our jurisdiction.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. One would naturally think that with 11,000 or more people in the War-Risk Bureau, who are supposed to be there for the purpose of facilitating these payments, the work could be kept current. I undertake to say that I can organize a war-risk bureau, systematize it, and get the work current with 3,500 people. They have 11,000 there.

Mr. SISSON. That will not help the case the gentleman speaks of here; that will not relieve the situation; because where those cases have been left with the War-Risk Bureau the payments have been continued. No changes were made, but where it was transferred to the War Department is where the trouble is arising. That is a case that this committee has nothing to do with except to appropriate the money.

Mr. TEMPLE. I am very well acquainted with the fact, but the gentleman was discussing the situation, and I thought that point ought to be brought out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of trying to clear this matter up. What I want to know from the Committee on Appropriations is whether there is money enough appropriated so that where the soldier made his original allotment, where he had a dependent family, and then went off on the western front, supposing his family to be looked after, the Government having under the law promised to make an allowance in addition to the allotment, and where the War Department canceled the original allotment and after several months located the soldier and got him to make a new allotment—whether under these circumstances there is money enough appropriated to take care of the lapse in payment during the period between the first allotment and the second allotment, where the dependent family under the law was supposed to be entitled to a part of the soldier's pay plus the Government allowance. In other words, is there money enough appropriated so that even after inexcusable delay these dependents can get that money in a lump sum?

Mr. SISSON. That will be left entirely with the soldier. If the soldier wants to make a reaffirmation of the allotment, which he made in the War-Risk Bureau, it will be paid. If not, it will all be paid to the soldier himself. Nothing will be taken from the soldier.

Mr. DALLINGER. What about the allowance, the payment of which by the Government depends upon the allotment made by the soldier?

Mr. SISSON. There is no allowance handled in the War Department. All those allowances are handled in the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. The gentleman is not discussing that which is affected by that order, because the order in the War Department respected only the allowance made by himself. No allowance by the Government, because in every case where the money is paid out of the Treasury it is through the War Department. There has been no change in the War-Risk Insurance Bureau; it is in the War Department. Do I make myself plain?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, apparently I can not make myself understood by the committee. I took the case of a soldier who originally made his allotment before leaving this country. I have hundreds of those cases in my district where soldiers went to the western front thinking their families were provided for. They had been furnished with a summary of the act which showed that if a soldier made an allotment of his pay direct to his wife or to his father or mother that the Government would add so much more. These men go away thinking that everything is taken care of. Now, there is an order issued which provides that the soldier must make a new allotment. I do not know what the reason was—it may have been a very good reason—but what I am trying to get at is this: After the soldier has made his new allotment, then, as I understand, the War-Risk Insurance Bureau will honor that and the dependent family will get the allotment and the allowance that goes with it; but what is going to happen in regard to the four or five months' pay that the soldier supposed had been given to his dependent family, plus the Government's allowance, and which the family never received?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit I think I can set him straight. The gentleman is confusing two different classes of payment. There are certain allotments made to dependents which the Government matches with funds of its own. They have always been and are now paid by the War-Risk Insurance Bureau and there has been no requirement for a new allotment on such payments. There are also certain voluntary allotments which the soldier can make and which for a while were paid through the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. Under the law it was found that the War Department should make these payments and it does now make them and it is insisting upon a new allotment, a new designation made by the soldier for the continuation of such allotment. Now, the gentleman asks what happened in the period between the time of the old determination of the soldier and the new. Touching those which are compulsory and which the Government supplements nothing happened. The family is entitled all through to receive that through the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. Touching the voluntary one in reference to the pay of the soldier when he makes his new voluntary allotment, he may make it revert back or make it continue from the date of the new pay, because this allotment comes out of his pay and comes out of his pay only to the extent that he is willing it should come out, and so the matter is entirely in his hands, and it is not a question of the appropriation of moneys in order to take care of that sort of a situation, though it is true there has been, unfortunately, a good deal of delay and confusion in acquainting the soldier with the need of making a new allotment, and the result was that the War Department shut off payments until a new allotment was made and there were a lot of families of soldiers who were denied this allotment that the soldier thought he had made and which he was desirous of making.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have a case which the gentleman has described very accurately. The allowance was cut off, was not paid. Is it now required of that soldier, who claims to have made the request that it be paid to his family, in the event the papers are lost or anything of the kind, to make a new one?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; as I understand it, he has to make a new allotment under the decision that was reached some time ago by the department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. This soldier is in France, and some papers that he wrote me he had sent perhaps were lost, for I have never received them.

Mr. SHERLEY. The order was sent out, as I understand it, to all the commanders everywhere to acquaint the soldiers with the need of their making new allotments if they desired to make them to their families. I am talking about the voluntary allotments.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Or renewing the old?

Mr. SHERLEY. Or a renewal of the old and——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. I understand that the War Department states they have in large measure, they believe, brought that information to all the soldiers over the country.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and then I will yield.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have a case of a sailor in the United States Navy who was in my home office last Tuesday. He made an allotment in January, 1918, of $15 a month to his wife. The money has been deducted from his pay each month. His wife has never received a single dollar of that money.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, of course, there are such cases which are inexcusable.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. There was an allowance of $10 a month made to the wife by the Government and she never received a dollar from the allowance. Unfortunately the wife died last week. The husband happened to have a little money in the bank and he has used up all of these savings to provide the comforts and maintenance of his wife, and now he must pay the funeral expenses of his wife. His wife never received that $10 per month which was the allowance granted by the Government.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Fifteen dollars.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No; it was $10 allowance made by the Government that she failed to receive, as well as the $15 per month which was deducted monthly from his pay, but never paid to his wife. The husband will undoubtedly receive the amount of the allotment which was deducted from his pay. I think he should be entitled to the money allowed by the Government, as he was compelled to use all the money he had saved before his marriage to maintain his family while in the service of his country. This failure to pay caused a great anxiety to both the sailor and his lamented wife.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, of course, there is no excuse for a situation of that kind.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I want to say further, with regard to the change in the system of allotments and allowances, many of the soldiers are on foreign soil. They are required to make new allotments and ask for allowances and their commanding officers have the blanks the soldiers are required to fill out in the form of a questionnaire. Many of these defenders of the Nation are puzzled with the questions. The questionnaires sent to the families are equally puzzling to them.

The soldier's family are required to make a statement, and then the bureau compares the soldier's statement and the family's statement. If the statements do not agree, the allowance is cut off and the family, who depended upon the allowance because of the breadwinner being drafted into the service, is made to suffer. Besides, the family find that the assured allotment at the time of drafting is denied them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like about a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire recognition?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; for about two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have employed in my office at home, since this war began, an extra clerk and an extra stenographer to take care of all this work. I was at home from the 21st of September until I came back here yesterday, and I worked all the time I was at home, and my office was full of people who do not know anything about the law and can not understand why they have so much trouble to obtain the money due them. I realize that the business carried on in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is a very great undertaking—greater than its promoters ever imagined it could be, I presume. It is a serious situation. And I am afraid the $70,000,000 provided in this bill will be insufficient to meet the necessities of the situation. Soldiers and sailors are dying rapidly from influenza and on the field of battle, and we shall have a great demand for money to meet the expenses of this bureau. We must not do any injustice to the soldiers and sailors who are fighting the enemy across the seas, and we must provide for their families in their absence—not in a parsimonious way but with liberality. Let us economize by cutting off useless expenditures elsewhere. Under no circumstances have so many obstacles put in the pathway of the soldiers and sailors and their families.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for a minute or two.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] yield the floor?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. I was wondering if the gentleman from Kentucky did not make a slight error a moment ago. I understand now that the War Department has begun the payment, since the 1st of July, where there was simply an allotment but no allowance from the Government. Is that what the gentleman stated?

Mr. SHERLEY. The War Department pays the voluntary allotment that a soldier may choose to make, and that is altogether irrespective of the compulsory allotment for dependents. The Government undertakes to supplement by payments of its own in accordance with the number of such dependents.

Mr. DENISON. Now, there has been another class of cases, where the soldier has had to sign a new allotment, according to instructions given me. There is where the soldier made an allotment of more than $15 a month. I would like the gentleman to explain that. I have never understood it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that I clearly understand just the case to which the gentleman refers. We first fixed the compulsory allotment that should be made, dependent upon the amount of money that the soldier received, and as that changed accordingly as he might receive promotion, there came from changes in pay endless confusion as to the amount of compulsory allotment and the amount the Government supplemented it by. We undertook to standardize that by fixing a definite sum, and it is quite possible that it was necessary in a number of cases for additional statements to be made by soldiers touching both characters of payment.

Mr. DENISON. I think that is true.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to say this further: I am not here to defend in the slightest degree the War-Risk Insurance Bureau for its failure to attend to some of these cases. I thoroughly agree with the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] that a situation such as he speaks of ought not to occur. I have personally undertaken—not once, but a great many times; not only in connection with people who are constituents of mine, but in connection with the system itself—to bring to the attention of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau the need of simplifying and arranging this matter so that there would not be delay. I have a good deal of sympathy with the feeling that Members have about this matter. At the same time I try to be fair about it. It must be said in justice to these people that their task is a tremendous one, very much bigger than an ordinary survey of the field would indicate. Now, the remedies I do not know. After all, the remedy is in the efficiency of the men at the head of the bureau. That efficiency can not be determined offhand. The men who are put at the head of the bureau are supposed to be men who have had experience in insurance life that would enable them to accomplish this task. Of course, different men will have different opinions. There has been to my knowledge considerable effort made for a betterment and improvement of conditions, and I think a considerable improvement is taking place. They are still behind in a good many cases. And this is also to be borne in mind: There are a great many cases that really present all the problems of lawsuits. Here is a woman who claims that she is the wife of a man, and entitled to certain compulsory allotment and allowance. The soldier disputes it, and there comes a question of fact. There is, of course, in some cases fraud practiced. There are some cases where actual facts can not immediately be ascertained. But in spite of that I still say there are many cases such as the gentleman has related where there seems to be no possible excuse for the failure of action on the part of the bureau.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations could not deal with the matter. We have no jurisdiction to make law, or to say who shall be at the head of the bureau or who shall not be at its head. All we can do is to vote the money, and we have voted the money, all that they can properly use, and we are prepared to vote it.

Mr. DENISON rose.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to say that I think if the Committee on Appropriations did have charge of the matter there would be probably considerable improvement over the present condition.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am obliged to the gentleman for the compliment; but I am not quite sure of that, because the task is really a very difficult one.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The question I wanted to refer to was this: The gentleman stated that there was a difference between compulsory and voluntary allotments, and he referred to the law requiring the filing of a new application. The question was, Does that apply to the voluntary allotment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I think by and large that is true, but not always true.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. On whose initiative is the allotment made?

Mr. SHERLEY. The voluntary allotment must be made on the initiative of the soldier himself. Nobody else could do it.

Mr. EMERSON. And the compulsory allotment can be made on application by the dependent?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. There was a straightening up required at one time, incident to the fact I have spoken of, where under the law the amount of the allotment was dependent upon the amount of pay that the soldier was getting, and we passed an act through here, I think in June, undertaking to standardize it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. You referred a while ago to the voluntary allotment. Did you intend to include in your statement such voluntary allotments as required the Government to make an allowance to supplement them? There are two kinds of voluntary allotments, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. SHERLEY. I meant the allotment altogether aside from that which the Government supplements, and which is now paid through the War Department.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the law there may be voluntary allotments also?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Does the allowance come automatically?

Mr. SHERLEY. It comes automatically when there is proof of dependency.

Mr. EMERSON. But it must follow application?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. An application must be made in every case.

Mr. SISSON. I also think it is fair to say this in defense of the Bureau of War Risk, that all this trouble about correspondence and allotments being stopped was not due to any fault of the Bureau of War Risk. The greater part of it has been due to the change of the law regarding the method, and the fact that a great deal of this work was turned over to the War Department as to the voluntary allotments. For that reason all of the complaint is not against the War-Risk Bureau.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does not the gentleman think that an error was made originally in having any part of the soldier's pay transferred into the hands of the War-Risk Bureau? Is not that the basis of a good deal of the present trouble?

Mr. SISSON. No; I think myself that it all ought to have been handled in the Bureau of War Risk, to start with. If not, it ought to have been put into the War Department and all put in one place.

Mr. TREADWAY. And allowed to stay there?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. Since you have put it under the War-Risk Bureau I think everything that deals with insurance ought to be put with the War-Risk Bureau, and everything that deals with the boy as a soldier should be turned over to the Army.

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. SISSON. I have no further desire to hold the floor. I simply wanted to make the statement that a great deal of the criticism that is being urged against the War-Risk Bureau was not just, because a great deal of it might be lodged against the War Department.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. TREADWAY. During the past two weeks I have had opportunity of meeting the families, especially the mothers, of many boys in the service. I have continually been a strong advocate of the war-risk insurance and the manner in which the business of the department has been handled. I think it is a remarkable credit to the department that within a year's time such an enormous amount of work could be taken in charge and handled as well as it has been handled. I want to give it all due credit, but, nevertheless, whoever is responsible for this change that has recently been made, whether by law or regulation or by agreement between the two departments—the War-Risk Bureau and the Quartermaster Department—wherever that change comes from, it has been a source of the greatest discomfort to parents.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I agree with him, and where it comes from is the law that the Congress of the United States enacted.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understand that to be the case, and that is the statement made when the War-Risk Bureau sent out the notices of the cancellation of the allotments. It so states on these cards. I think, however, that the statute to which the gentleman refers was not mandatory. But I want to say this in addition, that the method of notification to parents, and to others who have had the allotments sent them, has been very vague indeed. The notice has not been a plain statement. Perhaps we could understand it, knowing the law, but the average parent can not understand that notice, and out of more than 150 cases that have come to my attention within the past two weeks, I should say nearly half of them have contained that element of complaint, "Why has our allotment stopped?"

In connection with that same matter is the fact that the thousands of men overseas were obliged to receive their notifications from their commanding officer that their original allotment was stopped and that they must sign up a new form. Now, I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that during the period of that change some arrangement should have been made whereby the allotment should not have been stopped. They have been stopped in thousands and thousands of cases, undoubtedly, and it is absolutely impossible for the average person to understand the reason, particularly in view of the fact that it has required a new allotment to be signed by the men in the field, thousands and thousands of them overseas, and those allotments must get back here to the two departments before the change can be made and the new method of procedure put into effect. I think it is gross mismanagement somewhere, to the detriment of the service and to the detriment of the mental feeling, both of the men in the field and the parents or dependents here at home. I feel that it is as aggravating to the men and the families as the gross mismanagement in handling their mail. Coupled with the complaints about stopping allotments was almost an invariable complaint that the letters from home were not reaching the soldiers overseas.

I realize most fully the task of carrying on these departments, but I do think that when that change was required in the law a better system could have been found of putting the law into effect, and I think, as I stated, the men ought to have been allowed a continuance of the allotments in some way or other during the period of the change from the War-Risk Bureau to the quartermaster. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of military and naval family allowances, as authorized by law, $70,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring of the committee whether the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance has called upon the committee for any funds to pay the insurance occasioned by the mortality of our soldiers abroad, and, if so, how much money has been expended by reason of the insurance taken out by the enlisted men and officers?

Mr. SHERLEY. They have an appropriation now that was made in the war risk act of last fall, I think, and they did not ask for any additional money, and the committee did not inquire as to what moneys had been paid under the insurance in effect.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course they have the premiums that have been paid by the insured, which they can utilize for payment of the principal amount. The committee made no inquiry as to the total amount that has been imposed upon the Government in the payment of death losses?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; there being no deficiency asked, we did not have occasion to go into that.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the chairman [Mr. SHERLEY] whether any statistics have reached his committee as to the number of allotments that have been reassigned under this change in form from the War-Risk Bureau to the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that Gen. Lord, the Quartermaster General, made a statement about it. I do not recall it at the moment, but I will try and ascertain.

Mr. TREADWAY. I was wondering what percentage of the soldiers had failed to reassign, probably some through lack of desire to reassign, but a great many through failure to reach the men in the field.

Mr. SHERLEY. There have been a number of cases where there has been no reassignment, and some of them, as the gentleman suggests, have been the fault of the soldiers themselves.

Mr. TREADWAY. Undoubtedly, but——

Mr. SHERLEY. And some of them probably as the result of their not getting the notice, or not understanding it. I agree with what the gentleman has said, that a good deal of the information sent out has been of a character that was not clear to the ordinary layman. In fact, I have had some difficulty in understanding some of it myself, and I have always gone back to law to find out the rights of people rather than to the data that the bureau has sent out.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understand that the order making the change went by telegraph June 26 to all commanding officers, both in this country and abroad.

Mr. MADDEN. June 24.

Mr. TREADWAY. June 24, both in this country and abroad.

Mr. SHERLEY. Gen. Lord states:

Since these letters were written 247,000 new allotments have been received, and they are being paid as they are received, and I think there will be a cessation of these complaints; but back of it all, the condition of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, with the extraordinary burden it was carrying and the great problem it faced, was the thought that anything we could take away from it to lighten the load we should do.

That was in explanation of why they took over this part of the work.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think there is some justice in that.

Mr. EAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EAGAN. Why was it necessary to stop payment of the allotments between the original assignments and the reassignments?

Mr. SHERLEY. The change in the law prevented the War-Risk Insurance people from continuing the payments, and the War Department had to have allotments in accordance with the law in order to enable them to begin the payments.

Mr. EAGAN. So that the War-Risk Insurance Bureau had no choice except to stop the payments of the allotments?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not, after the law was changed.

Mr. TILSON. I was called out of the hall for just a moment, and the gentleman may have made the explanation in my absence. Has he explained what takes place in regard to prisoners of war?

Mr. SHERLEY. There was a discussion earlier in the day——

Mr. TILSON. No; I mean this reallotment, where the soldiers are in German prisons and are therefore unable to be reached to sign the reallotments?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I have not touched on that. In point of fact that particular situation had not occurred to my mind.

Mr. TILSON. It has occurred in my own experience in trying to straighten out a difficulty of that sort. A number of our first men that we sent over there have been captured and are in German prisons, and they are called upon to make reallotments, and, of course, it is impossible for them to make reallotments. I wondered if that had been brought to the attention of the gentleman and if there had been any provision to take care of such cases?

Mr. SHERLEY. It has not been brought to my attention.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman further in reference to Gen. Lord's testimony as to the 247,000 reallotment cases, what proportion of them are from overseas? Is there any record of that?

Mr. SHERLEY. The testimony does not show.

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course that is the great difficulty. Undoubtedly of the 247,000 a very large percentage are from men in this country at various cantonments. The men to whose families we ought to endeavor to furnish the allotments with the least possible delay are those overseas, who can not understand why their families are deprived of the allotment, and whose families can not understand it, and we can not explain it to them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman, but all I can say is that the testimony was that the War Department was doing everything it could by repeated reminders to bring to the attention of all officers the need of notifying all the soldiers of the necessity of making this reallotment.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think I may state that in my experience, in endeavoring to follow up the soldiers' allotments and allowances, I found but one instance where the allotment continued consecutively in its transfer from the War-Risk Bureau to the Quartermaster. I have but one case where during the change the allotment has not been stopped and more or less details necessary to get it started.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, gentlemen realize that we only hear about cases where something is wrong, but where the payments are regular we do not hear of it.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Has anything been done to help out the illiterates across the sea?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not answer the gentleman. I want to say this for the benefit of the House. Of course, it was perfectly impracticable for the committee to undertake a thorough investigation of the War-Risk Insurance or the War Department in connection with allotments. If we had done that, we would not have been able to report the bill. All that was before the committee was the question of moneys for the payment of salaries, and so forth. We did gather, however, knowing the interest of the House, as incident to the examination of witnesses, some information, but we did not cover the case the gentleman alludes to.

Mr. LAZARO. This question of illiterates merely adds to the difficulties we have to contend with.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. While this may not be within the province of the committee, does not the gentleman think that it is a mistake to split up the duties of these allotments and divide them between two different bureaus?

Mr. SHERLEY. I announced when this discussion started, an hour or more ago, that I thought there ought to be some consolidation and that Congress ought to undertake legislation looking to clarifying the whole situation, but it is a matter that ought not to be done hastily, because it is a difficult problem, and the legislative committee dealing with it ought immediately to go into the whole matter, with a view of clarifying and consolidating the bureaus.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What does the gentleman think of this proposition, that an expert from the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance be detailed to the House Office Building to take up the complaints that come into the offices of Members of Congress, and so help take them off our hands and at the same time help the bureau handle the cases?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am fearful that such a person detailed would not be able really to help, without bringing the files of the office, and that you would not get the relief that the gentleman hopes for.

Mr. DENISON. I thought it might hasten it.

Mr. MADDEN. He would be a good additional clerk for Members of Congress.

Mr. DENISON. They will have to do that or the Committee on Appropriations will have to give us more for clerk hire, because the work is getting to be burdensome, although we are all anxious and willing to do it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct a statement I made to the effect that the War-Risk Bureau has 11,000 clerks. I have since ascertained that they have 14,000; that they have increased the number 4,000 in the last few weeks.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that they have 14,000 clerks in that one bureau?

Mr. MADDEN. Fourteen thousand.

Mr. BUTLER. Whew! [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Fourteen thousand. I have letters in my possession to the effect that there is not a clerk down there who does more than one day's work in a week. I have further information that some clerks supposed to be working at night report for duty at 6 o'clock, immediately after making the report for duty go out to supper, and when the theater is open they go to the theater and never come back. If this kind of a situation exists, it is not to be wondered at that you can not get matters adjusted about which Members are complaining.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman know what these 14,000 clerks are costing the Government?

Mr. MADDEN. No; but here is an additional appropriation of $7,580,000 in this bill, with $3,591,000 in the regular bill six months ago.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman know how much the original appropriation was?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, they did not have 14,000 clerks at first; they keep adding a thousand or two every week, and now I see that somebody has been able to persuade the health officer of the District of Columbia, the District Commissioners, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and the Secretary of the Treasury to plead with the bureau not to bring any more clerks into the District until the epidemic is over. But there was no need of waiting until the epidemic is over; they are so crowded with clerks that that is what helps make the epidemic.

Some sleeping rooms are occupied by as many as 12 girls. I know of a case where the whole 12 have been sick with the influenza and not one able to help the other. Some people have asked why the 11, free from influenza, insisted on going into the room and sleeping where 1 girl was sick. The answer to that is that they had no other place to go; they could not sleep on the street, and they could not find a place in the hall of the house in which they had the room to sleep. Aside from all the iniquity of having these girls here under these circumstances, there is still greater iniquity in the determination of the heads of these bureaus to employ people regardless of whether they need them or not. The time has come when somebody, somewhere, must exercise the power that exists in the Government to prevent the extravagant waste of public funds and this criminal employment of unnecessary people. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. I find that this appropriation of $7,580,000 is for officers and employees. Do they have officers in the War-Risk Bureau?

Mr. MADDEN. Not military officers. I suppose it means heads of bureaus.

Mr. BUTLER. Do they have any of these moving figures in uniform?

Mr. MADDEN. I understand not. But I want to relate another little experience that I had. One of the division heads of the War-Risk Insurance, whose name I am not permitted to use, came to see me the other day. He told me that the people in the office over which he presides are so thick, so crowded, that there is not standing space for them, to say nothing about desk space; that they have not any work for them to do; that there is no need for their services; and that there ought to be something done, regardless of the influenza, to stop the situation that exists.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. How many would we have here if we did not have the influenza?

Mr MADDEN. As many as they could get.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman think this situation has been a little magnified? For instance, everyone agrees that all of the clerks who are brought here ought to work, ought to do their share.

Mr. MADDEN. But they all admit themselves that they are not doing it.

Mr. LAZARO. And the gentleman would not be in favor of issuing a blanket order to stop the Government from bringing clerks here, if clerks are needed to prosecute this war?

Mr. MADDEN. If clerks are needed?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I admit if clerks are needed or if anyone else is needed, I will go as far as any man in America will go to supply the needs; but when we know they are not needed, and when those in authority know they are not needed, and when they continue to insist upon the employment of those who are not needed and who themselves say they are doing no work, and who laugh on the streets at the ease with which they can get money out of the Treasury of the United States, then it is time for some one somewhere to say something about it.

Mr. LAZARO. If there is a single clerk in the city of Washington who is not doing his or her duty, that clerk ought not to be employed.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course not.

Mr. LAZARO. But the gentleman understands that in a crisis like this sometimes we are liable to magnify things. The gentleman does not think they are systematically bringing people here who are not needed?

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely, I do.

Mr. LAZARO. There is room for improvement, I admit; but the gentleman would not issue a blanket order to keep the Government from bringing clerks here who are needed to prosecute this war, because we have grippe here?

Mr. MADDEN. I will tell you what I would do, if I may be allowed to have one minute. I would issue a blanket order to send a committee of experts from either the House and the Senate or from some place in the executive branch of the Government to simplify, systematize, and regulate the conduct of these bureaus, so that no person would be there in any one of them who did not do a day's work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SLOAN and Mr. TREADWAY rose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, can we not reach some agreement touching this debate? I have not wanted to in any way curtail it, but we have been talking for nearly an hour and a half altogether aside from what is really pending, which is the money to be appropriated. I hope the committee may be willing to make some progress on the bill now.

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me have three minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate upon the pending paragraph end in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending paragraph and all of the amendments thereto be concluded in three minutes. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The chair hears none and it is so ordered, and the gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] was to have the time. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] does not desire time now, as I understand.

Mr. SLOAN. I will be satisfied with two minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, I make the request for five minutes, and I hope the committee will hereafter expedite the progress of the bill. At the present rate, we will not be through for a week.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to vacate the order by which the debate was limited for three minutes and now asks that debate be concluded at the end of five minutes, two minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] and three minutes by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use these two minutes for the purpose of emphasizing the necessity and the propriety of the organization of a joint committee of the House and Senate to look after the expenditures of these enormous sums of money that we are appropriating. The statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] concerning the large number of clerks here at high salaries, standing in each other's way, interfering with the management and control of this prevailing epidemic, ought to be at this time of such force and effect that it would impress itself upon those who are in charge of the legislation of this House so that they would organize such a committee of the best men of each side of this House and Senate to see to it that the money of the people of the country appropriated—not in thousands or millions but in billions of dollars as we are now—is not unwarrantably, lavishly, and extravagantly expended any longer as it is being done now in the manner stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have favored constantly the removal of numerous clerks from the city of Washington. There are very many departments that have no bearing whatever in being located here, and no reason therefor. I am on record some months ago of favoring the removal of a number of different bureaus to the centers where they should be for their proper work, but the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, Mr. Chairman, belongs here, and in spite of the criticisms of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] I think that bureau is deserving of the very highest commendation. To think that in one year's time a bureau could be organized capable of writing nearly $35,000,000 of insurance is something perfectly marvelous and almost beyond our comprehension.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am sorry, but my time is very short.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman one question——

Mr. TREADWAY. I say this further, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the very large amount of insurance carried and the very quick time in which it has been put into operation, and the fact that no policy can be issued for more than $10,000, the expense of conducting that bureau and the fact that they are asking $7,580,000 all told is not an unreasonable expenditure. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois perfectly that the clerks here ought to be expected to do a full day's work, men and women alike, but I do wish to uphold the manner in which the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance is performing its duty, the service it is rendering to the men in uniform, and the great benefit it is to the families of those men. We are asked to appropriate $7,580,000 to handle that work, and it is none too much. It is carrying nearly twice, Mr. Chairman, the amount of life insurance in effect in this country at the breaking out of the war, and no life insurance companies could ever have written any such aggregate amount of insurance for the amount that has been expended, or is asked for by the Government in this appropriation bill. Naturally, mistakes occur, but I think, considering the enormous task it has, the work is as well done as we could expect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Chicago, Ill., post office, courthouse, etc.: For repairing damage done to the Adams Street entrance, $22,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. In the first place, the War-Risk Insurance Bureau is not being run efficiently. I make that charge on my responsibility as a Member of the House. I can prove it by 9 out of 10 of the people who are employed in it. I can prove it, further, by the failure of the bureau to accomplish the work for which it was organized within the time in which it should be accomplished. I make the charge that the bureau had $3,591,000 appropriated for its maintenance just six months ago, and that to-day it comes in here for an additional appropriation as a deficiency of $7,580,000.

Mr. WALSH. They asked for $10,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. They asked for $10,000,000, and the appropriation is for $7,580,000. That makes a total appropriation within the last six months of $11,171,000 to administer an institution that ought to be capable of functioning with 3,500 people. They have 14,000 people employed there now, and if this is an example of the understanding of the gentleman from Massachusetts of efficient administration of public affairs, I have not much respect for his knowledge of efficiency. It is the most inefficient, outrageously extravagant institution that was ever organized under the Government. It is true we are handling big things. We had a large number of cases. I realize the importance of the work, but when everybody in the service will unhesitatingly tell you they are not called upon to work; that the average number of hours they put in a week is one good day's work; that there are thousands of men and women who are supposed to be employed here making no kind of excuse for not performing the duty at all, or if they report, as I said a few moments ago, they leave immediately after reporting and make no pretense of working—now, if that is efficiency, if that is system, if that is commendable, why the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] can have it so. But I do not believe it is efficiency. I do not believe it is system. I do not believe it is commendable. It is unjustifiable. The American people are entitled to a proper administration of their affairs. This function of administering the War-Risk Bureau is important. The best reason in the world why it should be efficient is the importance of the case, the urgency of the need of the widows of the men who die upon the battle fields, of the mothers, of the wives who are at home and whose soldier husbands are at the front. Can there be any worse failure to realize that patriotic need of public service than the employment of 10 people to do 1 person's work and throw the money of the public into the gutter and at the same time fail to accomplish the need of these deserving people by the payment of their allotments in a systematic, regular, and prompt way?

Efficiency! Oh, it would make a dog laugh to talk about efficiency under such circumstances. It is criminal. And those who are responsible for the criminality involved in such management ought in a time like this, when everybody is called upon to pay and bleed, to be prosecuted for their failure to observe the obligations which they took when they swore to protect and preserve the Constitution and the laws of the United States, as they must have done when they entered upon the discharge of the duties which devolve upon them by reason of their appointment to this office. Away with defense of the character made by the gentleman from Massachusetts of such an institution. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

East St. Louis, Ill., $4,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I hope the gentlemen will not continue a discussion that leads nowhere and is altogether aside from the bill. I have been generous with the membership of the House, but we can not hope to pass this bill for days if this sort of debate is to continue. Individual Members come to me and urge me to expedite the passage of the bill, and then delay the consideration of it. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not ask for further time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

Disposition of remains, etc.: For the disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, civilian employees, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, fiscal years 1918 and 1919, $710,274.52.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman a question. I am very sorry indeed that I did not hear the gentleman's statement the other day. I know it was lucidly made. I could not be here at the time. Will the gentleman tell me what is the occasion for this expenditure, which seems to be a large appropriation of money in a deficiency bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean the total bill?

Mr. BUTLER. No; this one item of $710,274.52 for disposition of remains.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is for the purpose indicated, and, of course, the gentleman realizes that unfortunately there have been a number of deaths of men in the service.

Mr. BUTLER. But these are not abroad?

Mr. SHERLEY. This is for men who die while returning from abroad, and for the deaths of men who are in the service here in America.

Mr. BUTLER. I will confess I did not know that the Government paid for the burial of civil employees until I read this.

Mr. SHERLEY. It only pays for civil employees of the War Department, and that provision has existed for 20 or 30 years.

Mr. BUTLER. I presume it has; but it does not extend beyond that, does it?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That purchase and exchange of typewriting machines, to be paid for from this appropriation, may be made at the special price allowed to schools teaching stenography and typewriting without obligating typewriter companies to supply these machines to all departments of the Government at the same price.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if there was anything said to his committee in regard to a new storehouse for the Watertown Arsenal?

Mr. SHERLEY. There were a number of items that were sent in as estimates which the Ordnance Department voluntarily withdrew. There was none submitted for a storehouse.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that last week I was at the Watertown Arsenal, where more than 12 large new buildings have recently been constructed and an enormous amount of work is being carried on, and the commandant told me that he had repeatedly reported to the authorities here in Washington the imperative need of a new storehouse for the arsenal. There is a lot of nickel and other valuable material used in the foundry in casting guns and in the manufacture of projectiles and there is no place to store it except out of doors. Moreover, there is a lot of machinery and a lot of metal and other material at the arsenal that deteriorates by being left out of doors, and there is also the continual chance of having valuable material, such as nickel, brass, and copper, stolen. It is perfectly evident that material of this kind ought to be kept under lock and key in a storehouse. I felt it my duty to call this matter to the attention of the committee, even if the Bureau of Ordnance did not consider it of sufficient importance to present it to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, no estimate was submitted for that object, and the committee therefore could not anticipate that need. In addition to that, there is a general repair fund for the arsenal, and there is an amount carried here for the repair of arsenals. I suspect that the department ought to take care of the need as the gentleman seems to indicate.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he thinks an appropriation for repairs could be used for such a purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not for the construction of a new building, but it is frequently used for enlargements.

Mr. ROBBINS. This says "improvements" also in the same item.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the maintenance item is rarely used for new projects of any magnitude. Usually the commandants of these various arsenals are very much more insistent on what they consider the needs of the arsenals than are the men who are at the head of this branch of the Government. Gen. Compton has just recently made a visit to the arsenals, and I think that included the one that the gentleman from Massachusetts referred to. He was present at the hearings and testified within 10 days, and he did not speak of such a need as that at the Watertown Arsenal. He voluntarily withdrew some items.

Mr. DALLINGER. Do I understand that the officers who appeared before the committee did not ask for it?

Mr. SHERLEY. They did not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That purchase and exchange of typewriting machines, to be paid for from this appropriation, may be made at the special price allowed to schools teaching stenography and typewriting without obligating typewriter companies to supply these machines to all departments of the Government at the same price.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee the reason for this special exemption. I recall that when the representatives of the typewriting companies came before the legislative subcommittee they requested that the law prescribing the low price at which the Government now secures its typewriters should be changed because of the increased cost. What is the purpose of this exempting provision?

Mr. SHERLEY. Just to carry the exact language that has been carried in the Army act for a number of years. It is a special price, lower than the Government price made to schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. What kind of schools, may I inquire of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. Various schools—Indian schools, District of Columbia schools, and other Government schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I assume that this is for the purpose of qualifying the general law which gives the Government a fixed low price for its typewriters.

Mr. SHERLEY. This was supposed to get them for a fixed price lower than that price. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not that the purpose of this, that the Government is not to get the price at which they are furnished to the schools?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. It says "at the special price allowed to schools teaching stenography and typewriting."

Mr. STAFFORD. Without obligating the typewriter companies to supply these machines to all the departments of the Government at the same price?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; not having to supply all the other departments. This relates to schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. I inquire of the gentleman what schools—whether Government schools or otherwise? I should think it relates to private schools. I would assume from the reading of this provision that the purpose was that the Government was not to get the benefit of the low price at which typewriters were furnished to private commercial colleges.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is my understanding that they get the lowest possible price. This exact language was carried in the Army act touching this purchase.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I read it it excepts the Government from getting that low price.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does not it apply to the coast-artillery school at Fort Monroe entirely, and made so that the school may be able to get these typewriters at a lower rate than the typewriter company furnishes them to all departments?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the understanding I had.

Mr. SHERLEY. It gives the artillery school this special price which is a lower price than the special governmental price.

Mr. WALSH. While the point of order is reserved I would like to ask why the artillery school should be favored in this way.

Mr. SHERLEY. Because it is a school, because the typewriter company makes a special price of typewriters for schools; that is the only reason.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me that if the typewriter companies can afford to furnish a special rate for schools, in view of the enormous quantities the Government uses in their departments, they might make a similar rate for all of them.

Mr. SHERLEY. The typewriter companies have been complaining for two years past that they are losing money on typewriters furnished the Government. I do not know the ancestry of this provision, but what probably happened years ago was that the typewriter companies, in order to get the use of typewriters more prevalent with the public, gave special prices to schools, and somebody learning of it insisted that the Government school should come in on the same basis. I do not know, but I only know that this is the language carried, and the purpose was to get typewriters at the cheapest possible price.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For commutation of quarters and of heat and light to commissioned officers, members of the Nurse Corps, and enlisted men on duty at places where no public quarters are available, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserves and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, and for every commissioned officer of the Army of the United States on duty in the field or on active duty without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States who maintains a place of abode for a wife, child, or dependent parent, for whom no public quarters are available. $75,861,520.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Does this enlarge the law we passed some time this spring granting commutation of quarters, light, and heat only to those officers who are married?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is the exact language of the present Army act.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to make a further inquiry. The gentleman from Alabama will recall that there was a discussion on the floor of the House as to whether we should extend commutation of quarters to officers who are unmarried, and I wish to inquire whether under this phraseology it would be practicable to extend the commutation to such officers?

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman from Kentucky has answered the gentleman from Wisconsin. I have not read the language critically. If the gentleman will notice, it says in the latter part officers who maintain a place of abode for a wife, child, or dependent parent for whom no public quarters are available.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire further whether this large amount was not occasioned largely by the passage of that law.

Mr. DENT. Unquestionably; that was new legislation, and up to that time officers in the field had no right to commutation of quarters.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation for "Pay of the Army" for the fiscal year 1919 shall be available to pay 1,289 field clerks at the rate of $1,200 per annum, the minimum or entrance rate fixed by the Army appropriation act approved July 9, 1918, instead of at $1,000 per annum, the rate appropriated in the said act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the paragraph. What is the reason for raising the pay from $1,000 to $1,200?

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not raise the pay. The Army act of July 8, 1918, provided that hereafter the minimum pay should be $1,200, but the appropriation was made for clerks at $1,000 as a minimum, and it was simply an error in failing to take up one line that had been changed by a subsequent one, and so in order to carry out the law, which says that they shall come in at $1,200, we provide that they shall be paid $1,200 instead of $1,000, which they were appropriated for.

Mr. DENT. The increase of pay from $1,000 to $1,200 was put on in the Senate and was agreed to in conference, and in writing the amount in the bill the conferees did not carry the full amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then this is largely to correct the clerical error——

Mr. DENT. It is to carry out the legislation that was put on the bill increasing the minimum pay from $1,000 to $1,200.

Mr. SHERLEY. The paragraph which allowed 1,287 clerks at $1,000 each was not in conference. What was in conference was the provision that the minimum or entrance pay, exclusive of said allowances of said Army clerks, shall be $1,200 per annum. When that was agreed to it necessarily made imperative a change in language that I have previously read so that we make this apply to existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clothing and camp and garrison equipage: For clothing and camp and garrison equipage, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $59,138,433, and in addition thereto the sum of $108,376,182 of the amount appropriated for "Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps" in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, is made available for the foregoing purposes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I see in line 20, page 16, the language "members of the Officers' Reserve Corps." Has not the distinction between members of the Officers' Reserve Corps and the other officers been wiped out?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is possible. We simply followed the exact language that is used, and it is possible that there may be some of these old accounts still to be paid to individuals who at the time the mileage was incurred were members of the Officers' Reserve Corps.

Mr. TILSON. And it would require that language to cover them?

Mr. SHERLEY. So it is highly desirable to continue the language.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad if the gentleman would move now that the committee rise.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right.

Mr. MONDELL. I rose for the purpose of making the same inquiry.

Mr. SHERLEY. Before making that motion may I say to the committee, I hope in perfect good humor, that if we are to pass this bill to-morrow it is necessary that we all try to confine ourselves to the discussion of things directly involved in the bill. I hope the committee will cooperate in that consideration of the measure. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 10609. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the present Federal building site at Eatonton, Ga., for another site on the public square in said city.

H. J. Res. 331. Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces.

RESERVE OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 63, providing for a reserve of the Public Health Service, and that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 63, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. DOREMUS, Mr. BARKLEY, and Mr. ESCH.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GALLIVAN, for six days, on account of illness;

To Mr. ZIHLMAN, indefinitely, on account of illness; and

To Mr. MCKEOWN, for 15 days, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a telegram from the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. LONERGAN, asking that his leave of absence be extended indefinitely. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask leave to address the House for two minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman kindly withhold that until to-morrow?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly, if the gentleman wishes it.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE STERLING OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound regret that I rise to announce the death, at Pontiac, Ill., to-day, in an automobile accident, of our colleague, Hon. JOHN A. STERLING, of Illinois.

At some future time I will ask the House to pause in its ordinary business, in order to pay appropriate tribute to the life, character, and public services of our distinguished friend. I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 446.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN A. STERLING, a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That a committee of 20 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the committee in the morning.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, October 18, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the War Industries Board for the remainder of the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1330); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Chemical Warfare Service of the War Department for the fiscal year 1919, in lieu of the estimate heretofore submitted (H. Doc. No. 1331); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims which have been presented to this department and require an appropriation for their payment (H. Doc. No. 1332); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules of claims allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund (H. Doc. No. 1333); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13015) to amend so much of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," approved July 9, 1918, as provided for "longevity pay for men other than the Regular Army," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 831), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII,

Mr. SCULLY introduced a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 337) to enable prompt liquidation of claims for damages to persons and property occasioned by an explosion or explosions at the plant of the T. A. Gillispie Loading Co., at Morgan, N. J., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BELL: A bill (H. R. 13095) granting an increase of pension to Capt. John T. Morgan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ELLIOTT: A bill (H. R. 13096) granting a pension to Joseph F. Mangold; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 13097) granting an increase of pension to Josiah T. McMillan; to the Committee on Invalid Pension.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: A bill (H. R. 13098) granting an increase of pension to Lewis Holley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WHITE of Maine: A bill (H. R. 13099) granting an increase of pension to Thomas F. Green; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also a bill (H. R. 13100) granting a pension to Rhoda A. Hunnewell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII,

Mr. MAGEE laid on the Clerk's desk a petition of members of Skaneateles Grange, No. 458, Onondaga County, N. Y., against the postal zone rate system, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 18, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, whose ways are past finding out, we come to Thee with bowed heads and sorrowing hearts because of the widespread desolation throughout the land. Thousands are passing to the unseen, leaving homes and hearts desolate.

Again we as a body have been touched with sorrow and grief because of the death of another Member of this House—a real representative of the people, a patriot, a statesman, wise in his counsels, a strong advocate of what he believed to be right.

He is gone. We mourn his going, and by the blessed angel of faith help us, his widow, and all who knew and loved him to look forward to the life eternal, for there is no death.

I long for household voices gone,
For vanished smiles I long;
But God hath led my dear ones on,
And He can do no wrong.

I know not what the future hath
Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
His mercy underlies.

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BESHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BESHLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on the 23d day of last month, when the House had under consideration the Senate amendment to House bill 11945, to stimulate food production, I offered an amendment as follows: Page 5, lines 18 and 19, after the word "after" in line 18, strike out "June 30, 1919," and insert "December 31, 1918."

My amendment appears in the RECORD on page 10691. If it had been adopted it would have prohibited the sale for beverage purposes of any distilled spirits or their removal from bond after December 31, 1918. Notwithstanding the fact that the RECORD contains a correct statement of the language of my amendment, certain newspaper correspondents, probably unintentionally, incorrectly reported that I endeavored to have the date for the manufacture and sale of wine and beer extended from June 30, 1919, to December 1, 1919, whereas my amendment, if adopted, would have brought about war-time prohibition after December 31, 1918, or six months earlier than provided by the Senate amendment adopted by the House, and 11 months earlier than the newspaper correspondents in reporting my amendment incorrectly stated.

On the front page of a prominent newspaper of my State, in its issue of September 24 last, under the heading, "War-time prohibition approved by House," the following language appeared:

"All efforts otherwise to amend the legislation were defeated. The proposal by Representative KAHN of California, Republican, to extend the effective date for prohibiting the sale of wine and beer to December 31, 1919, was defeated 112 to 52, as was one by Representative BESHLIN of Pennsylvania, Democrat, to change date from next May 1 to December 1, 1919."

When this grossly false and unfair statement was called to my attention, I immediately sent the following telegram to the newspaper in question:

SEPTEMBER 25, 1918.

Yesterday's paper, first page, under "War-time prohibition approved by House," incorrectly states defeat of amendment offered by me to Senate prohibition rider to change date for stopping manufacture of beer and wine from next May 1 to December 1, 1919. My amendment (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 10691) provided that sale for beverage purposes of any distilled spirits or removal from bond should cease December 31, 1918, not December 1, 1919, as incorrectly published. Request the same publicity of this message as was given the article referred to.

I also called the Washington correspondent of this same paper on the telephone and inquired why an incorrect report was sent out. He said that his assistant wrote the article, and he promised that a full correction would appear in the issue of the following day.

Although the original item was widely published, and my position on a very important piece of legislation was grossly misrepresented, and I was thereby done a great injustice, the paper in question never had the courtesy to acknowledge the receipt of my message, and never took the pains to undo the wrong it did me other than to print on the last page of its issue of September 25, 1918, under title, "Put foreign and home wine trade on same basis," at the end thereof, the following:

Representative BESHLIN of Pennsylvania today called attention to the fact that an amendment which he offered to the prohibition provision of the food-production bill was for the purpose of prohibiting the sale of liquors after December 31 of this year. Misprints in some accounts of the debate, he said, made the impression that he asked for an extension of time to December 31, 1919, which was not so.

Mr. Speaker, not only did the RECORD contain the exact language of my amendment, but the amendment itself was in typewritten form and was in the possession of the Clerk, so any correspondent, had he wished to undo the wrong done me, could easily have done so by referring to the RECORD or the amendment.

The misprint was due entirely to the correspondent's act in reporting the item, not to the language of my amendment or to any misprints of the debate. A spirit of justice and fair play should have prompted those who committed the error to frankly admit it and make earnest effort to undo the injury unjustly done me.

Because of the correspondent's failure to make a proper correction and give it the same publicity as was given in the article referred to, I have asked the indulgence of the House for the purpose of attempting in some measure to counteract the effect of an unjust, untruthful, and grossly unfair statement and misrepresentation of my position on a matter of great importance to the American people.

Since I became a Member of this House I voted for the submission to the several States of the national prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution, and I have labored earnestly and consistently for war-time prohibition by statute.

Believing that national war-time prohibition would increase our supply of food and coal, improve transportation, increase labor efficiency and prosperity, add to our man power, reduce cost of building, and hasten the winning of the war, and that the only way to obtain it was by an act of Congress, I sought to make the act in question effective December 31, 1918, not December 1, 1919.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1104. An act for the relief of Edward Stewart; and

S. 469. An act for the relief of the heirs of W. H. Sneed, deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. JACOB EDWIN MEEKER, late a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President, to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And that under the second resolution the Presiding Officer had appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate Mr. REED, Mr. WILFLEY, Mr. WATSON, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. NEW, Mr. KENYON, Mr. HARDING, Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. KIRBY, and Mr. CURTIS.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3470. An act to amend section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4787. An act for the relief of Amherst W. Barber; to the Committee on Claims.

S. J. Res. 179. Joint resolution authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

S. 1104. An act for the relief of Edward Stewart; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 469. An act for the relief of the heirs of W. H. Sneed, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LONDON for 10 days.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 13086) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order which I made against the paragraph at the bottom of page 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the point of order made to the last paragraph on page 7. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it necessary to revert to that paragraph in order to have it considered and adopted in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph was read, and the Chair does not think it is necessary to revert to it now, the point of order having been withdrawn. The paragraph will be considered as having been adopted. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction and repair of hospitals: For construction and repair of hospitals, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $86,469,930: Provided, That authority is granted to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned for not to exceed $15,750,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENT: Page 19, after line 21, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act to authorize condemnation proceedings of land for military purposes,' approved July 2, 1917, as amended by an act approved April 11, 1918, and by an act approved July 9, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, amended, and its provisions in all respects, together with all its privileges and benefits, are hereby extended to the right of condemnation of land, with the buildings thereon, and the fixtures, equipment, materials, and supplies thereon and therein, required for hospital facilities or quarters for the personnel thereof, for office buildings and space therein required for war purposes by the Military Establishment, all supplies, equipment, material, machinery, and tools utilized in and on any lands authorized to be taken by the act approved July 2, 1917, above referred to, and its amendments thereto. The jurisdiction of such condemnation proceedings is hereby vested in the district courts of the United States where the property which is sought to be condemned, or any part thereof, is located or situated, regardless of the value of the same.

"Compensation for any property taken under authority of section 120 of the act of June 3, 1916, commonly known as the national-defense act, shall be determined and paid in accordance with the provisions of section 10 of the act of August 10, 1917, commonly known as the food-control act: Provided That any right of action or suit against the United States granted by section 10 of the act of August 10, 1917, hereinbefore mentioned, or any other act, by reason of any property or interest therein being taken by the United States other than by condemnation proceedings, or for the recovery of any sums of money awarded for such taking by the United States and not satisfactory to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, shall be brought, within six months after payment of the per centum required by these acts or within six months of the passage of this act in those cases where takings and payments of per centum has already been made under these acts, and upon failure to bring such suit within said period of time, all claims against the United States for any amount in excess of such payment shall be forever barred."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, this measure is recommended by the War Department and is intended primarily to extend the acts providing for the condemnation for war purposes so as to include hospitals and office space in the different cities of the United States where the Government has to establish offices. The main purpose, however, of the amendment is to extend the provision so as to provide for condemnation for hospital purposes. The Military Committee of the House had a hearing on Wednesday at which there were present a number of representatives of the War Department urging this legislation. I am bound to confess, in order to be fair to the House, that we did not have a quorum of the committee, although both parties were represented, and the committee was unanimous that some sort of legislation of this kind should be enacted as speedily as possible. The only question was what form it should take. The War Department recommended the President be authorized to requisition property anywhere and everywhere as he saw fit, but the committee thought that it ought to take the form of a condemnation proceeding in court.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman find upon investigation that the departments have had any difficulty in getting office space without the condemnation of property?

Mr. DENT. It was so stated before the committee last Wednesday that in some cities they have had considerable trouble in getting office space. I confess to the gentleman there was no specific instance given to the committee, just generally that they had had some difficulty in securing office space in the large cities. I am not wedded to that part of this amendment so far as this is concerned, but I do think the hospital part is a very important matter.

Mr. MADDEN. But the provision is so comprehensive that even with respect to the right to condemn property for a hospital that it authorizes the condemnation of all equipment within the building, of all the paraphernalia, everything in the building.

Mr. DENT. Does not the gentleman think that ought to be done during war times? This is an emergency measure.

Mr. MADDEN. They would have no need for it in most cases.

Mr. DENT. In most cases they would have no need. The very object of the law is to keep one individual who may try to hold up the Government from doing so, and the chances are if this bill is passed condemnation proceedings will rarely be resorted to.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a bill pending on the calendar now, reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, that goes somewhat into detail with respect to the question involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman, and I think deals with the question more comprehensively than does the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DENT. I am not familiar with that bill, but this amendment simply extends the act of July 2, 1917, as amended April 18, and in those two acts Congress provided for the condemnation of land for camp sites, for fortifications, for coast defenses, and for powder purposes. Those are the four purposes that have been provided for during war times, but it does not include hospital purposes. Now, it was stated to the committee by representatives of the War Department that under the present condemnation law the Government can condemn land for hospital purposes in connection with camp sites, but this is intended to cover separate hospitals, hospitals that are proposed to be erected to take care of the wounded soldier as he returns from France, separate and distinct from camp sites.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Is the whole of this amendment limited to the duration of the war?

Mr. DENT. Yes. It is an amendment to the original act of July 2, 1917.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman kindly tell us how many members were present at the committee hearing?

Mr. DENT. Well, I have no objection to stating to the gentleman there were six members present.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understood, the gentleman said he did not care to insist upon the part which authorized the condemnation of office space?

Mr. DENT. No, if there is any question. I do not consider that as important as the hospital feature.

Mr. TOWNER. It occurs to me that if that were eliminated it might prevent the point of order being made. A provision for the condemnation for hospital purposes is almost self-evidently necessary.

Mr. DENT. If there is any objection to that I am willing to strike it out.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the War Department came before the Committee on Appropriations concerning this and considerable other legislation. The committee has been taken somewhat to task at different times by some Members of the House because we carried legislation upon appropriation bills that seemed to be imperatively needed, so that in order to avoid as far as possible such criticisms, and having no desire to invade jurisdiction causing very much more work than we could hope to fully consider, the committee declined to consider these various proposals, but suggested that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I, as the chairman of the committee, so communicated to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Now, the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman, I think, involves two or three problems that it perhaps will be well not to have determined at this time. But the War Department urged the very great need of some power being given to take for immediate use buildings for hospital purposes. There is no question whatever of that need, and it is highly desirable that where buildings can be obtained that are capable of being converted into hospitals at reasonable cost it be done, without the expense of additional construction that would follow if we had to build hospitals from the ground up. So that I think the House, in view of the emergency, is warranted in carrying on this bill legislation that will deal with the hospital situation, and in a few moments I will read a paragraph that was submitted by the War Department that I think fully meets that emergency. It was also urged, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] has stated, that there was considerable need in connection with the office buildings, particularly in New York, where this situation arises: Some department of the Government has office space in one of these buildings. The need of expansion becomes great, and in order to expand they have to take additional space in the buildings then occupied or move out, with the cost incident to moving; that there was difficulty in getting tenants in these office buildings, who happen to be occupying space adjoining the Government, to give up their space in order that the Government might expand, and they urged the need of having the right to take possession of office buildings to the extent that might be necessary. I have no doubt there are such cases, and I have no doubt they present embarrassments to the Government, but such embarrassment is nothing like as acute as the embarrassment that arises in connection with hospital facilities.

Every Member of this House is desirous of facilitating in every way the procurement of proper hospital facilities for our wounded men, and therefore I think we ought to legislate as to that.

There is still another provision in the matter offered by the gentleman from Alabama that raises a question of very serious moment, and that is the attempt to put a statute of limitations upon the presentation of claims by private individuals against the Government. There is a provision that undertakes to limit to six months after requisition proceedings are instituted, and after the sum determined as reasonable is offered and refused, in which a claim may be instituted for additional compensation. I am not sure that that is quite fair to the citizen. I think one of the yet unsolved problems confronting the Government is the creation of some machinery for the adjustment of claims on the part of citizens against the Government. If we follow the old procedure of trial in the ordinary United States courts or the consideration of matters by the Court of Claims, and the further consideration by the Congress through a Committee on Claims, our great-grandchildren and probably our great-great-grandchildren will be interested in the adjustment of claims growing out of this war. The Anglo-Saxon has always clung very tenaciously to what is called "his day in court," and whether we desired to or not we could not take from a citizen that day in court, and yet I am convinced that one of the constructive acts that must be undertaken by the Congress is the creation of some machinery for quick and prompt adjustment of claims. We probably could not compel the citizen to submit his claim to such a tribunal, but if it was properly arranged I think he would gladly avail himself of such a tribunal in order to shorten time. To-day there are hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of claims settled within an hour or a day by the various boards of trade. The produce exchange in New York has an arbitration method by which they settle claims running into the hundreds of thousands of dollars weekly. The same is true of stock exchanges. And I have no doubt the ingenuity of the Congress will be sufficient to create some machinery for the rapid adjustment of such claims. I doubt the wisdom at this time of fixing a hard-and-fast six-months' limitation, even assuming that the courts would uphold such a limitation, against the presentation of a claim for compensation for property taken.

Reverting to the present need, I desire to read to the House what was suggested before the committee, and which seems to my mind deals with the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman direct the attention of the committee to the page in the hearings where testimony was given on this question? I can not find it in the index.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is on page 583 of the hearings, but this suggestion appears in House Document No. 1312. It is as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized, through the Secretary of War, during the existing emergency, from time to time, to requisition or otherwise take over for the United States any lands, including the buildings thereon, or any temporary use thereof, required for hospital facilities. He shall ascertain and pay, from the proper appropriation, a just compensation therefor. If the compensation so ascertained be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States in the United States district court for the judicial district where the property is situated to recover such further sum as, added to the 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation.

That follows the language that we employed in a number of instances; for instance, in connection with the requisition powers that were given to the President touching the shipbuilding program, and also in regard to requisition powers given to the Navy Department, and I think fully covers the present need of the situation. I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from Alabama that he withdraw his amendment and that he offer this in lieu thereof.

Mr. DENT. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama insist on the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand that the gentleman withdraws the point of order. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Page 19, after line 21, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"The President is authorized, through the Secretary of War, during the existing emergency, from time to time, to requisition or otherwise take over for the United States any lands, including the buildings thereon, or any temporary use thereof, required for hospital facilities. He shall ascertain and pay, from the proper appropriation, a just compensation therefor. If the compensation so ascertained be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States in the United States district court for the judicial district where the property is situated to recover such further sum as, added to the 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think perhaps the provision ought to be amended by adding, after the word "thereon," the words "and their equipment," so that it will read "including the buildings thereon and their equipment." It is possible that there might be equipment that would be desirable to take as well as the land and the buildings. I offer that as an amendment to the amendment which I have offered. After the word "thereon" insert the words "and their equipment."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modification of the amendment: After the word "thereon," in the third line of the amendment, insert the words "and their equipment."

Mr. DENT. A point of order was reserved on it, I believe.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I reserved a point of order.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I did not know exactly what the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was until I heard it read from the desk. The very proposition that the Committee on Military Affairs considered on Wednesday, when we had representatives of the War Department before us, was as to the form of this legislation. Everybody agreed that for hospital purposes some legislation ought to be enacted. Whether it should take the form of giving the President the right, through some subordinate, to take charge of the property, or that the right should be by formal proceeding in court were the two methods considered. The committee agreed that it ought to take the form of a court proceeding.

Mr. SHERLEY. Under the very act that the gentleman proposes to amend is it not in the power of the War Department immediately upon the filing of condemnation proceedings to take the property?

Mr. DENT. Unquestionably.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then what difference is there in point of fact between taking the property that way and taking it under the requisition power here granted?

Mr. DENT. The difference is simply this, which I think is a very marked difference: One authorizes the Military Establishment by authority of military law to take the property and then let the individual go into court and assert his rights. Under condemnation proceedings the Government must institute the suit against the defendant, and he then has had his day in court.

Mr. SHERLEY. But if the gentleman will permit, the man has his day in court when the Government has taken the property. Unless that is true you would have months of delay in trying condemnation proceedings, so that in order to avoid it the act provides that on the institution of condemnation proceedings the Government may take possession.

Mr. DENT. Let us see what has happened. On the 2d day of July, 1917, we passed the original amendment to the condemnation law, so as to give the Government the right to take immediate possession upon the filing of a petition by the district attorney in the district where the property is situated. That prevented the Government being delayed in acquiring possession of the property. We also amended, during the present emergency, that portion of the act which requires the Attorney General's office to give a certificate as to the title to the property before the Government could take possession or pay any money for any property acquired for military purposes.

Under that act we have built camp sites, we have erected fortifications, we have constructed coast defenses, we have established power plants for the purpose of acquiring nitrates, and recently by the act of July 9, the Army appropriation bill, we extended the right of condemnation of property, so that the Government might acquire timber anywhere in the country for shipbuilding or for aircraft purposes.

I asked the question, when the representatives of the War Department were before the committee on Wednesday, if they had been embarrassed in any respect in acquiring camp sites, in acquiring lands for fortifications or coast defenses, in acquiring property for nitrate purposes, or in acquiring property for timber in order to carry on the shipbuilding industry and the aircraft program, and they said not, because this law, this condemnation law, gave the Government the right to take immediate possession whenever the district attorney in any particular district where the property was situated filed a petition for condemnation. The proceeding was heard immediately in the court, and the court had the power to assess the damages.

Now, under the Sherley amendment the burden is put upon the defendant to institute his proceeding in court himself after the property has been requisitioned.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I do not care whether it is done one way or the other.

Mr. DENT. I thought the gentleman and I had agreed on that.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is tremendously important that it be done. If the gentleman does not like this provision, if he will reoffer his amendment, eliminating all of the language about limitation of suits, and eliminating all relating to public office buildings, and confine it strictly to the matter of hospitals, I, for my part, shall not object to it, and I believe the House ought to acquiesce in it.

Mr. DENT. I am perfectly willing to eliminate the provision in regard to office buildings, but I would like to make this statement——

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the real objection to the pending amendment recommended by the Secretary of War? I have been following the discussion quite closely. I have not heard any very potent reasons, in my opinion, advanced why the present amendment should not be adopted. It has the recommendation of the Secretary of War. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee, who is sponsor for the amendment that was first offered by the gentleman?

Mr. DENT. I thought I had stated my position as clearly as I knew how. One of the amendments authorized the Military Establishment just bodily to take possession of a man's property and then leave the man to his remedy in court, and the other, providing for condemnation proceedings, is a regular court process. That is the difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman his amendment framed in accordance with the suggestion just made by the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DENT. The only difference between the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky and my amendment is this, that the President, through the military authorities, can take possession of your property or my property or the property of anybody else without any court proceeding whatever whenever he sees fit, and then the remedy of the individual whose property is taken is left to the courts thereafter, whereas under my amendment the Government must proceed in an orderly way, by condemnation proceedings in the district court where the property is situated.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, as was suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], if we proceed in the customary civil-process way by condemnation, it may be months or years before the Government would acquire the possession of these needed buildings for hospital purposes.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman evidently paid no attention to my statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was paying as much attention as I could, but the gentleman was speaking in such a low voice that I could not hear him on this side of the aisle.

Mr. DENT. I stated emphatically that the act of July 2, 1917, which was amended in April, 1918, amended the condemnation law so that immediately upon the filing of a petition in the district where the property was situated by a United States district attorney the Government was authorized to take possession of the property, and then the rights of the individual would be determined in that condemnation proceeding.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me, in this court proceedings the title to the property is protected. It was brought out in the hearings before the Military Committee that the title to property in condemnation proceedings, where the Government acquires it, can be investigated, the money can be paid into court, and then the persons who are entitled to the money can litigate their various rights; whereas under this commandeering proceeding the Government has to take possession of the property and then they pay the wrong party the money.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why embark upon a new method of procedure in the case of hospitals and seek to amend the existing law in the manner in which the gentleman proposes? If the existing law is good enough for acquiring other property, why can we not just make it apply to hospital sites?

Mr. DENT. If I really understand the gentleman's question, he and I are in agreement. I am trying to make the existing law fit hospitals. That is all I am doing. I am extending the existing condemnation law so as to cover the case of hospitals. In other words, I think the existing law is sufficient but for the fact that hospitals were not named in the condemnation act that was passed last July.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman state that in order for the Government to acquire a tract of land on which to erect a fortification or artillery range the Government would have to follow the procedure which the gentleman has outlined by proceeding against the individual, not entering into immediate possession, and leaving the owner to his remedy in court?

Mr. DENT. I certainly do say that under the present law the Government has to institute condemnation proceedings; but immediately upon institution of the proceedings possession of the property is delivered to the Government. If the gentleman will read the act of July 2, 1917, as amended April 18, 1918, he will see that that is the law.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have just for the first time glanced at the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. Now, I want to ask the gentleman: The property is seized; the President ascertains a reasonable price therefor and pays it, provided the owner of the property accepts it. If he does not accept it then he gets three-quarters of it and can go into court and try to recover what he claims is coming to him. Now, the gentleman's position, as I understand it, is that the property can be seized, and by his amendment the United States must file condemnation proceedings, and the owner or owners of the property can not get anything until those condemnation proceedings are concluded.

Mr. DENT. Unless he agrees to accept what the Government offers.

Mr. CANNON. Who makes the offer?

Mr. DENT. The offer is made by the agents of the Government. There are only one or two instances in the country where they have had to resort to any proceedings, because they have agreed.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's amendment does not interfere with the law as it now stands—that the President shall ascertain the value of the property, and if the owner thereof receives it that ends the transaction. If not, can the owner thereof, if the gentleman's proposition is adopted, take three-quarters of the amount and go to the court for the balance?

Mr. DENT. He can not, except by agreement.

Mr. CANNON. Who makes the agreement?

Mr. DENT. The representatives of the Government and the owner.

Mr. CANNON. The law does not provide for it? The reason I ask the question is this: Say you take a hospital, with its furnishings, and it is ascertained by the President through the proper authorities——

Mr. DENT. The committee appointed for the purpose——

Mr. CANNON. May ascertain the value, and then the owner thereof can take three-quarters of the value and sue for the balance. That is the present law.

Mr. DENT. There is no law at all on the subject of hospitals. The present law authorizes the taking of possession of property under the food act. But the law so far as the acquisition of land for camp sites, fortifications, coast defenses, and timberland for shipbuilding and aircraft purposes provides for condemnation proceedings.

Mr. CANNON. It ought to be the law for everything taken, because if you have to go through the process of condemnation, the owner of the property will wait, and wait, and wait, under these conditions, and the war may be over and the owner may not get his money until broken up financially.

Mr. DENT. The case, as I understand, is given precedence over all others. I do not see why there should be any delay. In other words, the gentleman from Illinois thinks the power given to the President to requisition property without going into the courts protects the individual better than condemnation proceedings.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; because the owner can take three-quarters and sue for the balance. I want to say that I have no doubt that he will take the amount offered in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, but if he has to go through condemnation proceedings there will be interminable delay when you come to consider that you can go into the higher courts and the present conditions of the country.

Mr. DENT. What would be the situation if the suit is brought by the individual to recover the 25 per cent balance?

Mr. CANNON. He has probably got what it was worth when he took the 75 per cent, and it would not be a confiscation of his entire property. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENT. Well, I have no pride of opinion about this.

Mr. CANNON. I have not, but I would apply the present law where it does not apply to the taking of property.

Mr. DENT. We are applying the present law.

Mr. CANNON. Then what is the use of the amendment?

Mr. DENT. Because it does not apply to hospitals.

Mr. CANNON. I think it should apply to hospitals as to everything else. There are two hospitals in my little city crowded to overflowing.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, both methods are in use, and that is where the confusion has taken place on the part of the committee. There is a law for requisitioning property and a law for condemning property by the method suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, and both methods are employed frequently. There is something to be said on behalf of either method. Personally I am not concerned about which method is adopted so that we succeed in getting the hospitals.

Mr. CANNON. If they come to my town and seize the hospitals built by charity, I hope that the owners will get immediate payment.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. VARE. Have we not already extended the power to the Shipping Board to take over property in a line similar to that which the War Department asked in the gentleman's amendment on this same bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and the Navy Department and the War Department both have the power to requisition.

Mr. VARE. And unless we adopt the amendment that the gentleman has suggested we will have legislation in two different procedures in one bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is probably true, but we do that so frequently that it does not worry me. We have legislated in a number of cases for requisitions and also for condemnation proceedings. Some day I hope Congress will follow the suggestion I made a while ago, to provide some method more expeditious than the courts for the final adjustment of these matters.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where does the gentleman get the language in his amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. From House Document 1312 as presented in a letter from the Secretary of War relating to the subject.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That pertains to what?

Mr. SHERLEY. To hospitals.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This pertains to hospitals.

Mr. SHERLEY. So does it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there not this difference between the condemnation of land for shipyards, and so forth, and the condemnation of land for hospitals, that there should be some stipulation in regard to hospitals that need not apply to other property? For instance, the departments have been insisting upon fireproof buildings for such hospitals as they use. That is not provided for in the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; this amendment does not touch that. I do not want to insert a provision to condemn buildings of a certain type because I do not think we are qualified accurately to define what buildings they should take.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am stating as a fact that the department has insisted upon the use of fireproof buildings.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think they are wise in that. Does not the gentleman?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do; but this amendment would not cover that.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not affect it one way or the other.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They could buy any old ramshackle structure under this amendment, in any section of the country.

Mr. SHERLEY. They can buy it now, if they have the money, and if the owner will sell. There is no law prohibiting that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think it would be wise to put every hospital that might be needed for the use of soldiers and sailors in one section or in one State?

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course not. Does the gentleman?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No, I do not; but would not that be permissible under this amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. But this amendment does not touch that phase of the question. If the gentleman will permit, what we do is to vote moneys for hospital construction and hospital purposes. The department at the present time has the power to spend that money in any locality and for any type of buildings it sees fit. There have been no restrictions placed by Congress, but what has happened is that frequently they find a place that is quite desirable for hospital purposes and the owner asks an exorbitant price or he may refuse to give it up at all. In order to get it other than by negotiation and being frequently sandbagged, you have got to give the power to the Government to take it, but in giving that power we in no wise pass upon the question of whether the hospitals shall be in one locality or in another, of one type or of another. That is altogether foreign to this amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is possible to insert some limitation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; it is possible; but I submit this to the gentleman: If you undertake to write into the law now restrictions that hospitals of a certain type only shall be taken, and only to a certain extent in certain localities, you undertake in a legislative body to pass upon a matter about which we have not the detailed information to qualify us wisely to pass upon. The gentleman seems to be in fear that the hospitals will be concentrated in certain localities. Personally I hope they will not; but the gentleman should be the last one to complain of putting of many things in one locality, in view of the fact that his locality probably has had put into it more different governmental activities than any other locality in the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It may be that we have more industry there, and more population.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And it may be that we have more wealth and some natural advantages.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not complaining.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not see why that should always be brought into a discussion of this kind.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not complaining. The reasons the gentleman stated may have been the reasons to justify it, but the gentleman would have been the first one to complain if we had undertaken to put restrictions around the activities of the Government which would have prevented the doing of some of those things in the Philadelphia district.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say this about the Philadelphia district, which seems to crop up here so often, that if anything is wrong, unjust, or exorbitant there, I would condemn it as quickly as if it were in any other district.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sure of that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would not defend that situation.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman and I are not quarreling about that; I am quite sure of it. I have as high regard for the gentleman and his independence of judgment as any man in the House, and I know that he never would permit a local situation to control his judgment. The reason I call attention to the Philadelphia district is for the purpose of showing the impracticability of men determining upon the floor where things should be placed. There are many things that have been placed in Philadelphia that ought to have been placed there, and yet gentlemen not informed of all the reasons for placing them there might have thought otherwise, and if we undertake here to state just where and how and what kind of a building should be used for hospitals we are not doing equity, but simply embarrassing the obtaining of hospitals for the use of sick soldiers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has been very careful as chairman of a very important committee of this House and has done splendid work. I delight in complimenting him, and I am not doing it to flatter him, or in an effusive way at all, but I feel that it is proper for a Representative who observes irregularities of expenditures in any instance to call attention to it. It is rather surprising that in the erection of a hospital as much as $3,000 should be spent for each bed provided for the soldier. Such transactions make one feel that Congress should put a limitation upon that kind of expenditure. I am not going to point out any case or any particular locality. Let us grant that the climate of one section at a certain time of the year may be more favorable to the recovery of patients than the climate of another section, and that we ought to take advantage of it to the full, but if we learn that we have made a lump-sum appropriation for the construction of a hospital, and that the department is paying as much as $3,000 per bed therein, we should call attention to it, whether it be in my section, or in the gentleman's section, or wherever it may be. It does not seem to be a reasonable proposition. We have some responsibility as legislators. The gentleman as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has a tremendous responsibility. I know he would not want to see the money of the Government wasted nor would he want to see it used for favoritism or sectionalism. That is the reason I raised this question, in order that we might have some light on the subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not quarreling with the gentleman; I just repeat that it does not seem to me practicable that any limitations be put upon this undertaking to determine that question. The remedy is this, that wherever a case occurs that is an abuse of power publicity be given to it, and the real remedy is by the administrative officers seeing to it that they do expend intelligently both as to locality and as to price the moneys that we appropriate for hospitals.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I can say to the gentleman that these questions come up not only because constituents draw them to our attention but because of general correspondence indicating that favoritism has been played or that waste has resulted. I am not bringing this up for political reasons. I believe when we are appropriating money and granting these wide powers we should do what we can to prevent an abuse of them. The administrative officers sometimes are intensely human and inclined to serve their friends.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman, and I have taken occasion on every bill brought in here to call attention to the very solemn responsibilities that rest upon the administrative officers at this time, a responsibility that is beyond that which normally exists. Normally Congress can keep its hands on matters and can supervise and prevent wrongful or extravagant expenditures, but when you get into the expenditure of millions of dollars—for instance, for hospitals we are going to expend nearly $180,000,000—can this House undertake in any reasonable time to make such investigations as to localities and sites as wisely to write a law which shall say that the money shall be only spent in certain sums in certain localities for certain types of buildings. It is not practicable.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman any information as to the necessity for hospital accommodations at this time?

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, I made in my opening statement to the committee a statement touching the hospital situation. The plan is for hospitals representing in bed capacity 3½ per cent of the troops that are overseas on the theory that 7 per cent of those troops will need hospital accommodations in the United States, but they will need them on an average for six months or less and therefore for the year they figure a percentage of 3½ per cent. Now, that made a total requirement of 135,000 beds. Twenty thousand beds have already been provided for by previous appropriations and the additional money was to supply the 100,000 beds with contract authorization for the 15,000 additional that it was not thought would have to be paid for prior to the 1st of July, the total making 115,000, which, with the 20,000 already provided, makes 135,000 beds, which they estimate as needed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it is not improper to state it, have we 20,000 patients in the United States at this time?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no. I do not know exactly how many patients from overseas are here, but moneys have been provided for 20,000 beds. Now, in speaking of that, in order that I may not mislead——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to get the number anticipated by these provisions.

Mr. SHERLEY. In order that I may not mislead the gentleman, when I have been talking about 135,000 beds I am speaking of what they now designate as general hospitals, which are intended for use for troops overseas who are returned sick or wounded, and it is exclusive of the large number of hospitals we have already provided in connection with the various camps and cantonments for troops here in America.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does this estimate of 120,000 include tubercular patients?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is to take care of all kinds of patients. Now, in addition to that, of course, what the gentleman may have had in mind in connection with his question, there is a plan on foot by the Public Health Service looking to the creation of certain hospital facilities in America to take care of men who have been discharged from the military service and yet need hospital facilities.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I have the amendment offered by the gentleman and I will just read it.

That the President is hereby authorized, through the Secretary of War, during the existing emergency, from time to time to requisition or otherwise take over for the United States any land, including the buildings thereon, or any temporary use thereof, required for hospital facilities.

I would like to ask the gentleman if he would accept this amendment after the word "facilities":

Provided, That hospital facilities shall be so situated as to provide for the care of patients as near the place from which they entered the Army or Navy as possible, and that such facilities shall be in every case in keeping with the number of men in the service from the different States.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I have only this suggestion to make to the gentleman. It is quite possible that in view of troops returning from overseas you will need near the coast some proportionately larger number of beds than the number of men from that particular area would indicate, because men, when they come off the ships, may not be in condition for transportation to distances. For the gentleman's information I will say to him that the hearings developed the fact that they contemplate quite a number of hospitals in what are called large medical and supply centers, where they could get not only medical supplies but also centers of medical learning, and there have been suggested cities like Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Philadelphia, and others.

Mr. MADDEN. The idea I had in view is not to embarrass the War Department or the Government in any way, but as nearly as possible to have men treated as near their homes as is consistent under the circumstances.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose. The only question I had in mind was whether the putting in of a provision might not bring about a maladjustment of beds over the country, due to some of the circumstances I have mentioned. For instance, when troops come into places like Norfolk, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or Charleston, there is going to be need in those vicinities for hospital accommodations that are greater than the relative number of troops that happen to come from those centers would require, because of the fact that these men may not really be in shape to be transported. But I am in sympathy with the general idea the gentleman has in mind, that as far as possible we ought to return the boys to their localities and their homes for treatment rather than have them in other parts of America.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I have no idea that we should take a man who is not able to travel and send him to his home section for treatment until he is able to travel.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sure of that.

Mr. MADDEN. But after he is able to travel I think we ought to have the facilities as near his home as we are able to get them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think, in a large measure, that will be the policy of the department. It certainly ought to be.

Mr. MADDEN. This amendment that I suggest would not embarrass the department in any way, it seems to me.

Mr. SHERLEY. I only caught the reading hurriedly.

Mr. MADDEN. May I read it again?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. This is only roughly written. It says:

Provided, Hospital facilities shall be so situated as to provide for the care of patients as near the place where they entered the Army or Navy as possible.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would suggest the word "practicable" instead of "possible."

Mr. MADDEN. That is all right. I will be very glad to put that in.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman desires to offer that amendment, I shall not object to it.

Mr. MADDEN. I will offer it.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman offers the amendment will he allow me a suggestion? The gentleman has had the experience that many citizens have had, where medical knowledge, as best developed, can be had. The gentleman knows that down, for instance, at most Illinois towns and Indiana towns they go to Chicago or they go to Indianapolis because there they can receive treatment, whereas if the expert has his business, which is a great one on account of his being an expert, in Chicago or New York or Indianapolis or St. Louis, it would be impossible to get him to come down to the hospital, for instance, at Danville or Mattoon. It would be impossible to get him.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not mean to divide it in the towns. I mean the location, and as far as practicable that would leave it entirely in the hands of the executive authorities.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know. I will not vote against the amendment, although I think it might be well left to the administration.

Mr. MADDEN. There is this to be said, that the administration has been given a pretty wide latitude.

Mr. CANNON. I mean the administration of the military department.

Mr. MADDEN. The administration in everything since the war began has been given wide latitude. We have refrained from expressing our opinions in law because we did not want to in anywise embarrass it. And I would not introduce this amendment if I thought it would embarrass the administration, but I really think it would be a suggestion that they can carry out without any embarrassment.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, it is not a question of benefiting localities.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. It is for the benefit of the patient.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the point.

Mr. CANNON. And therefore it seems to me that we can trust the medical authorities to properly locate the hospitals.

Mr. MADDEN. There ought to be a little humanitarianism.

Mr. CANNON. It is humanitarian that you get the best possible service for the patient, where one of his sisters or cousins or aunts could run in with a doctor that could treat all diseases efficiently, but perhaps would not have the instruments, perchance, or the expert knowledge that could be found in the great centers of the country.

Mr. MADDEN. We are assuming now that the Government is taking jurisdiction over this treatment, and that they will supply the talent necessary to properly care for the patients.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman acquainted with the policy followed by the allied governments in establishing their hospital facilities for the care of the wounded which our Government has been called upon to utilize to provide hospital facilities for those wounded on the western front?

Mr. MADDEN. I regret I have not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been informed upon casual inquiry at the Surgeon General's office that our soldier boys are being sent to certain main hospitals in England, in France, on the Riviera, I believe, in Italy, where they receive treatment. I wish to ask the gentleman this question, because he is a practical business man, whether the adoption of his amendment would not lead to the establishment of many, many more hospitals than the exigent conditions might require?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think so, because there is not anything mandatory about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a legislative suggestion to the Surgeon General's office that the policy should be to establish hospitals all over the country if it is practicable for the welfare of the soldiers.

Our soldiers are going to arrive on the Atlantic coast and the Gulf coast in large numbers. They are not going to be confined there for a long time. It may be the judgment of the medical authorities that they should be given the benefit of the sea breezes along the Jersey coast or the New England coast, or down at Newport News. Why should we by legislative enactment direct the places where the hospitals should be established? I think it would result in establishing more hospitals than are really necessary.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me read from the hearing for the information of the gentleman. Dr. W. G. Stimpson, assistant surgeon general of the Bureau of Public Health, happened to be before the Senate committee, and Senator PHELAN asked this question:

Should not this fact be taken into consideration relative to the number of buildings you have—proximity of the families of inmates or patients?

Mr. STAFFORD. Right there, may I inquire of the gentleman what the Public Health Service has to do in administering the health activities connected with the Army?

Mr. MADDEN. They will have.

Mr. STAFFORD. By no means. That is an entirely different proposal to what is under consideration now.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course the one thing would relate in large measure to the other, and what is given in one case would be given in the other.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, what the gentleman is referring to is permanent disability, the treatment of soldiers after they have been discharged from the service. What we are now considering is providing quarters for the Army boys immediately on their return. The proposal referred to in the discussion the gentleman cites was a proposal for the establishment of a tubercular hospital in Kentucky. That is for civilians, not for the Army.

Mr. MADDEN. In my conversations out among the people I have been repeatedly asked the question why we did not pay attention to directing the Government authorities as to the facilities which the Government was furnishing for the treatment of our wounded soldiers, and it is in keeping with the opinion of almost everybody I met that I have offered this suggestion. I believe that if the views of the people of the United States were ascertained by Members of the House you would find a unanimity of sentiment throughout the country for the very suggestion I have offered.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] been withdrawn as yet?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I made the reservation of the point of order for the purpose of getting information. We have had a helpful discussion, and unless some one wants to say something more I shall withdraw the point of order, because I do not want to embarrass the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he offer his amendment to come at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well. Let it come at the end.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "compensation," line 10 of the amendment, insert: "Provided, That hospital facilities shall be so situated as to provide for the care of patients as near the place from which they entered the Army or Navy as practicable, and that the facilities shall be in every case in keeping with the number of men in the service from the different States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 6.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this question of the location of hospitals has been very widely discussed. I presume any part of this appropriation can be used for the building of hospitals in France?

Mr. SHERLEY. These particular moneys are not asked for hospitals in France, but moneys have been voted under another head for construction in France, and hospitals are built there. I am reminded that they are paid out of the item in regard to engineer operations in the field. They do not come out of this item.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Then none of this appropriation will be applied to hospitals in France?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. This is for hospitals at home. Under the head of "Engineer operations in the field" moneys heretofore appropriated have been applied to hospitals abroad, both base and advance hospitals abroad.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Would a part of this money be rightfuly used in building or enlarging the proposed hospital in Maryland?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not recall having spoken of a hospital in Maryland.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman spoke of one in Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I referred to three cities. Some one else may have alluded to the hospital in Maryland. Doubtless there will be some in Maryland. This money could be expended there as well as at other places.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. But this would not be spent for the hospital in Kentucky?

Mr. SHERLEY. The only hospital other than those with existing cantonments that I know of in Kentucky is that one proposed in connection with the bill that is pending in the House in regard to a hospital to be managed by the Public Health Service. I have no knowledge even as to that except what I gained from the reading of the bill. It is in a part of the State quite a distance from my home, and I know nothing about it except what may be disclosed in the hearings and what has been said in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For new permanent buildings and for additions at the United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., including heating, lighting, plumbing, and other necessary facilities, $300,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask if this is made necessary by the installation of some new Government activity at Fort Leavenworth?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is an existing institution which has been there for some time, and where there are confined men who have been in the military service and who have been sent there as punishment for crimes and offenses that they have committed. There came before the committee a construction officer from Fort Leavenworth with an estimate that was considerably in excess of this $300,000. He made quite a statement as to the number of prisoners that were there and the amount of accommodations that existed for them. The committee did not feel warranted in undertaking all the program that he outlined, which was not only the enlargement of the existing facilities in the way of cell houses, and so forth, but also involved the building of considerable shops for the manufacture of various goods and articles. I have no doubt that the Congress will eventually feel disposed to undertake some plan for the employment of these people, but we confined the money to a sum that would deal with the immediate necessities of housing these people, and such incidental work as flowed from that, because we did not feel we had the time to get at all the facts in connection with it.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the acquisition of the Ohio State rifle range and property adjacent thereto, $183,186.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read, if no gentleman from the Military Committee desires to reserve it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The fact in regard to the Ohio State rifle range is this: That rifle range was built by the State of Ohio and with contributions by the United States, and it is proposed now to acquire the interest of the State of Ohio at a price which is considerably less than the value the State has in it. In addition to that, there is a house there which was used formerly as a hotel by visiting officers who came there in connection with the rifle contests that were held at that place. It was believed that it ought to be acquired as a place for accommodation of officers stationed there and who otherwise would not have accommodations. The people who own this property wanted $25,000 for it, but the real estate officer of the Army testified that in his judgment it could be bought for $18,000, and we therefore cut the estimate by $7,000 in order to acquire the property at what seemed to be its true value.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand from reading the hearings on this item the Government to-day has this property under a lease and is in full occupation of it for all the purposes for which it can be used. They have erected no permanent buildings on the property. It is occupied merely with tents and other temporary structures. There are some who believe that the war is coming to a close. We all hope that it is near an end and that a desirable and conclusive peace can be arrived at. I question whether at such a time as this we should purchase land which we have to-day under a lease, that can be used to as serviceable an advantage for the purposes of the war as though we had title to it, when we may not have any need whatsoever for it after the war is brought to a close. I say this even though I agree with the policy of the committee in reporting this bill, and I voted for it that we should prepare in every way as if the war was going to continue.

I have read the hearings, and I can not see where the Government would be put in any better position whatsoever by the purchase of this property. It would be put out considerably by the expenditure of funds which may be needed for other purposes in carrying on the war so long as the war lasts. Under the facts as disclosed in the committee, and as I gleaned them from the hearings I think I am not undertaking any great responsibility in making the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. The point of order is that there is no authorization of law for the purchase of this rifle range, and the further point of order is that it is not a deficiency appropriation. This is a deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. The latter point, of course, would not apply in the slightest degree. The Committee on Appropriations might not have the right to have the particular matter referred to it, but it has jurisdiction as to simple deficiencies, and in reporting a deficiency bill it is not limited by the rules of the House to what are mere deficiencies. It has never been so held.

Mr. STAFFORD. The third point is that the Committee on Appropriations has not jurisdiction of this question, but that it is a matter that pertains entirely to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, that is too late, because having been reported out, and the matter having been submitted in the form of an estimate, the only point that would apply, if any, would be that it is not a work authorized by law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to take exception to the position of the gentleman just stated, unless the gentleman wishes to make his statement, and then I will reply.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; go ahead.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to controvert the position that the gentleman has just taken—that because this bill is reported it forecloses a point of order being made against the authority of the committee to report it. The chairman will notice that this is not a bill that has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It was reported originally day before yesterday. All points of order were reserved, and being reserved, that gave any Member the authority to make a point of order to any legislation that was not within the jurisdiction of the committee, but was properly before another committee. I believe I understand the chairman of the committee to contend that this was a matter that should have been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. There are many precedents to support that position. When, for instance, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors reports a bill as privileged, and it contains matters which are not privileged in their character, even though within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, they are nevertheless subject to the point of order, because they are not privileged. That has been decided several times in the consideration of river and harbor bills during recent sessions. There is no question but what this subject matter was within the authority of the Committee on Military Affairs and not of the Committee on Appropriations. For that reason certainly it is subject to the point of order.

Next, it is not authorized by law. It is a new project, and is not, under the rule, entitled to be considered on an appropriation bill, and especially on an appropriation bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERLEY. The situation that confronts the committee, of which the gentleman himself is a member, is this: Here is an important rifle range that is needed now, and will continue to be needed through this war. I am not willing to consider this bill on the theory that the gentleman seems to be willing to, that the war may end to-morrow. I am legislating to aid the Government in prosecuting this war as long as it may continue, whether it is one year or five.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated that same position a few minutes ago.

Mr. SHERLEY. I submit to the gentleman that his statement that the war may close ought not to have any relationship to this item. The War Department presented this item. I never heard of it until they presented it. The War Department represented it to be an important matter. We are acquiring property of considerably more value than we are asked to pay for it, property that has been created by the State of Ohio. The State to-day is putting through the legislature an enabling act so that the Government may have it, an action on the part of that State of a patriotic character to help forward what they and the War Department considered an important matter in connection with the prosecution of the war. I think it is exceedingly important that we should own this rifle range for the continued instruction of officers. I believe that it means a saving of money to the United States by procuring it on the terms here offered. If the gentleman from Wisconsin, in view of these facts, deems that the committee was wrong in recommending it, and that we ought not to carry it, I can only differ with his judgment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if I am not violating any committee confidence, this bill was reported from the subcommittee day before yesterday, presented to the full committee for consideration shortly after 10 o'clock. Because there was urgent need, in my opinion and of all members of the committee, that the bill should be reported that day, this item and the two following items were presented to the attention of the full committee within 10 minutes of 12 o'clock, when the bill was to be reported to the House.

I then stated that I reserved the right to make a point of order on these items. Since that time I have gone over the hearings. The gentleman has not controverted the statement I made originally, and if there is anything in the hearings I wish to be informed of it, because I make the point that the Government to-day is in occupation of the rifle range, and that there is nothing in the testimony to show that the Government would be in any better condition if it owned it. There are no permanent improvements on it. The hearings on pages 602 to 604 do not give any information or reason which should prompt the committee, especially the Committee on Appropriations, which has not the authority to determine the policy of military affairs, to report this item.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken as to the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee. It has jurisdiction and conclusive jurisdiction of a great many military matters and matters of far-reaching policy.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am willing to admit that the Committee on Appropriations have jurisdiction of some of those matters referred to by the chairman, but it has not jurisdiction over these rifle ranges. That belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs. I am not advised whether the Committee on Military Affairs has considered this question or not, but it is a question of policy for the Committee on Military Affairs and not for the Committee on Appropriations, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. REYBURN). The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, following line 12, insert as a new paragraph the following: "For the acquisition of property for ranges, $183,186."

Mr. STAFFORD. To that I make a point of order; first, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill; second, that the phraseology is of that import which shows the character of the legislation as one that should be reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and not from the Committee on Appropriations. The phraseology of the amendment shows on its face that it is subject to the point of order, and the Chair is obliged to rule that it is out of order. If any part of an amendment is nonprivileged, it destroys the privileged character of the whole amendment. Under the phraseology as presented it shows that this amendment contains matter within the purview alone of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman claim that the Committee on Appropriations has not authority to report a deficiency for land necessary for ranges?

Mr. STAFFORD. It has; but this is not a deficiency appropriation. This is an original proposition. It is not framed with that idea. It is an original proposition; and being an original proposition, it should originate from the Committee on Military Affairs.

All points of order were reserved against this bill. It was not a bill introduced in the basket, but was an original privileged bill reported subject to points of order, and the mere changing of phraseology does not make it privileged and not subject to a point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the language submitted that shows that it is for a purpose other than that stated, the acquisition of ranges. The bill carried hundreds of items in connection with deficiencies that were originally appropriated for by the Committee on Military Affairs. If the gentleman's narrow construction was to prevail, you would strike out four-fifths of what has been carried in this bill, because it relates to matters that heretofore have been appropriated for by the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs has appropriated for ranges, and may do so again; but if the House sees fit to increase the moneys for that purpose, it is within the power of the House, in connection with a deficiency bill from the Committee on Appropriations, to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House wherein the deficiency bill has reported appropriations for ranges?

Mr. SHERLEY. The last Army bill carried money that was expended for ranges. The fortifications bill carried money for ranges. The Aberdeen Proving Ground, which is a rifle range, was initiated in a deficiency bill. There were numerous instances in which bills have carried money for ranges. Every annual appropriation bill carries money for ranges.

Mr. STAFFORD. But never for the range now under consideration.

Mr. SHERLEY. The proposition presented to the Chair is not limited to any particular range or any particular place.

Mr. STAFFORD. The proposition may apply to ranges within the sole jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs, and is subject to the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true of money that we voted for hospitals and of a thousand other items in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. But points of order were not made to those items.

Mr. SHERLEY. No point of order could be made. We passed an item in regard to waters and sewers at military posts, for military-post exchanges, subsistence of the Army, transportation of the Army, and so forth. All of those things are within the original jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs, but come within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations in connection with deficiencies.

The CHAIRMAN. It would seem to the Chair that the question of the original jurisdiction of committees would not be the real test point in this case. The rule with reference to the jurisdiction of committees is entirely different from that which applies to an appropriation bill. The only question in the mind of the Chair is whether there is authority of law. Does the gentleman from Kentucky think there is authority of law existing for the purchase of ranges?

Mr. SHERLEY. We have been purchasing them right along. So far as I know, the question of authority has never been raised.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that when we have purchased them we have specifically provided for the purchase and made the appropriation for that specific purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. There have been any number of pieces of ground that have been purchased by the Government in connection with the prosecution of the present war under such items as shooting galleries and ranges and other items in connection with the maintenance of the Army. We have bought some ground in connection with cantonments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Because there has been special authority for the condemnation and purchase of property for cantonments. For the acquisition of property for ranges there has been always a special appropriation, which has come from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken about that. The range that was purchased at Aberdeen came in the fortifications bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. And specific mention was made for that purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand, but even if it had not been, if we had simply carried the language proposed here, it would not have changed the question of power. I was willing to designate this, but the gentleman took exception to that designation, and so I made it just to apply to ranges.

The CHAIRMAN. The only question in the mind of the Chair is whether there is authority of law, whether there is any existing law authorizing the purchase of ranges. Of course, with the matter of policy the Chair has nothing to do. It is the duty of the Chair to pass upon the matter of the rules of the House and the law.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in time of peace it has been the practice at least to provide specifically for the purchase of ranges. Since the beginning of the war we have legislated very generally upon the subject of the power of the War Department to purchase land for military purposes. That that is true is evidenced by the fact that in addition to the authority to purchase there is a rather elaborate statute with regard to the condemnation of property where purchase can not be made. That statute was discussed this morning, with a view of its extension to include hospitals. It was admitted that it included everything practically—all lands needed for military purposes, except possibly hospitals, and it was sought to extend the authority to hospitals. We extended the authority in the way of authority to requisition rather than authority to condemn. There can be no question about the authority of the War Department to take over land for military purposes. Therefore, there can be no question about the authority to pay for this land as Congress may appropriate. Here is a proposition to appropriate.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, in section 113 of the national-defense act is found the following language:

The Secretary of War shall annually submit to Congress recommendations and estimates for the establishment and maintenance of indoor and outdoor rifle ranges under such a comprehensive plan as will ultimately result in providing adequate facilities for rifle practice in all sections of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, that does not add to the strength of the position of the gentleman. The Chair will notice that this provides for the acquisition of land for rifle ranges. It comes within that character of decision which has been made from time to time in the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, as to whether the addition of a new adjunct in a navy yard such as a dry dock, which had not theretofore been authorized by law, would be warranted in the naval appropriation bill. The uniform ruling of the Chair has been that on the naval appropriation bill, though that committee has jurisdiction of the general subject matter, nevertheless it could not report the specific item for the creation of a new dry dock or even the enlargement of an existing dry dock. In this very place on the floor 10 years ago I made the point of order against an increase of the limit of cost of a dry dock at Puget Sound, and the eminent parliamentarian, Mr. JAMES R. MANN, in the chair, sustained that point of order. It is fundamental in this House that a new proposition can not be authorized on an appropriation bill. That is the wording of this amendment—for the acquisition of sites. It is a new proposition. The citation made by the gentleman from Kentucky that the Secretary of War shall submit estimates does not obviate that rule of the House that requires that no legislation shall be carried on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit an observation?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. That the amendment as now offered does not contemplate the payment for property already acquired, but it seeks to authorize further acquisition. There is existing law authorizing them to acquire land for rifle ranges, and the amendment as submitted seeks to authorize further acquisition of property for ranges and appropriates a sum of money. In that respect it would seem to be legislation. If it read "For the payment for property acquired as rifle ranges, $183,186," that would seem to make it a deficiency, but the wording of the amendment would seem to confer power to acquire further property for rifle ranges in that amount and it seems to be legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit, there was carried in the Army act, under the head of "Shooting galleries and ranges," this language:

For shelter, grounds, shooting galleries, ranges for small-arm target practice, machine-gun practice, field-artillery practice, repairs and expenses incident thereto, including flour for making paste for marking targets, hiring employees, such ranges and galleries to be open, as far as practical, to the National Guard and organized rifle clubs under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, $343,110.

There is language in the Army act expressly for the purpose of expending money for shelter and for grounds.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Did the gentleman notice the item on page 35 of the current Army appropriation act also—rifle ranges for civilian instruction?

Mr. SHERLEY. I had not; but that simply emphasizes it. It reads:

To establish and maintain indoor and outdoor rifle ranges for the use of all able-bodied males capable of bearing arms, etc., $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Those are matters of appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; so is this.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the point of order was not made, the Chair assumes——

Mr. SHERLEY. It could not have been made. That is an item carried every year, and has been.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will understand the position of the Chair. The rule of the House provides it shall not be in order to legislate on an appropriation bill, except under what is known as the Holman rule. In other words, no appropriation bill, it does not matter what committee it comes from, can carry legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in order to relieve the Chair of any embarrassment, I withdraw the amendment and offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn. No objection is heard, and the gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shooting galleries and ranges: For shooting galleries and ranges, including similar objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1919, $183,186.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I submit it is not subject to the point of order. This is the exact language of the Army act relating to matters which the Army act appropriated for and is to supply additional moneys as a deficiency for this purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman may by circumlocution attain indirectly what is not authorized by the rules of the House, and yet the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin claim in legislation you can not do indirectly what you might not be able to do directly in some cases?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I do not make that claim; but yet, Mr. Chairman, the purpose is obvious, that while that legislation might have been authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs even then when authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs it might have been subject to the point of order in creating new objects. There is no estimate from the committee before the Committee on Appropriations along the lines submitted in the amendment now proposed, and yet I realize that is not a matter that can be taken cognizance of by the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment seems to conform to the express language of the law, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I did not make the point of order without having given careful consideration to the subject under consideration. I realize the responsibility that rests upon a Member in making a point of order to any matter that relates to the military affairs of the Government while the country is at war, and yet the page and a half of hearings before the Committee on Appropriations show how unwise it is for the Committee on Appropriations to take jurisdiction over matters of policy that belong to the Committee on Military Affairs. There was no full consideration given to this matter by the full committee of the Committee on Appropriations. Time was of the essence to report this bill to the House, and we had no time to consider this or the two succeeding items, not even time to present argument in opposition or make full inquiries as to the merits, but we had to go to the hearings to obtain the reason for its being included at all.

The hearings show that this land to-day is in the occupation of the Government under a rental proposal. There is no additional advantage whatsoever that will come to the Government from the absolute purchase of it. The War officials make no such argument. They claim there is a clubhouse there—the land has been in the control of the State of Ohio for these many years and they are willing to sell it; perhaps they are only too willing to load it upon the National Government in these war times. If there had been such a showing made in the hearings that it was necessary for the Government to purchase it I would not have thought of making the point of order or thought of rising in opposition to the amendment, but we know, even in these war times, how prone military officers of the Government are to establish agencies and activities in order to establish perhaps a militaristic policy in this Government. I am opposed to that. I think we should conserve our money where it is necessary. We need money, if the war is to continue, for other activities. I indorse the policy announced by the chairman of the committee, that we should not expend money except where it is absolutely necessary. The hearings show that it is not necessary to purchase this land because the Government to-day has the use of the land under a rental proposal. We could go ahead with much more consistency and purchase land where we have invested hundreds of millions of dollars in our camps and cantonments, where we expended millions upon millions of dollars in hospitals and in other improvements. Here there is only tent equipage in the use of it. I am not surprised the State of Ohio even convening its legislature in special session in order to pass an enabling act so as to permit them to get rid of this property and to get a large sum of money from the National Government. If there is no better showing made from the hearings than this, then I respectfully contend that the amendment should be rejected even though it is being considered through the circumlocution of the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the testimony shows that a number of years ago the Government put some money into this rifle range. It originally cost $252,000. There is a valuation placed on the interest of the State of Ohio at $165,000. They are willing to sell it at what it cost them and Gov. Cox is endeavoring to put an enabling act through the Ohio Legislature for that purpose. Then follows considerable testimony. There is also a statement in an inventory, page 604 of the hearings, which shows that there was land to the amount of 504 acres which cost $63,000; buildings, $70,073.05; sewerage disposal, latrines, and sewerage system, $25,495.08.

Target butts, targets, and firing line, $25,254.49; water purification and distribution, $10,339.88; telephone and light systems, $9,081.79; power-station equipment, $5,868.61; garbage crematory, $2,760; standpipe, $2,000; roads, walks, concrete retaining wall, and so forth, $40,874.08; or a total of $252,746.98. The United States Government has already invested $103,086.01 in that property; the State of Ohio has invested $149,666.97. I submit, in view of those circumstances, that this House is warranted in making this purchase. The Federal Government has already an investment in there. It will acquire property that is fully worth the amount, and it will make it independent in putting additional moneys in the future in the establishment of a rifle range. The statement of Col. Mumma is to this effect:

Col. MUMMA. The land has appreciated in value. This places a valuation of $125 per acre on the land, but land next to it was purchased at an average price of a little more than $200 per acre. Then there are the range structures, consisting of retaining walls for target butts, a very large concrete mess hall, a concrete storehouse, track facilities, sewers, electric light, water, sewage disposal, and filtration plants, and they were constructed 11 years ago at a price which would mean about one-half of the present cost of construction.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations considered this item as it did all the other items. It came to it because it was brought to it by the War Department, and strongly urged. In view of the testimony shown here, I submit the committee would have been derelict in its duties if it had not undertaken to carry out what appears to be an economical and wise investment for an unquestioned proper military purpose. On that statement I am willing to submit the matter to the House for its consideration.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman know why these matters were not submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs when we were considering the regular Army appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not. And personally I should have been very glad if these items had gone to that committee.

Mr. TILSON. I did not know whether any emergency had arisen, or why it was not presented to us during the time we were considering the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it might have depended somewhat on the action of the State of Ohio being willing to sell, or negotiations had not been completed. But that is a surmise.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. SEARS. There are other State rifle ranges that are being used by the Government, for which I understand no charge is being made. If those States should decide to sell to the Government, will it be the policy of the Committee on Appropriations to also reimburse the States for the amounts of money they have expended on those rifle ranges?

Mr. SHERLEY. Answering the gentleman's question, I would say it would depend a good deal upon two facts: One is, whether the property it was sought to buy was worth the money that was asked for it or worth more or less. And another, whether, having in mind all the ranges we own, we would need additional ranges or not. I can only say to the gentleman that if a matter of that kind came from the State of Florida, I would try to approach it as I have this matter that has come up now, with the idea of doing that which the facts seem to make wise under all the circumstances.

Mr. SEARS. I do not think the State of Florida would want to sell the rifle ranges, because we will want to use them after the war. But I wanted to know what the policy would be.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have tried to tell the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair reported that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 2.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the acquisition of land at Fayetteville, N. C., for an artillery range, $1,500,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment there to strike that out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROBBINS offers the following amendment: Page 20, strike out lines 15 and 16.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I would have made a point of order against that item, but it seems that the skill of the chairman of the Committee on appropriations is such that he would steer around any points of order. This little item carries with it, as we learn by referring to the hearings on page 794, $20,000,000 for the improvements and probably some additional expenditures for the hospital. Now, I think it is remarkable, and I think this item is indefensible, that 18 months after we are in the war, after we have the enemy on the retreat—I do not say the war is won, but after, at least, the President has considered that we are far enough along to consider propositions looking to peace settlements—we should take up and expend $20,000,000 to establish another cantonment when we already have established and now have in active operation, I believe, 86 cantonments of various kinds. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have come to a time when I think we ought to see how we can economize in the expenditures for the further prosecution of this war. We are now in the last two days of the sale of this great $6,000,000,000 war loan, and I see, according to the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury this morning, that we have two days to run and $2,000,000,000 of bonds yet to sell. I think that ought to indicate to this House pretty clearly that the people of the United States are beginning to want to know how their money is being expended. They are not buying these bonds like hot cakes. And it is time for us here in Congress to inquire how we are going to expend this money economically. Here is $20,000,000 of an appropriation for a new camp, and the next item carries $17,000,000 for another camp. How are we going to justify that before the people? Is it because this is a military camp for the purpose of testing cannon? We have at Aberdeen, Md., 50 miles from Washington City, a camp for that purpose. We have Fort D. A. Russell, with a range of 20 miles, as I understand, in Montana——

Mr. MONDELL. In Wyoming.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; in Wyoming. I am glad the gentleman corrected me. Why should we not, gentlemen, use these establishments at these places instead of establishing new ones, I do not know. We have in Kansas, at Fort Riley, some 10,000 acres for the purpose of testing cannon. Here is a new expenditure for this same purpose, and if I have read the testimony aright this land is valued at from $1 to $100 per acre. I now read a statement from Maj. James E. Holden, on page 578 of the hearings, and if you take the $1,500,000 that he asks for the acquisition of the ground alone, and divide it by 135,000 acres, which he is seeking to get here, you have about $11 per acre to be paid for this ground all around. Now, how are we to justify such an expenditure as that?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, does he mean to divide 135,000 by a million and a half and say it makes $110 an acre? I think the gentleman should do the sum over again.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is over $11 an acre.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is $11 an acre.

Mr. ROBBINS. Well, take $11 an acre. How are we to justify paying $11 an acre?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is because——

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. He has had opportunity to make his statement. Let me make my statement. Here is a proposition which is presented to Congress. I submit that it should be considered on its merits, and I want the gentlemen of the committee, and especially the distinguished chairman of the committee, to reflect whether these departments are doing wrong or not when they go ahead and contract for an expenditure of one and a half millions without consulting Congress at all and commit us to an expenditure here, as this does ultimately, of $20,000,000. What is Congress permitted to say about that? Have we had any opportunity to consider it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman can answer when I am through, if he please.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will be glad to.

Mr. ROBBINS. I say the proposition ought to be considered by Congress in this light: When we come to an expenditure of $20,000,000 for any such purpose—because this war has been going on now, so far as we are concerned, for 18 months, and so far as the other belligerents are concerned it has been going on four years—and we are now past the point in this war where we need to acquire any more encampments for the training of troops, and if the department wants a new encampment like this at a stated cost of $20,000,000 it ought to consult the Committee on Military Affairs, which in this case would be the appropriate committee, and have that committee consider it and report it for consideration on the floor of this House on its merits.

What has been done here? When I turn to the hearings and inquire about this item, I find that the chairman of the committee asked this question:

Has this matter of land purchase as against rental been determined by the Staff, or who functioned on it?

And, by the way, I understand they could rent it at $120,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. Here is the answer:

Gen. SNOW. I discussed it personally with Mr. Crowell, the Assistant Secretary of War, who makes the decision.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether it had the consideration of the Staff?

Gen. SNOW. We also put the proposition to the General Staff for their consideration through the Operations Division.

There we have this whole proposition, involving an outlay of $20,000,000, taken up in the War Department and considered there before it is brought here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will pardon me, but where does he get the $20,000,000?

Mr. ROBBINS. From the hearings. There is nothing alarming in this apparently innocent item of $1,500,000; but if the gentleman will turn to the hearings, on page 581 he will see that $17,000,000 is asked, exclusive of the land, and the land is to cost $1,500,000 additional, and then that is followed by this question by the chairman:

The CHAIRMAN. Presumably, if they are to be the same, that would make a total of $20,000,000 you expect to spend at Fayetteville in construction?
Gen. SNOW. Yes, sir.

I accept that statement. That is all that any Member of this House can get in regard to this from the testimony taken by the committee on this item.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would seem to lead to the impression that this $1,500,000 was simply an entering wedge for the $20,000,000?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes. I cited that at the beginning of my remarks, that this item of $1,500,000 seemed to be merely the beginning for the expenditure of $20,000,000; and if the hospital is to be included, the cost will be still more, because something is said about $9,000,000 for hospitals at Camp Bragg, Camp Knox, and Camp Jackson.

Now, I contend most seriously that Congress ought to preserve its rights as against these departments that are so insidiously encroaching on us, and that are spending money here by large lump sums. The Congress should consider, in the first place, whether these expenditures are proper and necessary. These departments should be required to send their representatives before the appropriate committees and ask for what they claim they need and give the reasons, and if they desire to acquire a rifle range at Fayetteville, N. C., or at West Point, Ky., adjoining the district of my friend from Kentucky, they should introduce in the hearing the proper facts and let the committee consider them, and then report the matter to the House in due process of legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has referred several times to this as a range for testing cannon. It is not a range for testing cannon but for the training of troops in the use of cannon. In that respect it differs widely from the Aberdeen Proving Ground, which is a range for the proving of cannon.

Mr. ROBBINS. The chairman says it is a sufficient range for heavy artillery.

Mr. MONDELL. But it is in no sense a range which is to be considered as a proving ground.

Mr. ROBBINS. If it is a testing range merely, why do we not use the vast ranges we have at Fort Riley and Fort D. A. Russell?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a training range, not a testing range.

Mr. ROBBINS. There you want distance in which to prove the long-range guns. At Indianhead we test guns by firing up against a hill. We are amply provided with both ranges and testing grounds now.

I do not see any merit in this proposition at all. I do not want to say that, because these ranges are both located in the South, it shows favoritism toward the South. I do not want to say to my learned friend, the chairman of the committee, that because this item following here is near his home city of Louisville he had something to do with locating it there. But I do want to say this, that we have passed the time in this war when we have any reason to locate any new cantonments any where.

We ought to be conserving the money of the people. The people are not buying liberty bonds as freely as they were expected to, and they are not going to pay these taxes with the hurrah and enthusiasm which they manifested heretofore, and the reason is that they believe there must be unreasonable extravagance somewhere in the expenditure of the public money. I will vote every dollar that is necessary for the prosecution of this war, and that has been my record from the beginning. I will vote for every bill that is necessary to carry the war forward to a quick and victorious conclusion. But I will not vote for any bill that I think is appropriating money recklessly and uselessly. I think this item and the item following it are both subject to that criticism and should be stricken out, as my amendment proposes.

It was stated by the chairman of the committee in his opening remarks on this bill that the original request of the department was for approximately $2,500,000 more than is appropriated. This bill carries $6,345,755,666.04. The reduction made by the committee on the estimate submitted by the War Department amounted to $2,540,375,985.45. This shows conclusively either that the departments are not very accurate in their requests on Congress for money or that the committee has pruned this bill without due regard to the needs of the War Department. If the department is so far wrong as to the amount required, it is fair to assume they are wrong as to these two items also.

Listening to the discussion, however, I am assured that the committee has allowed the War Department all the money that is required to carry the Military Establishment through until the next Congress meets in December and enable our Nation to wage the war against Germany without stint and without abating any, in our present vigor, energy and determination. The American people will indorse liberal and proper appropriations, but they are demanding that care and scrutiny must be used in the expenditure of public money. The cost of this war is so tremendous, and our burden to carry on our military operations and aid our allies has become so great, that it is only reasonable that watchfulness and care must now be used in every item contained in any appropriation bill.

The committee has used this care, but they have not gone far enough. The Fayetteville, N. C., item, carrying one and one-half million for the acquisition of the land, and the West Point, Ky., item, carrying $1,600,000 for the same purpose, and committing the Government to the further expenditure in the construction of the cantonment of twenty million in the Fayetteville item and seventeen million in the West Point item, or an aggregate of approximately $37,000,000, are well worth while saving, especially when it will not interfere in any way with the preparation of our Artillery for usefulness in the present war.

The plain fact about both of these appropriations is that they can not be utilized in the present war to any great extent. That is all the more reason that this money should be saved. Our Artillery is doing most effective work and has been trained in the camps that we now have either in this country or in France. Saving this large sum of money would lessen to that extent the burden we are imposing on the taxpayers of the country.

I do not believe the war is over, but I do believe that it is past its crest; that the Hun is retiring permanently and rapidly toward Berlin; that he will soon cross the Rhine and that our victorious armies and those of our allies will soon compel an "unconditional surrender" not only of all the German troops but of the entire military autocracy against which we battle. This is what the American people demand. This is what I favor, and that is why I believe in aiding to accomplish this in every possible way.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's speech is predicated upon certain statements that are very foreign to the actual situation. The gentleman denies any imputation, but makes an imputation with his denial, and he assumes that these two items are the entering wedges to the expenditure of $20,000,000 in each instance at these particular points. The fact is just the reverse. He voted for the Army bill, which largely carried the money, some $40,000,000 of which is being spent at these two particular places, which are cantonments similar to the others that he has voted for and similar to those that are scattered all over the country, except in this regard, that these cantonments are intended for Artillery troops. The military officials came to the conclusion that they could not get satisfactory results in the training of Artillery troops by having them in small units at the various cantonments, and they determined, as a matter of military policy, that it was desirable to establish certain cantonments for the training of artillerymen. Accordingly, they established these. They have established four—one at Fort Sill, in the West; one at Fayetteville, N. C.; one at West Point, Ky., and another at Fort Jackson, at Columbia, S. C. Now, there are already being built at these various points cantonments and hospitals for the men and accommodations for the horses and draft animals. The proposition which was brought to the Committee on Appropriations was this: In view of the fact that $20,000,000 was to be expended at each of these places, and in view of the fact that they insisted that the Army would want, as all Members who have been here in Congress know they have wanted for many years past, some ranges for Artillery practice, was it not desirable as a matter of business to expend at Fayetteville $1,500,000 for the acquisition of 135,000 acres of land at an average cost of $11 an acre, instead of paying for the rental of the land and then having to pay damages incident to the destruction of buildings and property and crops, and at the end of a year or two probably have an expenditure that they testified would amount to $500,000, and then have $20,000,000 worth of investment upon property they did not own? They insisted that as a business proposition it was desirable to own this land; that even if it came to a question of salvage the ownership of this land upon which $20,000,000 of investment had been made would enable the Government to obtain more in the way of salvage than if they simply had this land leased and had to pay the incidental damages. The Committee on Appropriations had nothing on earth to do, any more than the distinguished gentleman, Mr. ROBBINS, had, with the selection of these sites. We had nothing to do with it either as a committee or as individuals.

I never knew of the selection of either site until it had taken place, and that applies to the site at West Point, Ky., which is 20 miles from Louisville. I made no recommendation to any individual at any time in regard to it. It happens to be a site that was used some 15 years ago by the Army in connection with Army maneuvers. It was arranged by the officers of the Army stationed at the camp that is in my district because they believed that it was desirable property. When it came to the consideration of the matter in connection with West Point, I asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], and the other Republican members to please go into it and investigate the matter thoroughly, because as chairman of this committee I did not want to be even seemingly put in the position of undertaking to favor some project that happened to be near my district. The gentleman in making a reference to that, even with the denial, does himself an injustice, because he knows that the locality had nothing to do with this committee recommendation upon either of these sites, and I did not, even in the subcommittee, vote upon the matter, in order that I might not in any way undertake to influence the judgment of the members of that committee. That statement will be borne witness to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who sits here now. I say that simply in defense of myself. It is entirely immaterial to me what action is taken by the Committee of the Whole upon these two items. They can put them out or put them in as they see fit. These camps are going on. The money is being expended there. At the West Point camp site there are already two brigades of Artillery, and there are to be six all told, as there are to be at the other place. I submit to the gentleman himself, who talks about economy, whether he thinks it is wise to make an expenditure of $20,000,000 upon leased land that can be bought for the price which this can be bought for? I believe the Government would have been better off if it had bought all of the land upon which it made these tremendous outlays of money; that it would be in a better position to get back a return and to protect the Treasury of the United States. Now, if Congress thinks it desirable that we continue to rent, that we continue to be liable for damages, why, then, that is the wisdom of the Congress and I have no exception to take to it; but the proposition that is presented here is not a proposition involving the expenditure of $20,000,000. It is a question whether, having made an expenditure of $20,000,000, you believe it is wise to spend $1,500,000 in one place and $1,600,000 in the other in order to own the land upon which this large investment has been made, rather than to lease it and pay the damages done to property. That is the real question that is brought here by these two items. That was the question that the committee considered. It was explained fully in connection with the hearings before the subcommittee; it was explained by me fully to the full committee.

I spoke for over two hours to the whole Committee on Appropriations. I then came to this floor and spoke nearly three hours. That was five hours altogether, which was no easy task for me. I did it because of the obligation I owe to this House. I have never in any way tried to have any matter put in without the full judgment of the committee. I have begged individual members to help me, as chairman of the committee, in the consideration of matters, and have welcomed consideration on the floor. If we had wanted to put through something here that involved a large expenditure it could have been done, and the gentleman with his diligence would never have known of it. He voted, when he voted for the Army act, for most of the money that was expended at these cantonments. It did not come from the Committee on Appropriations. What is here presented is presented because the War Department did not want to buy the land unless Congress wanted it to buy it, and they believe, in view of the fact that it was wise, that it should be bought.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to have heard the gentleman, and having interrogated the gentleman from Pennsylvania while on his feet, would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky this question, Was the $20,000,000 or thereabouts to which reference has been made provided for in a previous appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. In the Army act in connection with the money for cantonments; and the determination of localities was made by the War Department, as they have made determination of localities touching the cantonments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That money was to be used for Artillery ranges?

Mr. SHERLEY. In general terms for cantonments, but these are cantonments in connection with Artillery practice in places where they could be trained as artillerymen in the actual maneuvering of guns and firing them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me ask another question, and this will be an answer to the whole question. Is there anything in these two items for Artillery ranges not contemplated in the appropriations hitherto made?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not as far as I know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Artillery ranges herein referred to, except as to the acquisition of land, have all been provided for by prior appropriations.

Mr. SHERLEY. The actual building is going on this minute at West Point. There are stationed there a number of thousands of troops, and other troops are being brought in as fast as barracks can be completed to house them. The same work is going on at Fayetteville and Columbia, S. C.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The prior appropriation did not provide for the purchase of land as herein contemplated?

Mr. SHERLEY. It did not; and therefore the War Department, being in the process of expending large sums of money, felt it was a mistaken policy to put money into ranges that would probably be used after the war—because gentlemen will recall that for 15 years past the War Department has insisted on having Artillery ranges for training Artillery, and time after time there have been proposals looking to that end. They felt that inasmuch as the range would be permament, and inasmuch as $20,000,000 was being invested in it, it was the part of wisdom for Congress to authorize the purchase of the land rather than to lease the land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that is the correct policy. Was enough money left out of the $20,000,000 appropriated to provide for the purchase of the land?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no doubt they have money sufficient to have bought the land and said nothing to Congress about it. If they had done that, some gentlemen would have complained that they were acquiring land in great quantities without Congress being consulted. Evidently the War Department thought that Congress ought to have an opportunity to express its views touching the acquisition of the land. They came with the proposal, and there was testimony by the head of the Artillery Corps and by an officer from the real estate division as to the value of the land. The examination was as full as we felt it could be made to develop the facts.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the subcommittee on deficiencies, but I was called in, as I stated to the House, in connection with the latter part of the hearings and in the writing up of this bill, and I feel some responsibility in the matter of this item. It is one of the very few items in the bill in regard to which I had some question and some misgiving. It is an item I considered very carefully, and the subcommittee at my suggestion held it up for some 24 hours until I could make up my mind in regard to it.

Let me say at the outset that the subcommittee in formulating this bill did not take into consideration any suggestion that had been made anywhere by anybody with regard to an early peace. As one member of the subcommittee I felt it was my duty to pass on this appropriation bill as though it would be necessary to pursue this enterprise of war that we are in to a final military determination. [Applause.] And if there is any one thing we ought to emphasize in the passage of these bills it is that the American people are prepared to fight the war out to a victorious and successful finish. [Applause.] So much for that.

The question as to whether or not we should buy these lands was to me simply and solely a business question. Personally I have had some doubt about the advisability of establishing enormous Artillery ranges and practice grounds at Fayetteville. I do not know what influences were brought to bear on the War Department to bring them to the conclusion that that was a good thing to do. But they had the authority to do it, and they have under that authority provided for the construction of a great camp there. It is under way. They expect to finish it in January or February. Nothing that we could do now short of absolutely prohibiting further work there would have had any effect on the expenditure of $17,000,000 to $20,000,000 that the department estimates is necessary for buildings and other improvements on these grounds. That money will be spent. The camp is established. We had to accept that fact as settled so far as we were concerned.

Then the question was what was the best business in this situation. We were told that it would cost approximately $500,000 per annum to rent the land at Fayetteville and to pay the damages that would arise from the use of approximately 135,000 acres. On the other hand, it was estimated that we could buy approximately 135,000 acres for a million and a half dollars. In other words, the question was, a camp having been established, a large part of $20,000,000 having been allotted for its construction, the work being under way, was it good business to pay for the rental of the ground per annum one-third of the sum for which it was estimated the land could be purchased? It did not strike me as being good business. If it were a question of establishing or not establishing this training ground, I for one should have doubted the advisability of doing it. That was not the question. The question was, Which is the best policy to pursue under the circumstances? And it seemed to me there was no question about it. It is much better to pay a million and a half and own the land than to pay $500,000 a year and have no title to it. Following this is the West Point, Ky., item. Personally, I am of opinion, without claiming to have overmuch information with regard to either of them, that the West Point training ground is much the better of the two for the purposes for which it is to be used, and there is in my mind less doubt as to the propriety of establishing a camp at West Point than there is at Fayetteville. The chairman of the committee chances to live not so very far from the West Point training camp, though it is not in his district. The chairman of the committee, as he has already told you, declined to vote on these items or to attempt to influence others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Or to attempt to influence the members of the committee touching either of these two items. He did not vote; I do not believe he attempted to influence anyone in regard to them. He certainly made no attempt to influence me, and was very careful to say that we should settle these matters on our judgment and knowledge of facts.

At West Point the land will cost much more per acre than at Fayetteville, but we need only about one-third as much of it, because the land is of a character better adapted to these uses than at Fayetteville. It does not require so much territory for an adequate Artillery range and maneuver ground. At West Point it would cost about 25 per cent per annum of the estimated cost for rent and for damages. So in the West Point case it was again simply a question of good business; and in view of the fact that in both cases the camps had been established under general authority heretofore granted by Congress, that they are under way, that they will be established and completed in any event unless the Congress is prepared to now prohibit any further construction, it seemed to be much better to acquire the land than to rent it at the lowest rate at which we could secure it.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is the ground smaller in acreage at West Point?

Mr. MONDELL. There are 40,000 acres at West Point and 135,000 acres at Fayetteville. A smaller acreage is said to be necessary at West Point and probably a smaller acreage available, but a smaller acreage is said to be necessary because the land is more rolling and affords effective backstops for Artillery fire.

Mr. TILSON. Why is it so much higher in price? Is it near any large city?

Mr. MONDELL. The West Point land is, I should judge, with what little knowledge I have of it, better worth $40 an acre on an average than is the Fayetteville land worth $10 an acre. The Fayetteville land is cut-over pine land largely, as I understand it, and the West Point land, while quite rough in the main, is, some of it, it is claimed, very good farming land and worth as high as $100 an acre. Some of it is very rough and not worth much.

Mr. TILSON. As to its fitness for the purpose for which it is being purchased, did the gentleman go into the nature of the soil at all?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will understand that I did not attend the hearings, and therefore I had to depend upon what I found in the printed hearings and what I got from my colleagues.

Mr. TILSON. I have read the hearings.

Mr. MONDELL. My opinion is that the West Point lands are better, because I am under the impression they are neither so sandy as the other lands nor likely to become so muddy as the other lands, and therefore they are better lands for Artillery practice.

Mr. TILSON. The trouble with most of the land in that part of North Carolina, as I recall it, is that it is susceptible of being very easily worked up into a mud that is almost impassable, and that does not lend itself to the handling of Artillery.

Mr. MONDELL. I assume that in much of the work that Artillery organizations find to do during war they will encounter muddy and sandy land to traverse. Perhaps the idea in selecting Fayetteville is to give them practice ground that will be as tough as anything they may encounter in war.

Mr. TILSON. I think they do in Flanders.

Mr. MONDELL. Under all of the circumstances I believe the committee did the wise thing, the best and most businesslike thing, in recommending to the House the purchase of these lands.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to delay the House even for a minute, because we have been making very slow progress. I hope that we can get through with this bill to-day. But I wish to say a word upon this subject. I am not a member of this subcommittee, but on account of the magnitude of the bill the chairman courteously asked me to be present when I could. I have been present at a good many of the hearings, when my other work allowed, and it so happened that this was one of the times when I was present and heard the testimony. I do not remember the details very accurately, but I know that I came to the conclusion then, which I hold now, that it is wise for the Government to buy this land, and I concur heartily with the statement about it made by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the subcommittee on deficiencies. I listened to the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], to the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and also to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. Any independent opinion that I might have about almost any military affair would not be very valuable. I am not in any respect an expert. You have got to trust some one, and in these cases we have had to vest some power in the Executive. It goes through the various corps of the Army—the Ordnance Department, for instance. Then they divide it up among experts in almost all of these organizations. Then there are the engineers. Bless my soul, these people give their whole lives, first to an exhaustive education before they are intrusted with the expenditure of large sums of money. All this is under stress. I apprehend that it is true that at Fort D. A. Russell, away out in Wyoming, they have got very good land almost without limit for this kind of practice. I never stopped off there and I can not tell with certainty. I have been at Fort Sill, but it is away out in western Oklahoma, almost out to Texas. I never have been at Fort Riley, but that is pretty well out.

I got the impression from the hearings that in the location of those two camps that the railroad facilities were taken into consideration in their location near the seaport; much of transportation in the future. I think the gentleman from Kentucky and the other gentleman have very fairly stated as to the facts. I was particularly convinced that as those camps had been located under authority of law and largely constructed it was much better to buy than it would be to lease, especially as there was the question of damages where there were farms and little villages, and so forth, which would arise in the future.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON. I will do so.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman has stated there was authority of law for the locating of these camps. What authority of law is there? That is not clear to me.

Mr. CANNON. The same authority of law under which all the camps were established, as I understand it.

Mr. ROBBINS. You mean the general authority of the war power of the President and through his official agents to select these camps?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; the action of Congress in voting the appropriation. I think I am correct in that. Some gentleman of the Committee on Military Affairs will correct me if I am not correct.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then it is the general authority. There is no specific act of Congress for locating any encampments?

Mr. CANNON. Covering this at West Point?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I think not. That is all I desire to say about the matter. I think it has been said better by gentlemen who have preceded me who are members of the Committee on Appropriations than I am competent of saying. I am only telling you what caused me to approve the recommendation of these items to the full committee and to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the acquisition of land at West Point, Ky., for an Artillery range, $1,600,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I seem to have rather stirred up a hornet's nest when I alluded to these encampments. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky I did not intend nor do I make any reflection on him, but when it comes to looking for a reason why these expenditures should be made, when I look at the testimony—and that is the only source of information I have to guide me—I know nothing about what occurred in the Committee on Appropriations or who took part in this discussion there or who did not—I see it is stated here in a letter dated the 8th of August, 1918, printed in the hearings and signed by Gen. Henry, that this land is under cultivation—at least it says here, "allowing for the buildings and the lands that are under cultivation." I understand from that testimony that this land is still in the occupancy of the owners and has not been acquired by the War Department. I also read with reference to this item that we are now considering—that is, the West Point, Ky., item—on page 592 of the testimony, where it says:

The Louisville people are helping us out, and we sent people there familiar with the land to make an appraisal for us.

Further down on page 592 of the hearings it says:

At West Point, Ky., a Louisville company has agreed to go and make certificates of title on this property—

And so forth.

And also at another place that agents are there acquiring title to this land. There is no evidence here that this land is now clear and occupied by the War Department, as I understand this testimony. Of course, I have no other information about it. Therefore this proposition seems to be to acquire by purchase lands that are now in possession of private owners and being cultivated by them and not in the possession of the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. In a moment. Moreover, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who now interrupts me. has stated all along that it would cost $120,000 to rent this land.

Mr. MONDELL. No; $500,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. It cost $120,000 rental, and with the damages it would be $500,000. Now, that is the estimate that occurs in the testimony, but when you come to inquire into it——

Mr. MONDELL. Rent and damages I put at $500,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. Let me read from testimony, page 579:

The cost of leasing, according to my report to the General Staff, was about $120,000, and we thought there would probably be about two or three hundred thousand dollars more at least in damages.

Then at another place in the testimony he says that he estimates the damage would be $500,000. Of course the damage would be for the first year only and the cost thereafter would be rental only. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question of where these cantonments have been located has been explained in reports printed broadcast, and from these newspaper reports we are informed that this camp down at Fayetteville has been located there simply for political reasons. Some gentleman has asserted during this argument that no influence was used with the War Department to put the cantonments where they are. If they did the War Department has gotten credit for their action. I will read from a published statement circulated through the country in reference to the Fayetteville encampment:

Senator SIMMONS is given a large share of credit for the camp. His talk with Mr. Baker probably decided the matter. Resolutions from Fayetteville thanking the Senator were presented. Secretary King, of the Fayetteville Chamber of Commerce, brought to Washington to-day resolutions adopted at a recent meeting of that organization, thanking Senator SIMMONS for the part he played in landing an Army camp at Fayetteville.

That was published last August, when that location was made. There is the reason they put this camp down there. That is one of the reasons that puts me against it. If Army camps are being located in districts where Senators and Congressmen are running for reelection for political purposes and not located for the purpose for which the gentleman contends this camp was designated, for the benefit of the war and the training of the Army, but put there for other purposes, then my motion to strike out this item should prevail. I do not know the purpose about the other cantonment at West Point, Ky., but the Louisville Board of Trade has looked it up, and a title company in that city is seeing that the titles are correct. I make no protest against anybody. I am not inclined to do that, but I do say that if this Fayetteville cantonment, located 18 months after war has been declared, 18 months after all the other cantonments have been selected and in due process of construction are completed, was placed there for the reason given in the statement above quoted, it should be prohibited here. Here is one put down there this year; put down there by the influence of a Senator, for political purposes evidently.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Now, if that is true—and that is published broadcast, and I am giving it from the papers for what is accepted as published, and I have never seen it denied—then I say this item is not for the purpose of the Army and in good faith, but it is for other and ulterior purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has referred to a newspaper article giving some one credit for the Fayetteville location. I want to read to the gentleman what Gen. Snow has stated to the committee.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have read all that. I object to your using my time for that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Gen. Snow suggests that neither one of these propositions was suggested to him by a civilian.

Mr. ROBBINS. We will not argue it out between you and me. I am reading what the Fayetteville Board of Trade did.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. From a newspaper article?

Mr. ROBBINS. Reading a copy of the resolutions. I said if that is the situation, we ought to know it, and it should be aired on the floor of the House, and the American people ought to know that their money, $20,000,000 of it, is being expended for that purpose, and not to establish an Army camp in good faith. I admit if it is established and Artillery practice is installed there, it will be for the benefit of the Army, but I am contending against the location of these camps in that way. I say it is not right.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand the gentleman makes the assertion that this was not put there for the benefit of the country, but for the benefit of one of the Senators?

Mr. ROBBINS. I say what this resolution says.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is that the gentleman's statement?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have read the resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is that the gentleman's statement?

Mr. ROBBINS. I just read this resolution, and that is what I said about it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not the gentleman think he ought to make a charge directly and not make it by insinuation?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not want to make an insinuation. I say this resolution makes a statement. I read it for just what it is worth.

Mr. CARAWAY. What is it worth? Do you believe it is true?

Mr. ROBBINS. I believe it or I would not have read it.

Mr. CARAWAY. You make the assertion that it is true that it was put there for the benefit of Senator SIMMONS and not for the Army at all?

Mr. ROBBINS. I did not say that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. The gentleman is violating the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Which gentleman?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], in mentioning the name of a Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. I presume the gentleman overlooked the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] was using the name?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order against the gentleman, too, if not too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. There seems to be some confusion about the rule of the House——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the Chair pardon me just a moment? On several occasions I have noted that the present occupant of the chair, without suggestion from the House, has called attention to this rule. The rule to which he has called attention is rather pointed. There is to be no discussion in the House of the proceedings of the Senate and no naming of a Senator. That is my reason for making the point. The Chairman himself has voluntarily called attention to it on one or two occasions.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule of the House is that there shall be no discussion of proceedings in the Senate. The Senate has a similar rule as to the proceedings in the House. The purpose of the rule is obvious. It is a good rule. It ought to be observed. It is made the duty, apparently, of the presiding officer, whether the Speaker or Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, to direct attention to any violation of the rule upon his own initiative. But the rule does not mean that you can not refer to a Senator in his unofficial capacity. Certainly the rule was never intended to do that, nor is there anything in the rule that says that. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FOCHT. I was about to ask for the information of the House that, inasmuch as I was called to order on an occasion for some allusion far removed from directness, would it not be well for us to know just what the rule is?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to obtain the rule and read it to the committee, and in the meantime will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to unduly detain the committee. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by virtue of being chairman, has to deal with matters that relate to the entire country. He can not prevent some matters coming up in localities that may be within his district or near his district, and he would be negligent of his duty if he refused to consider matters simply because they were in his district or near his district. I have already stated that the selection of West Point was made at the instance of the Army officers who were at Camp Taylor, which happens to be in my district. All of the communities over the country have been more or less active when they could, touching the establishment of camps and plants and various other things connected with Government activities.

I believe I can say conscientiously to this House that if I have erred at all, it has been in leaning backward in refusing in any way to represent my constituency touching claims that they thought were well founded in regard to such matters. When the Camp Zachary Taylor site was selected I did, on behalf of the board of trade, present the brief that they filed, and stated the reasons which in my judgment made that a desirable camp site. I think the history of the camp warrants the statements that were then made.

Touching West Point, I did not know of its being taken as a camp until it was taken. There are now stationed there two brigades of Artillery. There is being built there this large cantonment. Part of the land was leased. The land is in the district of my colleague, Mr. BEN JOHNSON, in the fourth congressional district. I represent the fifth congressional district of Kentucky. The people there have, at the request of the Army officers, moved out of their homes. In some instances they moved twice, having moved first out of their houses that they had into other houses near that they could obtain. Most of that land is of a very rugged character. It is broken country. Some of it is land of very little value. Some of it is land of considerable value and is highly cultivated. But the testimony of the officer of the Real Estate Division of the War Department was that he believed it could be bought for an average of $40 an acre. I know nothing about its value. I have no more interest in it than any other man in this House has.

The real question that is involved here is a question altogether aside from the proposition that one of these camps happened to be near my home city. It is whether it is desirable to buy or to continue to lease this land. Now, the statement of the War Department is to the effect that they found it unsatisfactory to endeavor to train artillerymen in small units at the various cantonments; that in order to get the training—and there is nothing more important, because in no war has Artillery played so great and determining a part as in this war—that in order to get the proper training it was necessary to have these men gathered together in large units in areas where they could actually fire the guns and maneuver them, and in pursuance of that policy they had established four Artillery ranges. One is already owned—that at Fort Sill. Three have been leased—one at Columbia, S. C., one at Fayetteville, N. C., and one at West Point Ky. Having established them, they believed it was wise policy to have the Government buy the land rather than continue to lease them.

Personally, just because a man in these days is subject to criticism whenever anything happens to be located near him, I should have been glad if it had not fallen to the lot of the Committee on Appropriations to deal with this matter at all. But these estimates came in the usual form. I did not know they were in the estimates until the estimates were printed and we began the consideration of the bill. I wanted to be fair to myself and to be fair to the House. I particularly asked the Republican members of the committee to thoroughly go into this matter. They have borne witness here to-day touching their judgment about it.

I simply make this statement in justice to myself. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has to take great responsibilities. He is unworthy of the confidence of this House if in taking those responsibilities he permits personal considerations to his locality or to himself to sway his judgment. Against any thought of that I put my record here in the Congress for 16 years, and am willing to let the membership of the House who know me determine the facts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 21, line 13, after the word "department," insert: "The Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is hereby authorized to enter into agreements with the duly authorized officials of any State or any political subdivision thereof for the payment of such proportion as may mutually be determined to be equitable, not to exceed 50 per cent of the cost of the reconstruction or repair of any public highway, where said reconstruction or repair is made necessary principally by reason of the increased use thereof resulting from the location, construction, or extension of any Government armory, arsenal, fortification, proving ground, or other governmental facility under the supervision of the said Chief of Ordnance, in the locality adjacent to or served by said public highway.

"Appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for repairs or miscellaneous expenses of the Ordnance Department are hereby made available for payment of obligations incurred hereunder."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky reserves a point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I assume that the paragraph is subject to a point of order, it being clearly legislation conferring additional authority on the Chief of Ordnance, but I desire, with the permission of the chairman of the committee and the indulgence of the committee, to submit briefly the reasons which prompt the offering of this amendment.

The War Department in various sections of the country has established many governmental activities and agencies as a part of the war machinery. Necessarily it has resulted in increased use of highways that were never built or constructed for the character of traffic that had to be utilized in connection with the establishment of these different war activities. I have in mind an instance where a proving ground has been located, and in connection with its establishment and construction a highway in a small community has practically been utterly destroyed and rendered useless, and a parallel way which might have been used by the action of the War Department has been entirely closed on either end, so that it is not open for traffic at all, and the traffic in the community is now compelled to go over a road which can not bear the burden of the heavy trucks, tractors, and the guns which are constantly being carted over them.

I think in connection with the construction of cantonments in the different sections of the country the department has built public highways leading to the cantonments, and I am unofficially advised that in certain instances the department, under the authority given to it to establish these cantonments, has contributed a part of the cost of the construction of these roads. Upon some of these highways they use large tractors, which simply ruin the roadbed and reduce it to a condition of impassability. Of course, a small community, having heretofore been able to maintain a highway with a moderate expenditure of money each year, is suddenly confronted with a condition requiring an enormous expenditure of money and practically the rebuilding of the highway with a concrete foundation. It may be said that if this damage to the highway were done by a private enterprise the community or the State would be obliged to repair it, which is possibly true; but we must remember that in locating these proving grounds or other activities in these localities they take out of the taxable property a large amount of land, and the community is unable to levy any part of the cost upon the owner or occupant of these grounds which are used by the Government. The Government builds houses in which the employees live. They also are free from taxation, and practically the only gain derived by the community is the increased trade which may result to the local tradesmen. It would seem fair to authorize and leave with the Chief of Ordnance the discretion to say that in certain cases he might enter into an agreement to pay 50 per cent of building a concrete road in the immediate vicinity of governmental structures or activities, and that the State or other political subdivision might construct the rest. Conditions result whereby if any injury occurs upon the highway as the result of defective roadbed a suit for damages will lie against the local community, and the highway will soon get into a condition where the Government itself will not be able to use it.

Of course, the Government can call upon the community to repair it, but if a community is heavily burdened with taxes, and if it is obeying the request, official and otherwise, to conserve its resources and not undertake construction work except where absolutely necessary, the Government will find itself seriously hindered in the utilization of the agencies which it has established because of poor roads resulting from governmental traffic. So this amendment of mine seeks to clothe the Chief of Ordnance with the authority and discretion to enter into an agreement with the State officials, so that in cases where in the immediate vicinity of a proving ground or arsenal or other Government facility a highway has become seriously impaired, principally by reason of the increased traffic and use by the Government vehicles, such as tractors, guns, and trucks, he may enter into an agreement with the State authorities or with the county or municipal authorities whereby the road shall be put into a state of good repair, and that the Government shall pay its proportionate part of the cost, which in any event shall not exceed 50 per cent of the cost of construction. As I stated, I am advised that in one or two sections the Government has already done this in connection with cantonment work, but that in connection with proving grounds, arsenals, armories, or rifle and artillery ranges, no such arrangement has as yet been entered into, and it would seem to me that in view of the heavy burden which is cast upon the local communities, counties, and towns by this tremendously destructive use that is being made of the highways, we might confer this authority and discretion upon the Chief of Ordnance. He has funds, of course, appropriated for repair and for contingent expenses, and the share which the Government would bear would come out of that fund, according to the wording of this amendment, and I feel quite sure that these communities have some equitable claim upon the Government. I appreciate the fact that the committee, of course, have not given consideration to this proposition, and that the chairman may not feel at liberty to waive the point of order, although I trust that upon reflection he may consent to have the amendment considered by the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman has said is quite true as to the equity involved in his proposition. I think it is true that there have been instances where the unusual demand placed upon highways by the Government has resulted in a wear and tear that has placed upon localities a burden heavier than they ought to bear. But the committee had before it only one item for the repair of a road that the Government did not own, and it has been the practice of the House for a great many years past to refuse to authorize the expenditure of money for the improvement of roads that are not Government owned.

Mr. DALLINGER. Is the gentleman aware that in some cases Government work is being seriously retarded by the fact that local authorities can not issue bonds in the present state of the money market to repair roads leading to arsenals? Some time ago the town of Watertown, Mass., was asked by the Government authorities repeatedly to reconstruct Arsenal Street, which is a long street leading to the Watertown Arsenal and used principally by traffic going to the arsenal. The town authorities were willing to do it as a patriotic duty, but in order to get the money they had to make a loan and in the state of the money market, with the liberty-loan issues, it was impossible for them to find a market for their notes in order to raise the money to do the work. The highway is in very bad shape, and it seriously retards the work of the arsenal.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not challenge at all the gentleman's statement; I have no doubt it is true; and if this arose as a proposition by itself in connection with legislation I would vote for it, but I do not feel that I have a right to make an exception and waive the point of order which it is the duty of the chairman to make in connection with legislative matters of this kind.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I appreciate what the gentleman has said, but will the gentleman consider the desirability of making an appropriation to repair some of these roads and relieve the community in the next appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest that the real remedy is this: There ought to be brought out by the Military Committee, which would have jurisdiction, authority, properly safeguarded, for the expenditure of money in connection with these roads. Then if that was done the Committee on Appropriations, in connection with arsenals, would be glad to consider any request for money that the department presented and vote the necessary money.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to one case that I know very well, and that is the road between here and Baltimore. I am perfectly unselfish in what I say because it is not in any part of the State in which I live, and therefore the burden of improving it would not fall on my constituents. But the Government has ruined the road, made it practically impassible. Maryland is probably one of the best road-building States in the United States; the roads are good and kept in good condition. I know this road is ruined because I go over it. It does seem a pity. I remember of talking with our old and esteemed colleague, Mr. TALBOTT about it. He tried very hard to induce the authorities to give Maryland some money to assist in the repair of the road. He thought it would cost half a million dollars to repair the road injured by the trucks between here and Baltimore, and the Government ought to help Maryland out.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will.

Mr. CANNON. What road does the gentleman travel from here to his place?

Mr. BUTLER. Over this one, between Washington and Baltimore. How would I know about the condition of the road if I did not travel over it?

Mr. CANNON. And that is the road over which when automobiles pass they lie awake nights and are out in the daytime seeking to arrest people? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Nobody ever arrested me. I never travel fast enough.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I apreciate the circumstances, and in view of what I have said I feel compelled to insist on the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold the point of order for a brief period?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to be recognized, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to delay the committee, but I would not care to have this subject passed and leave the impression that there has been a love feast on this subject and that the House was entirely in accord with the suggestions made by certain gentlemen that the Federal Government, having spent millions in certain localities, should proceed, therefore, to repair the roads of these communities. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has called attention to the fact that some localities are very greatly embarrassed and inconvenienced from conditions arising out of the use of roads by the Federal Government.

In case there is a township organization, and that township organization is not sufficient to handle the situation, there should be some arrangement whereby a larger local community may help bear the burden. The State should help. If we embark on a plan under which the Government is to build and repair the roads that have been injured during this war by Government use, we shall have opened a very Pandora's box of expenditures. My opinion is that the States that have benefited by the enormous expenditure of Federal money can very well afford to keep their roads in repair. The State of Maryland has done wonderful work in building roads, and it would have been good business if the State had kept the road in repair between Baltimore and Washington while the Government was using it. A concrete road of the best character goes to pieces in a very short time if the surface is not kept in good repair. The Government placed a great camp on this road, which has been of very great value in a business way to Baltimore and Maryland, and the road should have been kept in repair.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the gentleman ever build a road?

Mr. MONDELL. I have helped build them.

Mr. BUTLER. Did they last long after the gentleman built them? [Laughter.] Does the gentleman know how much is necessary to repair a road after these big trucks have traveled over it and torn it all to pieces?

Mr. MONDELL. We have not the time to discuss the matter of road building, but if the gentleman is familiar with the matter he knows that even more important than the building of a road is to keep it in repair, and no matter how much money is spent on a road, it will wear out and go to pieces very rapidly under heavy traffic if it is not constantly attended to. The difficulty with most communities is that they build a good road and then forget about it until the road is in a condition where it practically has to be rebuilt.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] calls attention to the fact that the Government occupies some land which is not taxable. We in the West have been calling attention to the fact that in parts of the western country half or two-thirds of the land is not taxable, and we are called upon to maintain our roads and do maintain them. We have had military posts in the West, and in the past some people have thought that we had more posts than we ought to have had; but we have never asked the Government to build roads to any of them. In this war it happens that tremendous expenditure of billions of the Government money has mostly been here in the East; a few favored sections have grown almost scandalously rich out of the expenditure of Federal money. Now gentlemen are proposing to ask the people of the United States to pay for the wear and tear of their roads by the Federal Government. When a community secures a great industry and the benefit of great expenditure of money in connection with it, the community expects to keep up the roads in use by that industry. That rule ought to apply in the matter of Government industry the same as it applies in the matter of private industry. I think the section of the country where these vast sums have been expended can very well afford to keep their roads in repair, and if there are small communities in New England where, by reason of township organization, the burden is too heavy, then some action should be taken whereby a larger area of country may contribute to put the roads in good condition.

To start in on Government expenditures for roads hither and yon over the country, roads that it may be claimed have been worn out by the use of the Government, is to start upon an expenditure that would know no end. I have in mind the fact that owing to lack of transportation facilities many heavy trucks were brought under their own power over the roads from Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan to the seaboard. No doubt those trucks did great damage to at least some of the roads they came over. The people of the communities along these roads obtained little, if any, benefit from this traffic. If we were to embark on the plan gentlemen suggest, these communities would be justified in presenting their claims, and there would be no end to the claims and demands. In all probability the communities that would profit the most would be those that have benefited the most from Government expenditures.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how the State of Maryland happened to be drawn into this controversy of good roads, but I do want to say that, as it used to be said of roads, that all roads lead to Rome, so in this country it may be said that all roads lead to Washington, and you can not get to Washington, except when coming from the South, other than by going through Maryland. Maryland has constructed the best system of roads in this country, outside of the State of California. We have expended $25,000,000, but we did not build those roads expecting a world war, and that thousands of trucks would pass over them. We have offered them to the public and to the National Government, and they have made use of them. Contrary to what the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says about keeping them in repair, we do keep them in repair. We have a patrol system on every mile of State road in Maryland, which patrols the road day after day to make repairs, but when you have a winter like last winter, with these hundreds and hundreds of trucks passing over the roads, carrying 5 tons at a time over roads built for not more than 2 to 3 tons, it is natural that in some places where the drainage was not just what it might have been or where the ground was somewhat soft, as in several places along the Washington road, that it would break through. That has been the result. You can not build a road and have the Government trucks, I am told by the department, go over them for less than $25,000 a mile. Take the road 40 miles long, from here to Baltimore, and that means a million dollars, and when you realize that our State is small in population, though great in might, and has but 1,300,000 people, you can realize what a million dollars means to that many people. A great many Government works have been constructed in Maryland. There is a proving ground at Aberdeen. The roads leading to that were absolutely destroyed last winter, and our people are expending vast sums of money trying to put them in order. I absolutely differ from the gentleman from Wyoming. I think what this country needs is more good roads and more good roads. My experience upon the other side of the water is that if France had not had the good system of roads that she has in the northern part of that country, she never could have fought this war as she has fought it. Every section of that country that you go through they have these magnificent roads, 30 to 40 feet wide, curved on the sides, and consequently these trucks by the thousands can pass over them, and they are now in fine shape. In France they move two divisions between darkness and daylight over those roads. If it had not been for those roads in the last battle of the Marne, they never could have gotten the troops around in time to have driven the Germans back. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is absolutely wrong. This country ought to enter upon a system of highways not only for times of peace, but for times of war. Maryland is willing and anxious and will always do her part, and she keeps her roads in repair as best she can, but the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is absolutely correct. This Government ought to help people when the roads have been broken up and destroyed by Government trucks.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. If the committee will indulge the Chair for just a moment, in response to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], made a few moments ago, that the Chair refer to the rule touching the matter of reference in debate to proceedings in the Senate, the Chair desires to say that in the general rules of the House, Rule XLIII is as follows:

> Rules of parliamentary practice comprised in Jefferson's Manual shall govern the House in all cases to which they are applicable, and in which they are not inconsistent with the standing rules and orders of the House and joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives.

In Jefferson's Manual, and gentlemen will find this in paragraph 364 of the House constitution, Manual and Digest, it is said:

> It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.
> Neither House can exercise any authority over a Member or officer of the other, but should complain to the House of which he is, and leave the punishment to them. Where the complaint is of words disrespectfully spoken by a Member of another House, it is difficult to obtain a punishment, because of the rules supposed necessary to be observed (as to the immediate noting down of words) for the security of Members. Therefore it is the duty of the House, and more particularly of the Speaker, to interfere immediately and not to permit expressions to go unnoticed which may give a ground of complaint to the other House, and introduce proceedings and mutual accusations between the two Houses, which can hardly be terminated without difficulty and disorder.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I see nothing in that that would warrant the Speaker in calling me to order. Inasmuch as the reference I was making to the Senate and the Senators was legislation that had been passed, and inasmuch as I was endeavoring to correct an historical reference made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and having been called to order by the Speaker under the rulings to which the Chairman has just made reference, the Speaker, therefore, was clearly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has a recollection of that incident. The Chair thinks the Speaker was in order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Automatic machine rifles: The Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purchase, manufacture, test, repair, and maintenance of automatic machine rifles, or other automatic or semiautomatic guns, including their mounts, sights, and equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture, for not to exceed $104,062,000 in addition to the appropriations and authorizations heretofore granted for this purpose.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question in respect to the language "for not to exceed $104,062,000 in addition to the appropriations and authorizations heretofore granted for this purpose." Can the chairman give us an idea of how much had heretofore been granted?

Mr. SHERLEY. In the Army act there was carried $237,144,000 in cash and contract authorizations of $337,726,000.

Mr. LITTLE. In the next paragraph there is a similar reference to not to exceed $134,000,000 in addition to appropriations already granted.

Mr. SHERLEY. In armored motor cars, which is the paragraph the gentleman now refers to, there was appropriated in the Army act $75,550,000 in cash, with contract authorizations for $272,422,500.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking the gentleman in regard to these automatic rifles. Can the gentleman state whether it was intended to buy more of the Chaucat rifles or is this entirely for the new Browning gun?

Mr. SHERLEY. That was not developed, but my impression from the hearing was that it was for the purchase of the Browning rifle.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the gentleman's impression from the latest evidence before his committee that this light Browning rifle is performing well?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, we did not go into the question of the character of the gun and its work. I had not heard one way or the other. We went simply into the question of amounts without taking up the question of the character of guns.

There was some question asked as to prices, I think, but I do not recall that anything was asked as to whether the gun was satisfactory. The testimony seems to show that the money was to be spent for Vickers and the Browning gun. Gen. Horney testified:

All that we are asking for in this appropriation have been figured at the price of the Browning gun. Some of them that we are still getting will be Vickers, of course, in order to get the number, and the cost of them will be probably higher; but I can not tell how much because they are being produced in small numbers and at a less efficient factory.

Mr. TILSON. My question was directed as to whether the money was intended to be spent largely for the light Browning gun because of the fact that there has been some apprehension as to whether such a very light gun would perform up to standard. Of course, if it will, a gun weighing only 15 pounds and 8 ounces would be a very valuable addition to our armament, but there was some question among military men as to whether it would be possible to have a rifle as light as that perform entirely successfully. We have been using a number of the Chaucat rifles in France, and I have not had any direct information as to whether the light Browning has been substituted in actual service for the Chaucat.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the details of the estimates showed that for heavy machine guns $20,861,930 was asked, and for light machine guns $58,608,210. Then the balance of the item is made up of antiaircraft machine guns, semiautomatic rifle, and in fire control and equipment, all of which totals $83,125,484, and the maintenance 50 per cent, or half of that, $41,562,742, or a total of $124,685,226. Then there are some motor equipment for motorized machine guns and maintenance figured on that, and some repair trucks and some maintenance figured on that. We cut out, with the acquiescence of the Ordnance Department, all maintenance items and so reduced this item from $156,093,004 to the amount which is carried in the bill of $104,062,000.

Mr. TILSON. The fact that there is $58,000,000 appropriated here for the light gun, if it is the Browning for which this money is to be expended, would indicate that they are confident it is going to perform satisfactorily?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I should hope so. I think this is possibly true, that they would ask the money for the light machine gun even if it was not to be the Browning, but probably if it proved unsatisfactory they would undertake to obtain a different type, and in the absence of any testimony except the statement we have I assume they expect to buy the light Browning machine gun and therefore that those guns are satisfactory. At least, I should hope the Ordnance Department would not expend this vast sum of money on guns which were not satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of chemical warfare gases or other toxic substances, gas masks, or other offensive and defensive materials or appliances required for gas warfare purposes, including all necessary investigation, experimentation, and operations connected therewith, not to exceed $2,000,000 for the acquisition of land, construction and repair of buildings and equipment and the machinery therefor; expenses incidental to the organization, training, and equipment of gas troops not otherwise provided for, $100,000,000: Provided, That authority is granted to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the above purposes for not to exceed $150,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made: Provided further, That the appropriations and authorizations above made shall be in addition to all allotments received for these purposes from the Medical Department of the Army and the Ordnance Department of the Army for the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "not to exceed $2,000,000 for the acquisition of land;" and on page 24, at the end of line 4, insert the following: "Provided, further, That not to exceed $2,000,000 of all amounts available for the chemical-warfare service for the fiscal year 1919 shall be available for the acquisition of land."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is not to increase the amount of money that can be spent for land, but to make it plain that the limitation of $2,000,000 for the purchase of land applies to all moneys heretofore appropriated and those that are now carried in the bill. Heretofore the chemical warfare service obtained its moneys from funds which were paid to the Medical Department and Ordnance Department, and, as I stated when presenting the bill to the committee, under presidential order there was created this new corps in the military service, and it was thought desirable in view of that fact that the money should be paid direct to the service rather than to follow the circumlocution of going to the other two services and then be credited over to the chemical warfare service.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman any estimate as to what portion of this sum is to be expended for gas masks?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have a table as to the amount of money that they estimated for gas masks, which, as I recall, included the moneys they had received heretofore from the Medical Corps, amounting to $175,000,000 for respirators, and then a sum of $20,000,000 for extra canisters in connection with the respirators.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman know whether there have been any considerable number of the so-called Kops-Tissot masks manufactured or used? It is the latest gas mask, which eliminates the nose clamps so that a man can sleep in it. There has been a mask of that sort developed, which seems to be very satisfactory, and I wish to ask the gentleman if there are going to be a sufficient number of them made to supply the troops?

Mr. SHERLEY. My understanding is that all of the new masks are going to be of that type. I do not know the type by name, but the testimony indicated that they expected to make this modern and improved mask, which I assumed was a mask that slips over the head, and without the requirement of a nose and mouthpiece?

Mr. TILSON. The new mask is called the Kops-Tissot mask, from Waldemar Kops, of New York, and Tissot, the Frenchman. It eliminates the nose clamps, which are largely to blame for making it impossible for a man to sleep in the service mask. Where the gas shells are falling all night it is necessary, if a man sleeps at all, that he sleep with the mask on. I was wondering how extensively those new ones are being made. The masks with which most of our troops are now equipped, I believe, are the ordinary respiratory masks with the nose clamps.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think there is any large amount of gas masks on hand. I think the demand for them has been heavy. In making the masks now they will make them of the most improved type and masks that will be issued from now on will be of a type which will in a large measure represent this new type of mask.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture, for not to exceed $1,093,937,897 in addition to the appropriations and authorizations heretofore granted for this purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 24, line 11, strike out the sum "$1,093,937,897" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$1,086,782,897."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to make a further reduction in the amount carried, because of the elimination from the bill of the Neville Island project. At the time the committee marked up the bill, as I stated in my opening remarks, there was included under this head all that was asked for by the Ordnance people, except that which pertains to the enlargement of the Neville Island project, which amounted to $93,000,000 in regard to plant, and $21,375,000, which was contingent upon the enlargement of the plant in the way of making guns. Now, the Ordnance people, by a letter of October 14, advise me that in the event the Neville Island plant on its enlarged plan was not carried through there ought to be a reduction, instead of $21,375,000, incident to guns to be made there, of $28,530,000, and it was for the purpose of making that revision that I have just offered the amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Where is this artillery to be used?

Mr. SHERLEY. Presumably this artillery is to be used in France.

Mr. LITTLE. Why is it headed "Fortifications" then?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, that is an old matter. Formerly the armament of fortifications related not only to seacoast artillery but to field artillery. And when the separation came years ago the jurisdiction whereby the Committee on Military Affairs was given jurisdiction of certain matters relating to the Army and other jurisdictions was left with the Appropriations Committee, and there remained as a part of the appropriation on the fortifications bill those provisions that related to field artillery for the Regular Army, so that they are carried under the general language of fortifications, and so forth.

Mr. LITTLE. That explains it. There is another question I would like to ask. Here I notice there is about $2,500,000,000 appropriated in this clause and the next one for this artillery and ammunition. Has there been some preceding appropriation to which this is to be added?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. LITTLE. That is still ready to be used?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. But there is no money or contract authorization that has not been obligated, with perhaps the exception of a few million dollars. They have had appropriated in the fortifications bill heretofore for field artillery and ammunition therefor, in cash and contracts, something over $5,000,000,000. Now, the reason for this additional sum is due to the enlarged military program. As I explained when these matters were up before, we had appropriated in the last fortifications bill for the artillery—for 90 divisions—presumably for three armies of 30 divisions each.

Upon the revision of the quantity of ammunition needed per division, that appropriation, instead of providing for 90 divisions, would really provide for about 69 divisions. The present program contemplates 80 divisions abroad and 18 divisions in America, or a total of 98 divisions, and this appropriation contemplates the equipment, with what has been voted heretofore, of those 98 divisions, and some additional divisions.

Mr. LITTLE. And the additional divisions have not yet been raised?

Mr. SHERLEY. Have not been raised. Now, the reason for that is in order to carry the work along up to January, 1920, because it was testified to the committee that if they did not continue these contract authorizations there would be a slowing up in production that would result in a serious delay in the program.

Speaking my own personal conclusions, I have never felt that it was very likely or possible or probable that the moneys that we have appropriated for field artillery and for the ammunition therefor could be spent within the time. I question very much whether, with the large quantities that we will get from our allies, and that would be paid for out of these funds, as well as what we can build here, we can produce this huge quantity.

But the committee did not feel that it had the right to take the responsibility of lessening the amount recommended to the full committee.

Mr. LITTLE. This is recommended by the General Staff?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it is recommended not only by the General Staff, but by the Ordnance Department.

It ought to be said in connection with both this appropriation and many others in this bill that the contracts that are made by the Government all contain cancellation clauses, so as to permit of the cancellation of contracts. Now, of course, whenever peace comes there will be certain work under way that perhaps will have advanced to such a stage that it will pay better to complete it than to stop it midway. But there ought to be a very great quantity of contract authorizations in the event that the war should stop in the near future that could be canceled without material loss to the Government.

Mr. LITTLE. That would include this expenditure?

Mr. SHERLEY. That would include particularly expenditures of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman from Kentucky inform me whether, when the Government enters into a contract for the manufacture of cannon, it also supplies the machinery, or is this for machinery to manufacture its own cannon?

Mr. SHERLEY. The language as carried in the old fortification bills was to supply machinery for our own arsenals; but, as the gentleman is doubtless aware, the Government has, in connection with the creation of field artillery and ammunition, financed and built a very large number of the plants that make this material, and it is under this language that they do it. It is under the next item, in regard to ammunition, that a number of nitrate plants have been built in the past and the money here would be available for that purpose.

But it is only proper that I should say to the House that the ordnance people testified that they did not contemplate the building of any additional nitrate plants. They had an estimate in here for $103,500,000 for nitrate plants, which they were not prepared to defend. They also said that there had been under consideration a project looking to the building in Jefferson County, Ky., just outside of Louisville, of a nitrate plant out of moneys that had been previously voted, but that they did not think that would be built, and they questioned somewhat whether plants already under way would be carried to full completion. We have now built or building four nitrate plants—one at Muscle Shoals, the second I forget for the moment the location of, one near Cincinnati, and one near Toledo. But some time back the situation was very acute touching the obtaining of nitrate. Since then we have been able, by obtaining ships for the nitrate trade, to obtain quantities of nitrate that make the situation very much better now.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Is there any nitrate on the market now that has been manufactured by the Government, from Government plants?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is none on the market, because we are using all the nitrate we can get.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Are we making nitrate?

Mr. SHERLEY. We are beginning to make ammonia nitrates down at the Muscle Shoals plant, and the testimony was that in a few weeks they expected to begin to get quantity production. The plants out in Ohio that are just in process of erection have developed but a little way. The second nitrate plant is further along but not yet producing.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith, the machinery necessary for its manufacture, and necessary storage facilities, for not to exceed $1,332,460,445 in addition to the appropriations and authorizations heretofore granted for this purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 24, line 20, strike out the sum "$1,332,460,445" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$1,325,776,685."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to reduce the amount carried by $6,683,760, which is the cost of the ammunition which it was expected would be manufactured at the Neville Island plant if the enlarged program was carried through, and which will not be manufactured there if the enlarged program is not carried through. Inasmuch as the House has not carried the $93,000,000 for the enlargement of that plant, it is proper that this item should be reduced by the amount I have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PANAMA CANAL.

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for seacoast and land defense cannon, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith, and the machinery necessary for its manufacture, $350,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do so to acquire information of a general character, to ascertain why the committee segregates the item for the purchase and testing of ammunition for the coast-defense cannon from that of the Panama Canal, and why it is not grouped with the general authorization?

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason for that was the desire to keep track of the Panama Canal fortifications. This is to pay a contract obligation carried in last year's bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the completion of the two temporary office buildings authorized by the deficiency appropriation act, approved March 28, 1918, to be erected in Potomac Park for the use of the War Department and Navy Department, $1,490,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Does this contemplate the completion of the temporary buildings that we are having built all over the city? There seem to be so many of them that every time I go through them there is a new one, and it is difficult to keep track of them. Is that the end of that program, or what is the real object of it?

Mr. SHERLEY. This relates only to the two buildings, the buildings that are at Seventeenth and B Streets, right opposite the Pan-American Building, which run back from Seventeenth Street to about Twenty-first Street. This represents a deficiency in regard to those buildings, with the exception of $375,000, which is carried for linoleum on the floors of the buildings. These are two of the largest buildings of their kind in the world.

Mr. ROBBINS. Are those the two buildings that the War Department has recently gone into?

Mr. SHERLEY. One of them is a War Department building, and the other is for the Navy Department. The total cost, with this deficiency, will be $3.95 per square foot, approximately.

Mr. STAFFORD. How does that compare with construction of buildings of similar character under private contract?

Mr. SHERLEY. I know of no buildings of similar character that have been built anywhere. They represent a very low cost for the character of building, considering the present labor cost. In other words, the frame buildings that are being built here are costing about $2.50 or better, and these buildings were estimated to cost $3 a square foot at the time that the Committee on Appropriations presented the matter to the House last spring. There is a very full statement submitted by Commander Parsons, who has the supervision of the construction of these buildings, as to the items that went to make the additional cost. Those items relate to several things, speaking largely: First, the necessity for sinking some piling in order to get a stable foundation.

It was found that this land had enough soft material underneath it so that it would not stand the weight of the building, owing to the spreading of the foundation, so there was a piling cost. In addition to that there has been an increased cost in labor and an increased cost in material. I hope that any gentleman who has not done so will take occasion to go into these buildings. I believe that they represent perhaps the best type of modern office building to be found anywhere in the world. If gentlemen will walk through these buildings they will find an absolute absence of any ornamentation. The plain concrete walls as they came from the form are left there, except in the rooms that are intended for the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why then is the cost greater than the cost of buildings with ornamentation?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think that the cost is anything like as much as that of any other buildings that are fireproof that are being built now.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I would not have made that statement were it not that when I mentioned to a prominent manufacturer in my home city that we were constructing these concrete buildings in Potomac Park at an average cost of $3 per square foot he stated that that was a very large price indeed for buildings of that character, and he has had experience.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman's manufacturer would find if he undertook to build in the present market that he would not be able to come anywhere near as low a figure as $3 per square foot. I do not say that from my personal knowledge. I never built a building in my life. But the testimony of men who have come before the committee, who, I believe, are qualified to testify, is the warrant for my statement. This is much less per square foot than the Arlington Building is costing, and a lot of the material for the Arlington Building was purchased under contract prices before the market got anything like as high as it is now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course there is no comparison between the Arlington Building, which is a structural-steel building, and these buildings, which are nothing more than three-story reinforced concrete.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman that there is no comparison. These buildings are so much superior to the Arlington Building for their purposes that they are not in the same class at all. I repeat that I wish gentlemen of the House would go through these buildings. I think they would come away satisfied that as buildings for utilitarian purposes they are very admirable.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I say that there is no comparison I mean that obviously a structural-steel building of the Arlington type is much more expensive that mere reinforced concrete.

Mr. SHERLEY. In some particulars that is true; but there is a good part of the Arlington Building that is not structural steel. It has quite a lot of brick walls, just as this building has some.

Mr. STAFFORD. From the sub-basement to the top floor the Arlington Building is all structural steel.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true; but these building will supply a very great need, and notwithstanding the cost is greater than I had hoped it would be I believe a reading of the testimony will show that a very remarkable achievement has been accomplished in the building of these buildings within the time they have been built for the prices they have been built. The size of these buildings is simply amazing. You could take the Arlington Building and put it into the Navy Building and not know it was there at all, so far as space goes. And when you consider that these are two of the largest office buildings in the world, and consider the time within which they were erected, I think it is quite an achievement. The committee undertook to have very full hearings about it, and I hope Members will read the statements that were made by Commander Parsons in connection with them.

Answering the inquiry a little further, there are a number of buildings that are going up here that Congress has not authorized at all. There is a new building going up to house the War Industries Board that is being put up out of money that the President advanced out of the funds given him. Then there are a number of buildings that are going up here in connection with housing employees which are being paid for from the moneys that were voted in connection with the housing program, which for Washington were limited to $10,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire whether these buildings have been erected on the cost-plus basis or by direct contract awarded to a private contractor?

Mr. SHERLEY. They were erected on the basis of cost plus a fixed fee. There was a fixed fee for the contractor, and the costs were paid by the Government. The full data of that is given on page 720 of the hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Norfolk, Va.: For completion of dry dock and for accessories, $856,508.69.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A week ago, while the gentleman from Kentucky was busy in the hearings on this bill, there passed the House an appropriation for the purchase of a dry dock from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which the Government of the United States had the privilege of leasing at $50,000 a year. The argument was made that there was no dry dock of sufficient capacity north of League Island to accommodate the larger ships. I wish to inquire of the gentleman as to the dry dock at Norfolk, which has been before Congress in measures for the last 10 years in nearly every naval appropriation bill, what is this appropriation for, and whether it is for a large dry dock?

Mr. SHERLEY. This particular appropriation is to pay an actual incurred deficiency. There is a large dry dock being built in Norfolk, and this is to complete it. Its total cost is to be $4,356,518.69.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will that be one of the largest dry docks on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know about that.

Mr. HOLLAND. It will be one of the largest docks; it is 1,000 feet long.

Mr. STAFFORD. When was it authorized first—some years ago?

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not recollect; but it was at the same time that the one at the Philadelphia Navy Yard was authorized; two years ago, I think.

Mr. SHERLEY. This is simply to meet an ascertained deficiency and the committee had nothing to do except to make the appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

To pay the Brennan Construction Co. in full settlement of its claim for balance due for furnishing labor and appliances for executing brickwork in the construction of the United States Senate Office Building, under contract dated December 2, 1905, which payment is authorized and directed, $12,990.09.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Kentucky as to the necessity of approving a claim in this deficiency bill which dates back 13 years. Has the matter been adjusted recently, or been in litigation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As the gentleman will observe, this is to settle a claim growing out of the construction of the Senate Office Building. It is a claim that has been pending for possibly 10 years. There was a dispute between the Government and the Brennan Construction Co. as to the amount of the claim.

The Government contended that there was due to the company something over $10,000, and the construction company claimed that there was something over $16,000 due it. A suit was instituted and has been pending during these years. It was over a question of fact as to the manner in which the bricks were to be measured. This represents a compromise entered into by the attorneys representing the Government and the attorneys representing the Brennan Construction Co. Its payment is recommended by Mr. Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol and of Buildings and Grounds, as being a proper one, and also recommended by the attorneys for the Government. The compromise was entered into on condition that Congress should at this session appropriate the money.

Mr. STAFFORD. The claimant needs the money.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Whether he needs it or not, he wants the money; it is an old claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the Government originally admitted that $10,000 was due?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The attorney for the Government stated that the company was entitled to something over $10,000 anyway. The whole question arose as to the manner in which the bricks used in the construction of the building should be estimated.

Mr. STAFFORD. When did the claim first become due?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. About 10 years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the interest charge alone would amount to considerable?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It would amount to much more than the amount given in compromise.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES COURTS.

The appropriation for "fees of clerks, United States courts," contained in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, shall be available for the payment of fees to the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in United States cases from July 1, 1918, notwithstanding the prohibition on the payment of such fees from that fund by the said act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I wish to inquire of some member of the committee as to the reason for making this exception at this time.

Mr. MONDELL. The prohibitive was contained in the sundry civil act and was placed in the act under a misapprehension. The statement was made to the committee that out of this fund the clerk had drawn large sums, which were used to pay the expenses of moving and fitting up the office, and in view of that fact the committee felt that they ought to restrict the use of the fund in that way. But it developed that the statement was erroneous, and as this fund is drawn on by the clerk from time to time, although not reduced a dollar eventually, the clerk could not carry on his office without repealing the prohibitive.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is for office fees?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a fee office and the fund is drawn on until the end of the year, at which time the fund is reimbursed, so that really it is not reduced at all by reason of the expenditures in this office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Atlanta, Ga.: For enlarging the dining room and chapel, $37,000; purchase of machinery and other equipment, $650,000; working capital, $150,000; purchase, equipment, improvement, and operation of additional farm land, $200,000; in all, $1,037,000: Provided, That the said working capital fund and the receipts credited thereto may be used as a revolving fund during the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. If I remember, a bill passed the House for the establishment of a private manufacturing plant at the Atlanta Penitentiary. Was it enacted into law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; it became a law, and this appropriation is in exact accord with the terms of the law which was passed July 10, 1918.

Mr. STAFFORD. I rose to inquire whether it has become a law.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has.

Mr. ROBBINS. Was that in connection with the establishment of a convict-labor plant in this penitentiary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is in connection with the establishment of a cotton-duck factory.

Mr. ROBBINS. For the manufacture of cotton duck?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. And it is pursuant to that act that this appropriation is made?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. This carries the exact amount of money authorized by the act.

The Clerk read as follows:

STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

For amount necessary to increase the compensation of officers and employees of the Steamboat-Inspection Service from November 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," approved July 2, 1918, as follows: Supervising inspector general from $4,000 to $5,000, deputy supervising inspector general from $2,000 to $3,000, 11 supervising inspectors from $3,000 to $3,450 each, 2 local inspectors from $2,500 to $2,950 each, 14 local inspectors from $2,250 to $2,700 each, 28 local inspectors from $2,000 to $2,500 each, 12 local inspectors from $1,800 to $2,350 each, 40 local inspectors from $1,500 to $2,100 each, 36 assistant inspectors from $2,000 to $2,500 each, 48 assistant inspectors from $1,800 to $2,350 each, 59 assistant inspectors from $1,600 to $2,100 each, 2 traveling inspectors from $2,500 to $3,000 each; in all, $88,766.67.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 22, strike out "November" and insert "July."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, the bill increasing the pay of inspectors of steam vessels was passed in the month of June last and was approved July 2. The bill itself was amended on the floor and contained a clause stating that those receiving the increase of pay under this act should not receive the $120 increase of pay which we gave to all other Federal employees of their grade. Since that time the inspectors and assistant inspectors have not received the $120. I submit that the intention of the act which we passed in June last was that immediately the men should receive the increase of pay carried by that bill; that the increase should begin the 1st of July last. This act came from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries by unanimous report, because we were losing so many men from that service that the Secretary of Commerce said he could not carry on the service, and the House passed the bill and it was duly approved by the President, and it seems to me that it was the full intention that the men should receive their pay immediately. I can not understand why we should put off these men for four months and begin their increase of pay when all of the other increases made at that time were immediately received.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that the matter is subject to a point of order, but I want to state to the House the reason why the committee took the position that it did. It has always been customary in cases where the Congress passes a law changing the rates of compensation for estimates to be submitted subsequently for the increase, and then the Congress carries the increases from the date that the bill carrying the payment became a law, which we figure in this instance would be approximately the 1st of November. The only exception that I know to that is the exception that was called attention to yesterday in connection with the increase of salaries of District of Columbia employees, and the reason for that was that the bill that carried those increases had been passed by both Houses and would have become a law as of the 1st of July, the beginning of the fiscal year, but for the controversy that came up over the half-and-half principle, and in order to hold the force of the District employees there was practically a general acquiescence in the statement made to them that they would get the increased amount as of the 1st of July.

In nearly every other instance that I can recall the increases have gone into effect when the next appropriation bill came in, and frequently that meant the year following. It so happens that in this instance there followed this deficiency appropriation bill and the department submitted the estimate for the full year, but the committee felt that they ought to bring it in, as has been the practice in the past, from the date that the bill would probably become a law.

Mr. ROWE. Did the gentleman realize that these inspectors were not paid the $120 as other employees of the Government were paid?

Mr. SHERLEY. I realize that by virtue of these increases they would not be paid that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that these officers were deprived of the increase of a year ago?

Mr. ROWE. No; they got it up to June 30.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are getting a great deal more than $120 under the bill which we passed increasing their salaries.

Mr. ROWE. They are not getting it at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, if he will look at the increases he will find that they amount to considerably more than $120. The first increase is $4,000 to $5,000, the next from $2,000 to $3,000, and then from $3,000 to $3,450, from $2,500 to $2,950, from $2,250 to $2,700, from $2,000 to $2,500, from $1,800 to $2,350, from $1,500 to $2,100, from $2,000 to $2,500, from $1,800 to $2,350, from $1,600 to $2,100, and from $2,500 to $3,000.

Mr. ROWE. Does the gentleman remember the testimony that was presented on this matter, that for 16 years they had not had a raise?

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not hear that testimony which was given before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I am not meaning in any way to imply that these employees were not entitled to an increase in pay. The Congress decided that they were, and in pursuance of the order of the Congress we bring in this amount; but it has been the custom of the House and of the committee always to bring it in as of the date that the act that carries the money is to become the law. If the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union thinks it wants to make this provision retroactive and vote this money as of the 1st of July, that is for the committee to do, having in mind the precedent that will be established in similar cases hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist on his point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I do not think, literally, that it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that he would overrule the point of order. The question would be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON and others) there were—ayes 18, noes 21.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The appropriation of $50,000 "for one new vessel, including equipment, to cost not exceeding $354,000," contained in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, shall be covered into the surplus fund, and the authorization for the said vessel is repealed.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee the reason why this vessel was not continued; why the building of that vessel was canceled?

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason was this: We have not been able to obtain this vessel for the moneys that were authorized, and we are building nearly $3,000,000,000 worth of vessels in connection with the Emergency Fleet Corporation, so it seemed to the committee that as this vessel could not be built probably for six months or a year without interfering with some other work now underway, and we would have so many vessels as a result of this new building program, it was not wise now to have this vessel built and that they could get a vessel from those vessels which are being built. That is the sole reason.

Mr. HICKS. Do I understand from the chairman that one vessel to be built by the Emergency Fleet Corporation will be used for this purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it ought to be whenever they can give it for that purpose without interfering with the more important purpose of carrying our troops and supplies overseas. Here is the idea. I tried to state it to the House in my opening statement. We cut out a number of items in regard to ships, some $53,000,000 for Army transports, on this theory, that we were engaged now in shipbuilding to the practical capacity of the country and that as $4,000,000,000 has been voted for shipbuilding, with that large number of ships coming out, there would be at the termination of this war ships available for these various services, and inasmuch as we could not build a ship now at the figures that have been appropriated, instead of appropriating additional moneys to make good a deficiency, we let the matter wait in abeyance. That is the reason.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Under this legislation will it not compel the taking of this vessel from the emergency-fleet work for the work to be done under this provision?

Mr. SHERLEY. It would if the repeal of this provision meant you lessened by a ship all you were going to get, but inasmuch as we are getting all we can produce the matter of money to be available did not seem to bear any relationship to the number of ships because it was testified to us by the ship experts that they are using all of the yards that they could use in regard to producing ships and, as the gentleman knows, we are straining day and night to get them out.

Mr. DOWELL. My inquiry was merely to ascertain if this would not lessen the emergency-ship provision by taking one vessel for this purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, yes. After the needs of the Army are over, why then, instead of having a given number of ships for mercantile purposes, there would be one of those ships that would be needed to go into this service.

Mr. DOWELL. That would be perfectly proper. But the inquiry I was making was, would not they really require the turning over of one ship to comply with the provisions of this act? That is the information I wanted.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. There is nothing here that requires them to turn over a ship, and, in point of fact, if we did not repeal this it would not mean that the Coast and Geodetic Survey are going to get a ship, because we can not spend the money. And in point of fact, some of their vessels now have been turned over to the use of the Army and Navy for the prosecution of the war, just as the Bureau of Fisheries has turned some of their ships over, and it is just a question of whether we would increase by this amount of money the amount of money we are putting in shipbuilding.

Mr. DOWELL. That is satisfactory.

Mr. EMERSON. Just a word. Have they started on this?

Mr. SHERLEY. They have not. They were unable to get a contract under the price authorized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under this item I have in mind they are erecting a very large building across from Congress Hall Hotel. I would like to inquire where the appropriation is made for the construction of that building?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not recall. I will try to get the information for the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not know but he had it in mind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman say they were proceeding very rapidly on that building?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, not so fast but that you can keep track of the construction of the building that is going up.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman have an office that fronts on that building?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but my room at the hotel faces it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has he noticed the coming and going of the workmen as they take the material out and bring it in?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have observed them building.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did he observe the lumber and the way it was unloaded?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Occasionally, as I have been going over to dinner, but not in the morning.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman observe them taking it from the wagon and putting it on the street, and then piling it up on the lot? Did he observe that? Did he observe how the stone came in and was hauled back and forth?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more. We are just getting to the gravamen of this thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I saw them starting a building there.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I have just made an inquiry, and I find there were some moneys carried by the Public Health Service, but I know of no moneys that have been voted for buildings for the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Whether the building he refers to is a building in connection with the Public Health Service or some enlargements of their building here or not, I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is almost adjoining the Capitol here.

Mr. SHERLEY. Right across here is the Public Health Service. They have been very much crowded, and they obtained a limited amount of money in the sundry civil bill for enlargements and improvement of their building, but I recall nothing for the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice they have a sign over the tool shop, which they have there, reading "Coast and Geodetic Survey," and that indicates that the building is to be used for that. I do not think it is a public-health building. I am a stanch friend of the Public Health Service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman is not complaining about the rapidity with which this work is being done? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not at all.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all.
The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Leaves of absence: To enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of law granting leave to employees of the Government Printing Office, fiscal year 1918, $2,694.50.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, while we are on the Government Printing Office, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. There has been a good deal of talk about economy, and I am anxious to help it along. A day or two ago I received a pamphlet which I hold in my hand, the caption of which is "Shipping Facts." To illustrate how they economize in the preparation of pamphlets of this sort—and I may say this is from the Shipping Board—I wish to show to the House that notwithstanding the shortage of paper and the difficulty of getting it for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and for other purposes, this pamphlet is printed on only every other page, showing that they have an utter disregard for the economy which they advise everybody to practice.

It seems to me that in the face of the urgent need of print paper, and the difficulty of getting it, it ought to be conserved with greater care than has been exercised in this instance, and that at least every page of the pamphlet should be used instead of only half the pages.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. CANNON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the multiplicity of public documents touching the public service, printed, some of them, on poor paper and some of them on both sides of the sheet, I am not sure but that it would be a saving of ink and of time and of temper if some of these documents that are published, if you could not dispense with them otherwise, would jump every other page and thus save ink. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, there may be something in that. I had not thought about the ink.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. LONDON. Is it not because the pamphlet is so full of thought that they left room in it for the insertion of notes? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Well, they left room for reflections and possibly notes. They did not contain enough facts to cover all the pages, and so they gave us the information in blank in some of the pages. Shipping facts are very interesting now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What are those blank pages put in there for? To present an argument?
Mr. MADDEN. I presume they are to give you room for reflection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. SLOAN. Why could not the gentleman present that suggestion in a form that would carry information to the public?
Mr. MADDEN. If we had a photographic instrument here I would try to do it, but inasmuch as none of the gentlemen present seem to understand the importance of blank pages on a public document, I would leave that to the gentlemen who have the management of the office from which this comes.

In this connection I wish to say that somebody in the Shipping Board gave another illustration recently of its desire to conserve the public funds. It was only last Sunday when they sent a special train with 26 people on board, containing full crews and two diners and, I think, four sleeping cars, from this city to New York at the expense of the Government, to carry a lot of people—25 or 26 people—over to see a couple of ships launched. That seems to be another species of extravagance that it is just as well to call the attention of the public to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. Cards were sent to those who were fortunate enough to be invited as guests on that trip, saying that meals would be furnished on the train and entertainment given them in New York—everything free. Now, if we are going to control the railroads, and travel is so dense as it is now, and it is almost impossible for a man to ride on a train when he buys a ticket, it would seem that there would be no necessity for sending four sleepers and two diners from here to New York at the expense of the Government to carry 26 people who want to go on a junket. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. I wish to inquire what is the pamphlet the gentleman refers to?
Mr. MADDEN. "Shipping Facts," by the Shipping Board.
Mr. SISSON. Does not the gentleman know that that is one of the very few pamphlets that they get out where it is intended to publish the contents in newspapers, and the rule is to print only on one side for the convenience of the newspapers in setting it up?
Mr. MADDEN. I do not know what the reason was, but I assume the blank pages were left for reflections, which would not perhaps have been forthcoming if the pages had all been printed.
Mr. SISSON. Of course only a limited number of those is printed, and copies of that pamphlet were sent only to the newspapers who handle that information.
Mr. MADDEN. I am glad the gentleman has given a scientific explanation of the blank pages. [Laughter.]
Mr. SISSON. There is nothing scientific about it. It is only a matter of knowing that the newspapers do not like to handle matter covering both sides of the paper.
Mr. MADDEN. The fact still remains that this involves a great waste of paper.
Mr. GILLETT. How many pages are there?
Mr. MADDEN. The total number of pages is 16. That is, there are 16 printed pages and 16 blank pages. That would make 32 pages in all.
Mr. GILLETT. How many newspapers will print anything like 16 pages? They would not print a page.
Mr. MADDEN. Not being in the newspaper business, I do not know. It depends on the value of the facts. However, I have said all I care to say about it. I want to impress upon the minds of Members of the House present that the practice of sending trains over to New York with insignificant junketeers, without any reason, at public expense, when there are not seats enough or berths enough for those who want to travel and pay, ought to be called to the attention of the public, and I do it in this very modest way.
The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.
Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I intend to offer a substitute for section 3. Is this the time to offer it?
The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order after section 3 is read. The Clerk will read.
The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. (a) That the President is authorized to create a commission consisting of seven members, to be known as the "war salvage commission," whose duty it shall be to make a survey and study of all properties belonging to the United States, and particularly those acquired during the present war, and to recommend to Congress what use or disposition should be made of same in the interest of the Government and people of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order against the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Will points of order have to be made against every paragraph of this section?
The CHAIRMAN. This is an appropriation bill, and under the practice of the House appropriation bills are considered by paragraphs.
Mr. MADDEN. So a point of order will have to be made against every paragraph.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So, then, it will be necessary to make a point of order at the conclusion of the reading of each paragraph?
The CHAIRMAN. Yes; each paragraph must be considered by itself.
Mr. SHERLEY. There is no use to take the time of the committee unnecessarily.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the reason why I asked if it would be necessary to make a point of order against each paragraph.
Mr. SHERLEY. The Committee on Appropriations agreed to this proposal for a commission. I tried to explain to the House the purpose of it. I still think it is exceedingly important that we have a commission to advise us touching the disposition of property, and not a commission now clothed with power which would simply result probably in our hastily doing something unwise that we would not want to do if we got the information in the first instance. But a provision of this kind is necessarily subject to a point of order. That means that it must meet with the approval of everybody, or at least it must meet with enough of approval so that no one will make a point of order against it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] feels that he should make a point, and he has made a point of order to the first paragraph. That having gone out, the rest of it ought to go out. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the remainder of section 3 be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the several paragraphs, beginning with paragraph (b) to the end of section 3, may be stricken from the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of submitting some remarks that I wanted to make before the conclusion of this bill.

I want to state that I believe a provision of this kind should be carried, either in this bill, or there should be some other provision of like character, because the property involved is so enormous that an inventory of it should be made, so that when the war closes the Federal Government may know where its property is, and what it is, because it will run up into many hundreds of millions, if not into billions, of dollars.
